The capture of Crete in a few days' time in the narrow seas was a dramatic and clear-cut victory of air power. Britain controlled the sea. However, the British were unable to prevent the landing of German forces, although Britain valiantly sacrificed in the fighting a number of powerful cruisers and destroyers. The British were in possession of Crete; they had an army there, with defended positions, artillery, tanks, and other heavy equipment. The naval force aiding the Germans was inferior to that of the British. The Germans took Crete without having tanks and other celebrated equipment of their previous campaigns.

Some of our Army officers have said in the past "The Army welcomes the airplanes; they are excellent as an auxiliary to the Army forces. But the airplanes are unable to seize and hold positions. Also, airplanes cannot transport artillery or tanks." We now learn that the soldiers in airplane transports, and in the gliders drawn by airplanes, can seize and hold positions. Also, that the swift and powerful dive bombers which accompany the transport airplanes are capable of taking the place of artillery and tanks in the battles.

Would it not be wise to allow the President an additional Cabinet officer, in order to insure the best use of our large air force? A Cabinet Minister of Defense would, as is done in Britain and in Germany, aid the Chief Executive in supervising the three coequal armed branches—the Navy, the Army, and the Air Corps. This Cabinet Minister of Defense would not only inspect the relative progress of the three branches and note where there are deficiencies, but he would also give orders on the spot to remedy any deficiencies. He would be in actual command of these three armed branches.

The way to control is to command. Coordination of three different forces—by a council or otherwise—involves, or at least invites, compromise and delay. It is interesting that Goethals, who constructed the long Panama Canal, said he made use of his assistants to aid him, but that he rarely used a committee or board of officials. He thought boards were often narrow and wooden. John W. Weeks, of Boston, who was Secretary of War in the Cabinets of Presidents Harding and Coolidge, was earnestly in favor of a single department of national defense. Weeks, a graduate of Annapolis, was successful as a banker and businessman. He was also a Senator in Congress. From his own experience Secretary Weeks stated there was, at Washington, administrative overlapping and administrative conflict—as well as departmental antagonism between the Army and Navy. Secretary Weeks believed that a Cabinet Minister of National Defense would be able to prevent duplication of activities and plants and wasteful expenditures of public funds.

Only by having one member of the Cabinet in charge of all the defense branches can Congress get the unpartisan and objective opinion of a civilian minister who devotes his whole time to studying and inspecting the relative efficiency, progress, and needs of the three armed services. One of the objections to a Department of Defense is the fear that the unity of command would be damaged. On the contrary, unity of command would be improved. The President would have only one member of his Cabinet to consult about defense matters as a rule. And one member of his Cabinet to whom he gave instructions about defense matters.

Unity of command for the Navy would result from having that part of the air force that goes to war under Navy command train under Navy command all the time in peace. The part of the Air Corps to go to war under Army command would train under Army command all the time in peace. Graduates of West Point and Annapolis would continue to be assigned for duty as at present with the portion of the Air Corps on duty with the Army and the Navy.

A natural question is often asked, "Is it reasonable to recommend a Department of National Defense if many of the officers of the Navy and the Army are of the opinion that such action would not be wise?" That our experts must be trusted. The most wise experts at times may make errors through their enthusiasm. In a matter involving the defense of the Nation it is well to examine and critically weigh the opinions of all—of experts and others.

The Cabinet Minister of Defense would be the head of the Department of Defense. The President at Washington can never closely supervise the work of 10 Cabinet officers. A civilian assistant would be at the head of each of the armed services—the Navy, the Air Corps, and the Army.

The single United States Air Corps would have its own laws for pay, promotion, and retirement. The Air Corps would be a homogenous body with a status equal to that of the Navy and the Army. The Chief of the Air Corps would have charge of the research, procurement and supply services for the Air Corps, and of the land aviation schools for elementary and preliminary training of men of the Air Corps. The Chief of the United States Air Corps would also have charge of a reserve air force—to be sent to aid the Army or the Navy—as the Cabinet Minister of Defense might direct. A small National Defense College would be created, under the Cabinet Minister of Defense. The students would be a limited number of officers of the services, with a few civilians from some of the other Government departments. The Cabinet Minister of Defense would need only a small staff. The three civilians at the head of the three coequal services would each have large staffs as at present.

Among those who have expressed their opinions in favor of a Department of Defense are the late John J. McSwain, head of the House Committee on Military Affairs; Lt. Gen. Robert L. Bullard; and the late Brig. Gen. William Mitchell.

About 20 countries have in the last few years adopted in some form the plan for a single department of defense. Cabinet committees, or similar committees, are excellent as policy-making bodies but are as a rule not so effective as executives.

Yours faithfully,

WILLIAM C. RIVERS,
Major General, United States Army, Retired.

The Horrors of War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL A. REED
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 11, 1941

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, the headlines in the press would seem to indicate that the administration is searching for an incident, apparently any excuse, to get into the foreign war. I am wondering how much of an incident will be worth the sacrifice of thousands and perhaps millions of our young men.

The fathers and mothers of this country who offered their sons as sacrifices to the war lords and profiteers in the last war have still fresh in their minds what war means. To those who are not quite so familiar with this "glorious game of war," I wish to impress upon them what may be expected, if and when this administration succeeds in committing this Nation to another foreign war.

A bayonet driven through the body of a muscular boy is difficult to dislodge. It sometimes requires a shot to loosen the muscles or shatter the bones in which the bayonet is embedded, but such is the brutal technique of war. It is a highly specialized art to take a boy, tenderly nurtured from his birth, reared in an atmosphere of Christian love and transform him into a man of brutality and hate. There are boys whose individual minds break under the ghastly horrors of such a beastly program, as the pitiful mental victims of the last World War, now incarcerated in our hospitals, bear witness.

I was through several hospitals during the World War No. 1. The suffering I saw there is still etched upon my mind and heart. How can any man who has worked with and for fine young men erase from his memory the sight of torn and bleeding bodies and shattered minds. I saw long rows of legs, swung up by pulleys, with Dakin solution flowing over their lacerated flesh. Boys with arms or legs amputated. Others with eyes torn from their sockets, the flesh stripped to the bone from once handsome young faces. Some with severed spinal cords, destined, if kept alive, to suffer from paralysis. Yes; all this "to save democracy," or was it "a war to end wars"? Let the warmongers and war profiteers of World War No. 1 reply. I challenge the answer.

I recall a visit to the Millicent Dutchess of Sutherland Hospital, near Calais. Ambulances were arriving with men who had been gassed. They were taken into a large ward. These men had lain for hours and hours on the bullet-swept battlefields before they were picked up and carried back. Some of these fine lads, in their delirium of fever, were crying out the names of loved ones at home.

Can one forget what war means when you have seen boys with eyelids eaten away, the membrane of their lungs gone, tongues swollen, their young bodies racked with pain, and destined to live for only a short time on oxygen gas?

Must our young men again be called upon to go 3,000 miles to sacrifice their lives for the sordid plots and intrigues of inept leaders, foreign war lords, and profiteers? Is the American youth to be led to slaughter by the paid propaganda of those who would barter blood for financial profit or for those who see in such a course a path to greater personal and political power?

St. Paul's School Demonstration for Britain

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOSEPH CLARK BALDWIN
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 11, 1941

ADDRESS BY DOUGLAS W. FRANCHOT

Mr. BALDWIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by the president of the VI form, Douglas W. Franchot, St. Paul's School Demonstration for Britain, May 30, 1941:

Ladies and gentlemen, men of St. Paul's, I address you tonight in an humble endeavor to express some of the feelings and sentiments and convictions that the fellows of St. Paul's have gradually but surely during this past year of trial and grief and crisis come to hold as guiding and dominating beliefs upon which they shall base their futures.

In the first place, this collection and celebration mean a great deal to us because they signify something that we have been wanting for months to express—our belief, our trust, our concern for the British in their struggle. We have read about, talked about the magnificent British valor and morale. We have cheered when they succeeded, sympathized when they failed, but we ourselves have endured no hardship, fought no battle, feared no bombs. We have been surrounded with good food, restful, happy days, a safe and care-free life, which few in the world today are permitted to enjoy, and which we have earned in no sense of the word. By parading and singing tonight we have given tangible evidence and voice to our backing of England. We have done something to show how deeply we feel about her struggle and how firmly we stand behind her. We avow that we are prepared to fight and sacrifice in coming years for what she is fighting and sacrificing now, and we make that avowal with a united and sincere determination to serve gladly and well when in a few years we are called to the colors.

We are convinced, I believe, that our relation to America's future struggle at Britain's side and her present effort to deliver the goods is about this: First, the rising generation, of which we are members, is even now being trained and armed to meet the threat of oppression to the free peoples of the world—to stand up against not only the invasion of our country but, what is more important, the invasion of our principles of Christian and democratic fellowship by a creed of subservience and barbarity. We are almost certainly headed for the Army in the next few years to receive actual military training; but there is another kind of training that we have long experienced and which St. Paul's gives to all her sons—the training of mind and body that prepares us to be real Americans, that instills in us a pride and desire for freedom, that makes our minds strong and keen for independence—the training on the athletic field that gives us strong bodies and the spirit of comradeship, the love and respect for the right and fine things in life that our association here has given to us. This most important part of our training has been and always will be St. Paul's contribution, and will make us more fit and useful in years to come.

Secondly, we are the generation that has been called upon to bear graver responsibility than any preceding one, for we must meet the perils of a time that is to determine whether America goes down to slow and cowardly decay before the treacherous inroads of our enemy, or on to greater glory as a great nation standing for right and light in the world. If we falter, if we shirk our duty, if we put off our reckoning with our foe, we and all that our predecessors have fought and died for, all the progress and achievements that are America, will fall with us.

Thirdly, we are destined to bear the responsibility of restoring peace and order out of the chaos and confusion that will follow our victory in a war-torn world. We must avoid the mistakes that were made last time, that have resulted in another World War. This time we must make sure that Germany never again threatens our safety; we must build a new and better world in which to live, making sure that another generation will not have to shed its blood to insure a life of peace and happiness for its children.

Lastly, I believe that we realize, above all, that we must combat the effects of cynicism and defeatism within our own ranks, that we must unite and strive toward the restoration of peace and freedom for all mankind, with a religious conviction and enthusiasm.

Many of us this year, at one time or another, have felt disillusioned and somewhat embittered that we should be faced with such a future of uncertainty and struggle, that our predecessors had been unable to create a world in which right rules might, in which peace and brotherhood have been unable to subdue savagery and cruelty. In the face of the futility and hopelessness of a world such as this that has been passed on to us, we have been groping for a sense of balance, a footing from which to work, a goal and ambition toward which to consecrate our lives.

We have found that footing and that goal now that the success of Britain's battle for freedom has fallen directly upon our shoulders. We no longer are bewildered and lost; we are no longer hopeless, for in Britain's desperate call for help, in the unavoidable revelation that their fight is ours, too, that their survival means our survival and mankind's release from bondage, we have found our future course clear-cut and inescapable. We are sure now of our destiny; we are convinced of our right and our might; we are unafraid; we are united; we shall—we must—measure up. America, as surely as day follows night, is finding her soul again in her life-and-death struggle beside Britain for the very principles that brought us into being as a nation.

To succeed we must rid ourselves of cynicism; we must show courage and devotion; we must live every moment of our lives to the fullest in appreciation of our benefits and in sturdy cheerfulness. These demands embody the salvation of America, for these very qualities were before the crisis slipping from our character, being replaced by discord and selfishness. America to survive must be tough in fiber and clean in spirit. We are witnessing and entering into her rebirth.

Let us never forget through all the times of hardship and bitter struggle ahead that we are Americans at the toughest time, at the time when she depends on us to come through, to protect and defend her name and honor against German oppression. Let us never forget that we should be proud to answer her call, calm and cheerful in our future of sacrifice and trial in the knowledge that we are fighting for something supremely worth the blood, the sweat, and the tears, and that to succeed means that we shall have saved the world for the little fellows, have sustained love and fellowship against tyranny and fear, and that should we falter before the challenge, we could neither find life bearable beneath the yoke of oppression or find the brazenness to look each other in the eye as slaves.

Limitation on W. P. A. Administrative Expenses

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WRIGHT PATMAN

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 11, 1941

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, the committee recommends for the next fiscal year a total limitation on W. P. A. administrative expenses of $35,466,000. This compares with a limitation for this fiscal year of $44,500,000 and for the last fiscal year of $53,950,000. This would mean a cut of 20 percent next year on top of a 15-percent cut this year. If the committee's recommendation is approved the average number of administrative employees next year will be limited to 16,000, which is a reduction of over 5,000 from the average employed this year.

NUMBER NOW EXTREMELY SMALL

It is my belief that the administrative limitation of $39,690,000 recommended by the Bureau of the Budget should be adopted by the House. This will permit the employing of an average of 18,350 persons. When you analyze the functions these persons have to perform and the area they cover, this number does not seem excessive but appears to be extremely small.

TWENTY-THREE THOUSAND PROJECTS IN 3,000 COUNTIES, OR APPROXIMATELY 8 PER COUNTY

The W. P. A. is operating over 23,000 work projects in more than 3,000 counties throughout the country. It is responsible not only for seeing that all of the work is properly and efficiently carried out but also for carefully reviewing the eligibility of all the W. P. A. workers, checking to determine whether they violate any of the provisions of the act with respect to citizenship, membership in the Communist Party, or a Nazi bund, assigning each worker to his proper project in accordance with his capabilities, preparing pay rolls, keeping accounts, and carrying out a multitude of other functions.

AVERAGE OF TWO EMPLOYEES PER COUNTY

As an illustration, one-third, or approximately 6,000 of the administrative employees are in the Employment Division. This means an average of two employees per county. Since a number of these persons must be concentrated in large metropolitan areas to handle the work there, it means that outside of these areas the average is less than 1 person for each county. It is a marvel to me how any less than this number of persons could possibly be required to check on the eligibility of all W. P. A. workers, assign them to their projects, and enforce all the other provisions of the Relief Appropriation Act concerned with project employment. The Operations Division has about 3,000 employees, which means that outside of the metropolitan areas 1 man is required to cover 2 or 3 counties, to make arrangements with sponsors concerning new projects, and to see that all the work under way is being properly carried out. Similar situations exist in other divisions of the organization.

BASIC ADMINISTRATIVE FUNCTIONS NOT CHANGED

Although the reduction in the total appropriation for the W. P. A. will cause some decrease in the administrative work, the decrease will be very small in comparison to the total reduction in the appropriation since the area to be covered is about the same and the basic administrative functions do not change. If the limitation recommended by the committee is not changed, as I said on the floor of the House yesterday, the

W. P. A. is going to be forced to close a majority of its district offices and consolidate the work in the remaining offices. In the small States it is even going to be necessary to consolidate most of the work into regional offices. In an organization which is designed for the purpose of operating projects for needy people it is imperative that the officials running the organization be close to the people and close to the sponsors of the projects on which they are working. I can think of no more disastrous result for the W. P. A. than having its officials removed to some distant office where they cannot give sufficient attention to the local problems which are constantly arising in this program. The daily contacts between W. P. A. representatives and city and county officials concerning the operations of the projects are essential to the success of the whole program.

COMPLAINTS CANNOT BE ADJUSTED WITHOUT PERSONNEL

Likewise, it is necessary that a W. P. A. representative be available to the W. P. A. workers and other persons who are seeking work or have questions concerning their eligibility or complaints which they wish to make. This is very important to Members of Congress. It is inconceivable to me how the W. P. A. can give the services which these people are entitled to from a district or regional office hundreds of miles away.

ONLY ASKING FOR RAISE TO BUDGET FIGURES

It is poor economy for us to vote nearly a billion dollars to an agency and then to so limit its administrative cost that it cannot do an adequate job in seeing that the money is efficiently spent. To do the kind of a job that this House expects it to do, the W. P. A. must have a reasonable amount of administrative funds. The limitation on administrative funds should be fixed at the amount recommended by the Bureau of the Budget, which, I understand, conducted very thorough hearings concerning the W. P. A.'s administrative needs. The total limitation should be $39,690,000 with a sublimitation of $32,240,000 for salaries, $600,000 for communications, $3,600,000 for travel, and $400,000 for printing and binding. This amount of overhead compares very favorably with other Federal agencies and with private construction concerns.

PRINTING AND BINDING

The Bureau of the Budget recommended a limitation for printing and binding for next year of $400,000. This compares with a limitation this year of $320,000. Although this is an apparent increase it is not actually so. Practically all of the printing and binding expenditures are for operating forms. In June 1940, the W. P. A. had on hand a very large number of these forms amounting in value to more than $250,000. At the end of this June they will have less than $100,000 worth, which is as low as it is possible to be in view of the fact that forms must be ordered about 3 months in advance. Thus, by depleting its inventory the W. P. A. will actually have used during this year approximately $470,000 worth of forms. The limitation of $400,000 will permit them to use next year, therefore, approximately $70,000 less than this year.

Federal Works Agency, Work Projects Administration—Comparison of act limitation for the fiscal years 1940 and 1941 with the recommended act limitation for the fiscal year 1942

	Fiscal year		Recommended for fiscal year 1942
	1940	1941	Bureau of the Budget	House Appropriations Committee
Total	$53,950,000	$44,500,000	$39,690,000	$35,466,000
Personal services	44,700,000	37,100,000	32,240,000	29,016,000
Communications	725,000	600,000	600,000	500,000
Travel	4,575,000	3,600,000	3,600,000	2,800,000
Printing and binding	475,000	320,000	400,000	300,000

DISTRIBUTION BETWEEN ADMINISTRATIVE AND SUPERVISORY EMPLOYEES

After considerable study the W. P. A. has adopted a clear policy defining the functions of an administrative employee. This definition follows the lines generally accepted both in private and public construction work and is in many respects even more rigid than the practices of other Federal agencies.

Project supervisory employees are limited to foremen, timekeepers, and others who are in immediate charge of the work on the project.

The definition is, I am informed, being strictly enforced by the W. P. A. The fact that the administrative staff has already been drastically reduced may in some instances have resulted in increased project supervisory cost, not because administrative functions were being transferred to the projects but because the insufficiency of administrative employees resulted in some decrease in project efficiency and increased project overhead.

Amendment of the Sugar Act of 1937

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES J. HEFFERNAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 11, 1941

LETTER FROM JOHN CASHMORE, PRESIDENT OF THE BOROUGH OF BROOKLYN, NEW YORK, N. Y.

Mr. HEFFERNAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include therein a letter received from the Honorable John Cashmore, president of the Borough of Brooklyn, city of New York:

JUNE 9, 1941.

Hon. JAMES J. HEFFERNAN,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: On June 3 the Senate passed a bill, known as S. 937, which is a companion to the House bill H. R. 3582. If either of these bills is enacted into law, I assure you, it will be a serious blow to one of Brooklyn's important industries—the refining of sugar—and will create in addition much unemployment in the shipping, handling, storing, transportation, and selling of cane sugar, and also cause hardship to many who are otherwise dependent upon the welfare of these particular activities.

It is necessary to call your attention to the fact that Congress when, in 1937, it enacted into law the so-called Sugar Act, sought to stabilize the sugar-refining industry, which was then severely handicapped by excess production and disastrous competition, by setting up sales quotas for both cane- and beet-sugar growers, involving not only those of continental United States, its island possessions—Hawaii, Puerto Rico, and the Virgin Islands—but also the Philippine Islands, Cuba, and other foreign countries.

At the suggestion of the Secretary of State, Hon. Cordell Hull, there was embodied in the Sugar Act a provision that if the Philippine Islands for any reason were unable to fill their sugarcane quota the deficit in the quota should then be allocated to Latin American countries other than Cuba. This provision is in keeping with our good-neighbor policy, which was never so important as it is at the present time. To enact into law either of the two bills already referred to this country would thereby repudiate the 1937 assurances made to our sugar-producing neighbors in Latin America.

Both the Senate bill and the House bill now under consideration provide for the modification of the above-mentioned provisions by allocating all of the Philippine Islands deficit in their quota (excepting 75,000 tons) to the domestic sugar-producing areas, thereby upsetting the entire balance upon which the original act was based. In other words, the beet-sugar industry would expand at least 20 percent and there would be a serious curtailment, said to be $30,000,000, in our potential trade with Latin America.

Stripped entirely of all technicalities, these two bills have only one purpose in mind, and that is to expand employment and purchasing power, under subsidies, mark you, of the western beet-sugar States and to depress employment and purchasing power in New York and other seaboard States which trade in and handle raw cane sugar.

As these bills represent vicious sectional legislation they should be defeated with the active opposition of every Congressman from the East. Incidentally, I might add that practically all of the leading organizations in New York City are opposed to these measures.

Because of the foregoing facts, I earnestly request that you use your utmost influence in opposition to the passage of either bill, as it will materially reduce the overseas trade of Brooklyn and will be detrimental to the economic welfare of this borough.

Yours very truly,

JOHN CASHMORE.

Now He Calls It National Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT L. RODGERS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 11, 1941

EDITORIAL FROM THE ERIE (PA.) DAILY TIMES

Mr. RODGERS of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Erie (Pa.) Daily Times:

[From the Erie (Pa.) Daily Times of June 9, 1941]

NOW HE CALLS IT NATIONAL DEFENSE

In a message to Congress emphasizing particularly the need of more electrical power for national defense, President Roosevelt calls for speedy passage of the Mansfield bill, which would commit the United States to the St. Lawrence seaway and power project.

"The enemies of democracy are developing every hydroelectric resource and every waterway from Norway to the Dardanelles," says Mr. Roosevelt. "Are we to allow this continent to be outmatched because shortsighted interests oppose the development of one of our greatest resources?"

National defense is now the theme upon which Mr. Roosevelt dwells in connection with the St. Lawrence seaway scheme. He urged it on other grounds in 1932, 1934, and even in 1938. Yes, and he says that the seaway is needed to provide a haven for shipbuilding. But national defense would wait a long time if it had to depend on completion of the St. Lawrence seaway—5 to 7 years. And yards for the building of deep-sea ships would have to wait on the deepening of harbors and channels. Thousands of skilled men urgently needed now in defense production would be diverted to the St. Lawrence enterprise.

The administration represents that the cost of it would be about $275,000,000; but this is far short of the mark. Trustworthy engineers, who are as much concerned to promote national defense as any new dealer, estimate the final cost at $1,000,000,000. For large sums would have to be spent to make all harbors on the Great Lakes conform to seaway requirements. Senator WAGNER estimated the outlay for each of the larger ports at $25,000,000. That figure of $275,000,000, then, falls far short of being even a half-truth.

If Congress has a proper sense of responsibility, it will defeat the Mansfield bill as calculated not to promote national defense but to retard it. If the need of more power is urgent, the thing to do is to construct steam-electric plants, which would be serviceable in a relatively short time. Then Congress should move to dissociate power development on the St. Lawrence from the navigation scheme so that when skilled labor can be spared from defense production the work of harnessing the river can be put under way. This would be sound public policy. No consideration of national defense can possibly justify the course which the administration proposes.

Utility Converts Motorcar From Luxury to Necessity

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE A. DONDERO

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 11, 1941

STATEMENT OF NATIONAL AUTOMOBILE DEALERS ASSOCIATION

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I desire to have printed in the RECORD facts and figures showing the utility of the motorcar and its necessity both in industry and to the businessman in general as well as in national defense:

In the sixth study of its series to acquaint the public with the place of the motorcar in modern transportation and the necessity of continuing to supply cars in meeting the needs of the defense program, the National Automobile Dealers Association discusses the change of passenger car from a luxury to a utility. The change is explained as follows:

"As quaint as the vehicles themselves would be to us now are the terms used for the automobile back in the first World War days. It was then referred to as a machine or a pleasure car. Despite the all too frequent hardship of having to get out and get under, the automobile was bought almost solely for the purpose of giving the owner recreation or pleasure.

"What a change just a couple of decades have wrought. The old terms are extinct. The automobile is now a passenger car. Nothing has happened to diminish the pleasures of driving. On the contrary, they have multiplied. Dependability, comfort, speed, ease of handling, safety—all the attributes of an automobile have been immeasurably improved. The term "pleasure car" is far more fitting now than two decades ago, except for one thing—use. That alone changed the terminology.

"It wasn't long after the first World War that the public really put the passenger car to work. Demand grew. Volume of production increased. Prices came down. America geared its whole mode of living to a new and more efficient form of transportation—the private automobile. Now it is a necessity of the first order.

"Figures compiled by the United States Public Roads Administration, from 25 States, show that over 55 percent of the driving done in personal automobiles is for business purposes. For rural communities, approximately 64 percent of the mileage covered is on business, while for urban centers, it is 51 percent.

"Two decades ago, only 15 percent of all wage earners owned either automobile, motorcycle, or bicycle. Today, ownership of automobiles among industrial workers runs high, reaching 75 percent in some industries.

"In all other vocational groups, virtually all cars are used at least part of the time for utility purposes.

"In the United States, 2,130 cities with aggregate population of 11,844,124 have no local mass transportation, but depend on private cars, according to data compiled by the Automobile Manufacturers Association. These cities range in population from 2,500 to 50,000. The figures couple up with earlier findings that even in cities of the 500,000 population group, as many as 70 percent of the people entering the business sections on a typical day, do so by private automobile.

"This is only a small part of the evidence that can be marshaled to show the extent of present-day dependence on motor vehicles in this country. The situation contrasts sharply with that existing during the last World War. This country entered the year 1917 with only 3,297,996 passenger cars and 215,000 trucks, or a total of 3,512,996 motor vehicles. Preliminary figures for 1940 show 27,300,000 passenger cars and 4,650,000 trucks, or a total of 31,950,000 motor vehicles in use.

"In view of this, the efforts being made to restrict production and use of automobiles should be carefully studied, in order to prevent a serious disruption of our transportation system and endangering the success of the defense program."

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. OVERTON BROOKS

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 11, 1941

LETTER FROM GOV. SAM HOUSTON JONES OF LOUISIANA

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter received by me from the Governor of Louisiana:

STATE OF LOUISIANA,
EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
Baton Rouge, June 10, 1941.

Hon. OVERTON BROOKS,
Member of Congress, United States House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN BROOKS: Supplementing my letters of May 19 and May 29, I have read with considerable anxiety the Associated Press dispatch from Washington contained in the attached clipping from the New Orleans States of Monday, June 9, 1941. This reports, in effect, that the Appropriations Committee of the House of Representatives has approved an appropriation of $875,000,000 for W. P. A. operations during the fiscal year beginning July 1, of which $50,000,000 would be transferred to the food-stamp plan, resulting in a reduction of that amount under the sum requested by President Roosevelt.

I am sure you realize what this would mean to Louisiana. If it becomes necessary to reduce the W. P. A. rolls by 44 percent, as the attached article intimates, more than 12,000 heads of families—representing approximately 48,000 individuals—probably will be released by the Work Projects Administration in Louisiana during July. The State does not have the money to carry this additional relief burden. It is our duty—mine as Governor and yours as a Member of Congress—to see that adequate Federal funds are provided to meet any unemployment problem in our State.

Latest information at hand indicates that there are over 63,000 needy unemployed heads of families in Louisiana, including those presently assigned to W. P. A. jobs, those on the W. P. A. awaiting assignment roll, and an estimate of those who are not certified but who are in need of W. P. A. employment. On the basis of these facts I feel that the relief expenditures recommended by the Appropriations Committee of the House of Representatives are inadequate and, furthermore, that the President should be granted authority by the bill to expend the funds appropriated in less than the fiscal year, provided conditions justify.

Therefore, may I urge that you do everything in your power to see that Congress votes an appropriation commensurate with the relief needs of our State and Nation. Moreover, may I ask that you wage an active fight to eliminate those objectionable features of the present relief act which require a sponsor's contribution of at least 25 percent of the total cost of the W. P. A. program and the automatic release of all workers who have been employed continuously for 18 months.

Sincerely yours,

SAM H. JONES,
Governor of Louisiana.

Buffalo Council, Polish National Alliance, Pledge Support to the President in Present Emergency

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALFRED F. BEITER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 11, 1941

LETTER FROM COUNCIL NO. 19, POLISH NATIONAL ALLIANCE, BUFFALO, N. Y.

Mr. BEITER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following communication from Council No. 19, Polish National Alliance, Buffalo, N. Y., pledging the support of its 6,000 members to President Roosevelt in the present emergency:

GMINA NO. 19, ZW. NAR. POL.,
COUNCIL NO. 19, POLISH NATIONAL ALLIANCE,
Buffalo, N. Y., June 4, 1941.

Hon. Representative ALFRED BEITER,
United States House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. REPRESENTATIVE: The members of the Polish National Alliance in Buffalo (6,000 in number), in this hour of great peril, promise to support, and ask you also to support, President Roosevelt in any course he may deem wise to safeguard the liberty of the United States and the entire world.

Yours very truly,

MELANIA NESTEROWICZ,
Committee of the Press and Resolutions.
JOSEPH NOWAK, President.
STEPHANIA PRZEWOZNA,
Vice President.

Increase of Compensation of Postal Employees

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES J. HEFFERNAN
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 11, 1941

LETTER FROM COUNCILMAN WILLIAM M. McCARTHY, OF NEW YORK, N. Y.

Mr. HEFFERNAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include therein a letter from Councilman William M. McCarthy endorsing S. 220 and S. 24, which will provide increments for postal employees based on years of service:

JUNE 7, 1941.

Hon. JAMES J. HEFFERNAN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN HEFFERNAN: I am enclosing herewith résumé of resolutions introduced by me and passed by the council of New York City on Tuesday, June 3, 1941. In view of your interest in the welfare of the postal employees, I am sure that you will be glad to know of the support given them by our body.

RESOLUTIONS INTRODUCED BY COUNCILMAN WILLIAM M. M'CARTHY

"Whereas it is a commonly accepted American principle that for faithful service and conscientious performance of duty in any line of endeavor there should be commensurate remuneration; and

"Whereas that remuneration should be increased in the degree of the employee's value to this employer increases; and

"Whereas it is not conducive to the well-being of any individual to realize that at the end of 5 years he has already reached the maximum as far as salary is concerned; and

"Whereas there have been no salary increases for postal employees since 1925, the entrance salary for clerks and carriers being $1,700 per annum with annual increments until the maximum of $2,100 is reached; and

"Whereas the custodial employees of the Post Office average only $1,200 per annum; and

"Whereas there is now pending before the Congress of the United States the longevity bill introduced in the Senate by Senators MEAD (S. 220) and MCCARRAN (S. 24) and in the House of Representatives by Representative FLANNERY, which will provide increments for postal employees based on years of service; and

"Whereas this bill has been endorsed by the leading civil-service organizations of this city—the New York Post Office Clerks Association, Branch No. 1, U. N. A. P. O. C., the New York Letter Carriers Association, the Civil Service Forum, the Municipal Office Employees Council, No. 51, and the New York Post Office Supervisors Association: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That the council of the city of New York hereby respectfully memorialize the United States Senate and House of Representatives to enact this most worthy measure into law; and be it further

"Resolved, That copies of this resolution be transmitted to the Senate of the United States and the House of Representatives."

Passed by the council on Tuesday, June 3, 1941.

Strikes in Defense Industries

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALBERT GORE
OF TENNESSEE
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 11, 1941

LETTER FROM P. J. ANDERSON, OF GAINSBORO, TENN.

Mr. GORE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter:

ANDERSON & ANDERSON,
Gainesboro, Tenn., June 4, 1941.

Hon. ALBERT GORE,
Member of Congress, Washington, D. C.

DEAR ALBERT: Just a line to let you hear from the home front.

We are getting more than fed up with strikes which interfere with the defense program.

People here, and especially those who have sons who have left good paying positions to serve in training at $21 per month, say that it is a disgrace for the Government to commandeer the service of youth at $21 per month and then permit their work to be hamstrung by these strikes or any other interference.

For some reason unknown to me, but apparent to the ordinary observer, one is impressed with the fact that Hitler, almost at will and whenever he desires to do so, can take over another of the democracies in less time than we can determine on a course of action. The delays which have been permitted, regardless of the attaching blame, are enough to make one ill when he contemplates the dire need of Britain for those things which a determined drastic course of action would have assured them long since. In times of stress why wait until our friends are defeated before we aid them? If we intend to give all-out aid why is it not forthcoming? Why ask unheard of sacrifices by our people and multiplied billions, and then set back and permit a handful of malcontents to sabotage the whole thing?

I have given three sons to the service and am proud I can do something for our country, which I think worth fighting for, but I'll be darned if it doesn't irk me to madness at some of the things which happen and nothing done about it, or if anything is attempted it is of the milksop order, when a fist of iron should be felt where it will do the most good. Sometimes it looks as if our leaders are the last to realize what is occurring although everybody else knows all about it. Dallying with those who seek to delay our program is like temporizing with Hitler. I say to hell with such foolishness, and let's strike while the striking will do some good. The puny efforts which have been made to furnish planes to Britain compared with what could and should have been accomplished is little short of criminal, in my opinion.

I hope you will take off your coat, roll up your sleeves, and raise more hell about all this than the bone-dry law.

With best wishes for your continued health and success I am

Your friend,

P. J. ANDERSON.

Give Us An Air Force

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALFRED F. BEITER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 11, 1941

EDITORIAL FROM NEWSDAY

Mr. BEITER. Mr. Speaker, I ask the privilege of inserting in today's RECORD an editorial from Newsday, under date of June 5, 1941, on the subject "Give Us An Air Force."

This pertains to a United States air force under a Cabinet head with better and more equipment than any combination of powers that threaten our security.

Nearly every aviation authority in this country has advocated an independent air force for the United States, but we are still waiting for it. This is a crying need of aviation which America needs today.

The article follows:

[From Newsday of June 5, 1941]

GIVE US AN AIR FORCE

Early last January in this column we said: "Hitler tells the world that his air force will do a turn in the Mediterranean most any time now." The trick has been turned. Air power has accomplished what our military authorities in this country have persistently said was impossible. An island country has been occupied by air force alone and in the face of the opposition of a powerful fleet in complete control of the sea.

How much longer, Mr. President and the Seventy-seventh Congress, are we to defend ourselves without a United States air force? We have a splendidly officered and manned United States Air Corps as an auxiliary to our Army. We have a naval air force second to none in the world as an auxiliary to our Navy. These auxiliaries are essential to our Army and Navy and should be reinforced to any extent that the higher commands of these two services consider necessary. These auxiliaries should be, as they are now, under the tactical control of the Army and Navy.

Under the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics we also have unsurpassed aeronautical research facilities and laboratories.

However, in addition, we should have a United States air force under a Cabinet head, with a larger personnel and with better and more equipment than that of any combination of powers that threaten our security. Germany has such a separate air force and so has Great Britain. We have not such an air force because the higher commands of our Army and Navy have opposed it. The country of the Wright brothers, the country that created the dive bomber and the country that does more commercial flying than all the rest of the world put together, has not an air force.

The higher commands of the Army and Navy who lacked the vision to foresee how air power in German hands could destroy European civilization still exercise the influence to deny us an air force. This influence should be removed by the President and the Congress.

The airplane is continuing development so fast that aircraft types that are put on the drawing boards today will be obsolete on the drawing boards by the time the planes are put in production anywhere from 18 months to 3 years from now. Only a United States air force dominated by airmen can have the training and vision necessary to project an air force for the future second to none in the world.

The higher commands of the Army and Navy in making their requests for money appropriations to Congress can only consider aviation as an auxiliary to each of their respective services. If the appropriation for aviation is large, some other arm of either the Army or the Navy may suffer. Faced with that problem plus the lack of imagination that earth-bound generals and sea-borne admirals have demonstrated, air power in America will follow, not lead, that of Hitler's air-trained reichsmarshal.

The United States is not traditionally a military power, but it is potentially the greatest air power in the world. There is some doubt whether we can quickly become a great military power. There is little doubt that we can become the greatest air power in the world in a comparatively short time. There is also little doubt that if our air power is subordinated to our military and naval high commands, it may be too late before we achieve that air supremacy necessary for our defense to say nothing of the defense of this hemisphere.

History of the State of Delaware

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PHILIP A. TRAYNOR

OF DELAWARE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 11, 1941

ADDRESS OF HON. PHILIP A. TRAYNOR, OF DELAWARE

Mr. TRAYNOR. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following speech delivered by me on Parade of States program, Station WINX, Tuesday, June 10, 1941:

In the short time assigned me on this program, I can no more than touch on a few of the high spots of the history of the State of Delaware.

The name is derived from Lord De La Warr, whom the English claimed had discovered the Delaware Bay and River in a voyage to Virginia in 1610. Probably the bay and river were really first discovered by Henry Hudson while in the service of the Dutch East Indian Company in 1619.

It is established that the first settlement was made by a Hollander named De Bries in 1630 at Zwaanendael—the dale of Swans—near Lewes. The settlement having been destroyed by Indians, further settlement was abandoned until the year 1638, when the Swedes landed at what is called The Rocks, near Wilmington, and built Fort Christina. This, however, was not without protest from the Dutch, who later drove the Swedes out and took possession. In the meantime and afterward, Lord Baltimore, who obtained his grant of Maryland, was laying claim to the territory on the south of Delaware Bay and River. In 1664 the Dutch surrendered to the English, and in 1681 it was granted to William Penn.

I have not time to dwell upon the changes of ownership and the historic dispute between the Pennsylvania and Maryland proprietors and its settlement by the so-called Mason and Dixon line, a part of which was the famous Mason and Dixon line of Civil War history and is of more than local interest. It is to be noted that Delaware was settled by the Swedes, Finns, Dutch, and English. The three counties which constitute the State of Delaware are New Castle, Kent, and Sussex. The largest city in Delaware is Wilmington, located in the northern part of the State, in New Castle County. Its capital is Dover, in Kent County, and its statehouse is the second oldest in America.

The blue hen's chickens, which Delaware people are sometimes called, as derived from the fact that when the first Delaware regiment of the Revolutionary War went to join Washington's forces, Capt. Johnathan Caldwell, of Kent County, took with him some game chickens of a brood of a blue hen, famous in that county. History states that this Delaware regiment was the most efficient in the Continental Army; seeing fighting in most of the battles from New York to South Carolina, and losing about two-thirds of its officers. Judging from the fame of the blue hen's chickens, Captain Caldwell's fighting cocks lived up to the regiment's reputation. As a result of this, the blue hen's fighting cock has become the official bird of the State of Delaware. The State's motto is "Liberty and independence" and the State flower is the peach blossom.

The famous ride of Caesar Rodney from Dover to Philadelphia in order to break the tie in the Delaware delegation and cast the Delaware vote for independence has not yet received its full share in history and verse. The blue-hen State is the first State in the Union. This distinction comes from the fact that it was the first State to ratify the Constitution of the United States.

Delaware is a small State in territory, 1,978 square miles, land area; population, 266,505; but a great State in achievement. It is often referred to as the diamond State. While Delaware as a State is predominantly agricultural, the enormous relative magnitude of its one great city, Wilmington, and the industries concentrated around it, makes the northern end a very important manufacturing section. The first iron sailing vessel in the country was built in 1854 in Wilmington, which had previously been noted for building wooden ships; and that city has built iron and steel steamers of greater number and aggregate tonnage than any other single port in the United States. Pumping and mining apparatus and paper-making machinery and car wheels are famous specialities; in 1817 the first endless-sheet paper machine was set up in Wilmington, revolutionizing the business. Its manufactures of steam and street cars, machine tools, engines, boilers, etc., are known all over the globe. Next to iron and steel comes the dressing and manufacture of leather, in which Delaware takes a high rank. Wilmington has several of the largest morocco plants in the world. The vulcanized-fiber industries had its origin in the State, and about seven-eighths of the world's output is made there. It is said that the waters of Delaware, like those of Ireland for linen, are peculiarly adapted to the manufacture of that product. The canning industry throughout the whole State is very large. Delaware is the second State in tomato packing.

Wilmington is the ninth port in United States of America import tonnage. New Castle, one of the old historical cities in the State, is the home of the Bellanca Aircraft Corporation, builders of the well-known Bel-lanca airplanes. A short distance outside of Wilmington is located the DuPont Flying Field, which is considered to be one of the finest and largest private fields in the country.

Also noted for its excellent roads, many visitors have proclaimed its system of highways to be among the finest in the Nation. It carries the reputation of having the best educational system in the United States. The University of Delaware, at Newark, a land-grant college, is in its one hundred and fifth academic year Founded as an academy in 1743, chartered as a college in 1833, it was incorporated as a university in 1921. Courses at the university include agriculture, engineering, education, arts, and sciences.

Sportsmen, migrating like ducks, travel hundreds of miles to the vast nesting and feeding areas along Delaware's eastern boundary. Highways are happy ways when they lead into the broad fields of outdoor sports of fishing, hunting, horseback riding, picnicking, swimming, and golf.

Most of the eastern boundary is situated along the Delaware River, Bay, and the Atlantic Ocean. At the lower end of the State in Sussex County is located Rehoboth Beach, which is considered one of the finest resorts along the Atlantic coast.

Delaware's main industries are agriculture, dairying, canning of fruits and vegetables, manufacture of iron and steel, machinery, railroad cars, explosives, dental supplies, meat packing, tanning, shipbuilding, and poultry.

Along with the other States, Delaware is playing a vital part in the national-defense plan. Some of the larger firms are manufacturing chemicals, powders, ammunitions, and small firearms; others are engaged in building various types of ships for our Navy.

I think I may close by saying that in no State in the Union can be found a better climate, kinder soil, better roads, better schools, or a happier and more prosperous and patriotic people. I pray that a kind Providence may preserve it and keep its people worthy of its glorious history.

United States News Pays Sterling Tribute to Integrity and Patriotism of the American Farmer

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KARL E. MUNDT

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 11, 1941

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Speaker, in the June 13 issue of the United States News, page 44, this authoritative magazine, which is in position to know the facts, pays a sterling tribute to the integrity and patriotism of the American farmer by revealing how efforts of the Secretary of Agriculture to use his Department as a sounding board to create war hysteria among the farmers of America and to lure them into the interventionist camp by an appeal to their pocketbooks proved to be a complete and colossal dud.

This item from the United States News demonstrates once again the fact that there are no more patriotic, loyal, and straight-thinking citizens in America than its farmers and small-town dwellers. Other groups in this country can well follow their example in rising above pocketbook motives in formulating conclusions on foreign policy and in following the patriotic policy demonstrated by the farmers of America in assaying all proposals in light of the best answers to the question, "What is best for America?"

[From the United States News of June 13, 1941]

AMERICAN FARMERS ARE NOT FOR SALE

The effort to sell the idea of United States war intervention to farmers through A. A. A. committees backfired so strongly that officials were forced to deny its sponsorship.

Americanism Must Be Saved by Youth

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LEONARD W. HALL

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 11, 1941

ADDRESS OF HON. JOSEPH W. MARTIN, JR., OF MASSACHUSETTS

Mr. LEONARD W. HALL. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address of Hon. JOSEPH W. MARTIN, Jr., minority leader of the House of Representatives and chairman of the Republican National Committee, before the forum of the Association of New York State Young Republican Clubs, at Glens Falls, N. Y., Friday, June 6, 1941:

There is always something inspiring in a gathering of eager, earnest, patriotic, young Republicans. It is a genuine pleasure for me to come to Glenn Falls, in this great State of New York, to attend such a conclave.

As we gather here today, our Nation faces perhaps the most perilous time of its existence. Gigantic tasks and vast responsibilities confront us.

The American people must once again defend their rights and liberties. This is strikingly revealed by the demand of the administration this week for the so-called commandeering bill introduced by Senator REYNOLDS, in conformity with a War Department request.

Here is a bill giving more power to the Executive than was asked to fight—with arms—and win the first World War. Think of it! The administration wants the power to take the watch out of your pocket; or the small savings account you have accumulated through years of thrift and toil. It wants the power to seize your newspaper, your business, your home, or your farm, and sell it to whomsoever it desires. It wants the power to take your property, real or personal, at any price the President fixes, and to sell it to whomsoever he may choose, at any price he pleases. It wants the power to thus take your property to sell, destroy, or to hold and operate for all time.

If this bill should pass the Congress, America would not only have to worry about dictatorships in other nations. It would be in operation here in America.

The mighty voice of the Nation must be raised in opposition to this proposal.

If the President needs some special power for defense, let him be specific. No Executive has ever had a more cooperative Congress than the present one.

The Chief Executive now has plenty of power to break any jam in defense production if he desires to do so.

There is no need or excuse for this demand for super constitutional powers.

A great responsibility rests upon you young people. I find it in my heart to thank God for the tremendous power of right action inherent in the ranks of the millions of earnest and able young people like you here today. You have youth. You have energy. You have vitality. You have understanding. You have vision. And, above all, you have freedom of speech and liberty of action. You can dare to do right without fear of a tyrant's anger or the lash of a despot's whip. You do not have to fear a concentration camp or a sudden knock on your door in the dead of night and a quick trip into oblivion. This is the America of today. It is the America we shall maintain.

One of the first things I want to tell you is your country is not at war yet. The declaration of an unlimited emergency has not changed things as much as some believe. It has not curtailed your right to speak. It has not brought about any abatement of the Bill of Rights. It has not set aside our forms and procedures under constitutional government.

America stands today in a world torn by hatreds, suspicions, and fears. The results of these hatreds and suspicions and fears are bloody war. Smoking ruins and mangled men, women, and children mark the path of those hatreds and fears in Europe and the Orient. Over there, civil rights, all personal liberties, all individual freedom have gone by the board. Men, women, and children are the driven, suffering slaves of despots who are themselves the driven slaves of their own insatiable lust for power and earthly glory. Only ruin, destruction, death, and disgrace can finally end such mad careers. We pray to God America may avoid all of these things.

Here in America we are faced by two sets of problems. All of them will be certain to affect your future, as young people, very drastically.

Some of these most dangerous problems are our internal ones. A national debt of incomprehensible magniture grows greater daily and is headed for a figure the size of which none of us can now even imagine.

We must put an end in this great national crisis to industrial warfare. Labor and industry must have real vision and be unselfish enough to put first the welfare and security of their country. It would do no one any good to win some temporary advantage and then lose all because we have failed to achieve an adequate defense.

Labor and industry both have rights. For the good of the country, it is to be hoped each will respect the rights of the other, and that both will respect the rights and security of the general public.

The rank and file—by far the very great majority—of all the wage earners of America are loyal, earnest, patriotic men and women who love their country and their fellow men. Make no mistake about that. Under sincere, unselfish, and patriotic leadership American workers will respond to the call of their country with an enthusiasm, with an eagerness, and with an efficiency which will astound the world. American working men and women want peace. They want to live and love and work without turmoil, without rancor, without envy of their fellows. They want progress for their children. They are the most intelligent, enlightened, honest, sincere, and capable workers in the world. The moment the false leadership is exposed and rooted out, those workers will be the salvation of America.

Only an exceedingly small percentage of businessmen and managers of industry would think of profiteering on their fellow citizens in this grave hour. The very great majority of the business men and women of this Nation are just as patriotic, just as eager to serve their country, just as sincere, just as honest, just as enlightened, and just as efficient as the wage earners or any other group of citizens to be found in the land. What the financiers and managers of business and industry need is to be treated and consulted as honorable, patriotic, and efficient citizens instead of as suspicious characters, criminals, or traitors to the Nation. In these times, when no man can know what the future may bring forth, we are all vitally interested in preserving the security of our Nation and our people. We are all vitally concerned in preserving and perpetuating our American way of government and of life. To do that we must now prove the efficiency and the superiority of our American way of government and of life. That calls for unity—true unity. Unity of spirit is as necessary as unity of action. Unity of action may for a time be compelled by despots driving their peoples with lashes and bayonets. Such unity and its works vanish the moment any sign of weakness appears in the authority or the control of such despots. The works of such a compelled concert of action fall like a house of cards at the first wind of adversity or defeat. Unity of spirit can be achieved only by leaders who are honest, sincere, and unselfish, who are seeking the real good of their country and their people.

We in America must have unity of spirit. We must have the unity of action, springing from a dauntless unity of spirit and purpose. We must have leadership which wants to perpetuate a government of, by, and for the people, with the power residing in the people. We must have leadership which will select able men of proved experience to direct our defense efforts and our aid to other nations. Radical theorists, inexperienced dreamers, and self-seeking bureaucrats cannot do the job properly or safely.

There are some people in our country who want to change our form of government into communism. Those who want communism should go to Russia. They will find plenty of what they call communism there. And they will find it to be bloody dictatorship. But these Communists do not want to go to Russia, where they assert communism works so well. They want to produce chaos and ruin in this Nation, they want to tear down our form of government, and our mode of life. Why? Because in the ruins of a magnificent nation, and in the hopelessness and despair of a magnificent people, they expect to find a chance to take over control and be dictators. The only communism these Communists want is a communism of power shared between a few of their own leaders.

There are other purveyors and proponents of alien doctrine. They are the Fascists. If they want to live under fascism, let them go to those foreign countries where they will find plenty of fascism. And if they do, they will find their fascism is bloody despotism and slavery. But these Fascists do not want to go to Europe. They want to overturn our free constitutional Government and produce economic ruin. In that ruin, and the despair of our people, they hope to find their opportunity to take over control and to rule.

We must be ready to oppose to our last drop of blood any effort to destroy our American form of government or our American way of life, whether that effort spring from enemies over the seas, or from designing enemies of free government here at home. Any enemy of American freedom, of the Constitution, of the Bill of Rights, is an enemy to be guarded against and defeated, no matter what his nationality may be, or where he may have been born.

We face rising taxation which inevitably will retard the progress of business and industry. Those taxes will bear heavily on the young people of America who are just coming into their trusteeship of this great, rich Nation. They—and all of us—must help to pay for the waste, the squandering, the inefficiency, and the corruption as well as for the legitimate and necessary expenditures.

American agriculture faces many problems. Some of them are new and result from pressures of the war hysteria and the frenzied efforts to build a national defense. America must have a prosperous and independent agriculture. American farmers must be able to have something beside toil and sacrifice.

Free enterprise, equality of opportunity, the rights of property, as well as the rights of labor must be protected.

Above all else, we must preserve the American system of biparty government. That task is largely yours, as young Republicans. I said on another occasion it is the job of the minority party to police and audit the administration. It is a vital part of our American system of free government for the minority party to function as the constructive critic, as the watchful force, to police and audit the majority.

Whenever any administration can silence criticism, crush opposition, and refuse to be accountable to the minority and the people for its acts, free government in the United States is dead and the American way is done. Even in war-torn Britain they respect the rights and the necessity of constructive criticism.

Unity we must have. We must build, and build quickly, a national defense adequate to protect us against any threat of aggression from any source whatever. But unity does not mean blind, unquestioning submission to the dictates of any political bureaucracy or oligarchy. Unity means intelligent cooperation. We Republicans have proved by our acts and our votes, in Congress and out, we are at all times fully ready to cooperate intelligently. We are just as determined upon an adequate national defense as any class of citizens in this Nation. We do not concede any political group, or clique, or bureaucracy, or oligarchy has a monopoly of patriotism. We do not concede any such group has any corner on America. This Nation is the Nation of all of us. The rights and the privileges, and the opportunities, and the freedoms, belong to all of us.

Now, as to problems presented by affairs abroad. Unquestionably events now taking place will have a profound effect upon our domestic economy. We must prepare to weather an economic storm after the wars have exhausted the nations of the world. That economic cyclone will make the financial hurricane of the last 10 years seem like a summer breeze. The great test of American courage, and resourcefulness, and self-reliance will come after the wars are ended.

Our first job—your first job—is to look out for America first. Let us preserve and make practical and workable the democracy at home which we want other peoples to have. Keep the flag of freedom flying at the masthead here at home so other peoples may know that freedom works. Keep the Constitution sacred here at home so there will be a Constitution for others to copy. Keep the American way of government, of life, and of liberty alive and effective here at home so they will live for peoples in other parts of the world to emulate.

If our American system of free government, the biparty system, the Constitution, go down in this Nation—even for a little time—the hope of the world is gone.

As I look out over this magnificent gathering of American youth, I realize with gratitude that Americanism will live. I realize the vast power inherent in your determination to keep the ideals of the American way vibrant and efficient. You can do it, and you will do it.

I honestly, earnestly believe in my heart the best interests of this Nation require the election of a Republican House of Representatives in 1942. And I honestly believe in my heart we will take control of the House of Representatives in 1942. The whole tendency of any overwhelmingly dominant majority too-long continued in power is to become arrogant and intolerant.

Now, my young fellow citizens, these are not political platitudes I am repeating to you. I am trying to tell you, and the rest of the youth of America, of all races, of all political faiths, that your future is menaced. The future of you and yours is at stake. Influences are at work to destroy the freedom, the liberties, the equality of opportunity which are yours, and which you must now fight to keep. Pressures, hidden pressures, are at work to impose alien doctrines and alien forms, social, political, and economic, on our Nation.

But our task—your task—is to safeguard by vigilance and courage the traditions of our American way and the foundations of our constitutional Government.

You will unite, of course, with the rest of the citizens in giving of your best to aid in building the national defense.

We will be alert, vigilant day and night, against any foreign menace, either military or economic. This is the part of prudence and the requirement of security. But while we are so doing we will not neglect to be alert and vigilant to internal dangers which could just as surely destroy us as foreign enemies might seek to do.

As national chairman I am fully cognizant of the contribution you can make to the future of the Republican Party. I have appointed a special committee to study plans for complete cooperation and for the foundation of a forward-looking program. I must have your support if we are to win the great battle for America.

Youth has the courage and the stamina to do the job of organization we must have. So go back to your home precincts. Enlist under your district leaders. Organize, organize, I repeat, organize down to the last voter, and we will have an unbeatable organization. Much depends on you. Do not fail us.

You are the young, fresh, powerful, energetic forces of Americanism in the Republican Party. You will do your duty and you will do it intelligently. I am willing to trust the future of America to your hands.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BARTEL J. JONKMAN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 11, 1941

ADDRESS BY HON. ELBERN PARSONS, OF HOLLAND, MICH.

Mr. JONKMAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following speech of Hon. Elbern Parsons, of Holland, Mich., made in connection with

Memorial Day ceremonies held at that city on May 30, 1941:

Mr. Mayor, members of the various patriotic organizations, fellow citizens, I think we may be justified if, after a formal recognition of the indebtedness which we in the present owe to the patriotic sacrifices made by those in whose honor we are here assembled, we proceed at once to consider the present and the future in the light of events transpiring since last we were assembled here in this same capacity and for the same purpose.

These honored dead have left to us a heritage of freedom under law. To decorate their graves with flowers while giving no consideration to the perils which today menace that freedom would be but poor homage indeed, unworthy both of them and us.

In 1917 and 1918, I found myself among the number garbed in the uniform of a soldier of the United States, engaged with some 2,000,000 or more others of my fellow citizens in what we were told was a war to make the world safe for democracy. As a part of the mechanics involved in that process and in the accomplishment of that program, this Nation, by the victory of its armed forces on sea, on land, and in the air, gave to its Allies in that war, and notably to the British Empire and the French Republic, a military victory over the German Nation and its allies, which, in effect, delivered the German Nation in particular into the hands of France and England, disarmed and helpless and bound in the end by the terms of a treaty which gave those victors the right to maintain that condition of disarmament and military impotence for many years to come. We made no profits out of that war. Our Government deemed it vital to our own safety to destroy, or at least defeat, the armed might of German militarism. Our people paid—are still paying—the price for the attainment of that end. And today, in the face of the demand for new and perhaps greater sacrifice, we have a right, and it is our duty, to pause and consider what in the past little more than 20 years has become of the fruits of that victory. Certainly, the world did not for long remain safe for democracy, however safe we may have thought we made it. As we look back over the events of the last few years and consider the position of national emergency proclaimed to exist today, we did not even make the world safe for ourselves, to say naught of others and nothing of democracy. It is a fair conclusion, in the light of events, to say that the statesmen of Europe, to whose unworthy hands the destinies of their respective nations were committed, have by their incompetence, blindness, greed, and criminal stupidity permitted the security and the liberty which we helped to win for them to slip from their palsied grasp, with the result, as now appears, that all must be rewon, at the cost of tears, of treasure, and of human life as well. Certainly no nations ever had a better chance, by the exercise of naught but common prudence, to prevent the present world disaster than did France and England after the complete triumph of their cause in 1918. Yet they sat idly by and watched an egomaniac, in violation of the treaty they had made, rearm and remilitarize the German Nation, all the while having proclaimed in a book he wrote his plans for revenge and conquest. For years he openly prepared for the present conflict. There was once a time during this long period when, motivated by nothing more statesmanlike than realistic self-interest, England and France, or one of them alone, could, all within their rights under international law, have put a stop to the whole deadly business. They, and not we, must answer to the verdict of history for their failure to do so.

Of course, all this does not change the fact that once again we are being told, after the lapse of less than a quarter century, that victory of the British Empire over Nazi Germany, in the war now waging overseas, is vital, indispensable to our own national safety. Perhaps it is. However, as a veteran of the last war, with a son of military age for this one, I must say this doctrine is dreadfully reminiscent of that day in 1918, when, like a host of other American young men in uniform, I said good-bye to the woman I loved, to sail away for a European battlefield. That war when it began was a foreign war like this one is. I was but one in hundreds of thousands, and we made light of it as we saw the shores of the United States of America grow dim and fade, but we weren't kidding anybody. And while I have been advised against saying anything like this next remark, thank God I still can say it, I am not going to be satisfied, I am quite sure you are not going to be satisfied, and the people of the United States have no business to be satisfied, and the hour of the end of our own democracy has struck, if our leadership, our Government, is to accept for us and in our name, and commit this Nation, to a program that calls for us to fight a European war every 25 years or less to save either the British Empire or the French Republic from the loss of a war with the German nation. We have a right as a great people to demand, and unless we do demand and enforce it, the hour of our doom has struck; that at the end of the road on which our Government has set our feet, where Hitlerism is to be blasted from the earth, from the sea, and from the air, its seeds shall be destroyed, not merely scattered. If the German nation, as now on the face of things appears, cannot be trusted to keep the peace, then its complete and permanent disarmament and if need be dismemberment and extinction as a nation must be permanently accomplished and kept accomplished. And there must be no more presentation to England and France of a victory served as it were on a platter of American gold, garnished with hundreds of thousands of American dead. They are, I fear, wholly incompetent to make any intelligent use of such a sacrifice. We must demand of our leadership, of our Government, if you please, efficient steps, not only for the defeat of Hitlerism, now that we seem to be committed to its defeat, but to put into effect those measures necessary to end for all time this business of periodic European rescue expeditions. We cannot survive as a nation of free men and women, if indeed we can survive as a nation at all, if we must pay the price of a victory over a rearmed Germany, or over any other organization of pirates, brigands, and murderers, every few years.

You remember the Neutrality Act, aid short of war, the lend-lease bill, all logically leading up to our present position, whatever that is. Whether those who insist that we must, for self-preservation, carry on our present undeclared war on Germany, to save England in order to save ourselves, or whether we should confine our efforts to an all-out program to arm the United States, is a question that may never be answered since the adoption of one alternative precludes proof of what would have happened had we adopted the other. That we are in great national peril is an accomplished and generally accepted fact. As to just what the greatest peril is is a matter of some difference of opinion. The orators are discussing it. And you might, if you have not already done so, with profit read this week's editorial in the Saturday Evening Post. This is not the day nor the occasion for me to elaborate on these great national questions, on which hang perhaps the future of the world. We must, I believe, with all speed, proceed to arm ourselves to the teeth. We cannot hope to defend ourselves against pagan outlaws by mere expressions of our disapproval. And so from this day forth, for a time not now predictable, it is and must be the duty of us all to contribute to the limit of our capacity and opportunity to the national program of defense, placing all selfish desires, motives, and interests in subordination to our supreme duty to this Republic. But we shall do this as free men and women and not as slaves. And, let us here and now resolve to demand of our Government and its responsible officials that they plan surely and well, and take us into their confidence, and in due time enforce and establish all those measures necessary to preserve the fruits of victory, over our present peril, which by this loyal sacrifice we shall attain. We know that we cannot depend upon European statesmanship, so-called, for long, to act intelligently for the protection of the safety of world peace. If, as asserted, the only thing we need to fear is fear, it may, I trust, still be said that there are some things besides fear we have a right to be concerned about. One of them is the plans of world leadership, including our own, for the reorganization of the post-war world. Now, and in the days ahead, eternal vigilance continues to be the price of liberty.

And now, my comrades and fellow citizens, let us go hence from this place of hallowed memories, sanctified by previous association with many who in happier days have joined with us in other beautiful ceremonies, and then preceded us into the great beyond, highly resolved that no part of the priceless heritage of liberty they left to us shall be lost because of our neglect to do our full duty even as they did theirs. And let us pray that in the difficult days ahead, we shall all be guided in all our public conduct, and in the opinions we form and express, not by hysterical propaganda, but by reason and common sense.

Ability-to-Pay Tax Factor as Applied to Gasoline

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS F. FORD

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 11, 1941

Mr. THOMAS F. FORD. Mr. Speaker, in this critical period, when billions are to be poured out to strengthen our national defense, it becomes imperative that additional taxes be levied to meet the National Treasury's needs.

It is true that no industry wants its product taxed, but we all realize that the money must be raised.

Ability to pay, not ease of collection, should be the guiding principle.

Those who hold the responsibility of formulating the tax policy of the Federal Government could profit by the excellent example set by officials who are guiding the Federal housing program.

Near San Diego, the Government is building the biggest governmental housing project in America. Planned to contain 3,000 homes, the project will provide adequate housing for the men engaged in defense work at huge aircraft factories in the area, and their families. This new city has many interesting and novel features. But the most revolutionary and beneficial of its innovations is the method which has been devised for assessing rentals.

Neither the size of the house, its location, nor its design, will have anything to do with the rent which must be paid to occupy it. Instead, the rental scale will be geared only to the wages which the occupant receives. For example, a worker who earns from $16 to $20 a week will rent a house for $14 a month, regardless of how many bedrooms the house contains. The same house will cost $50 each month to the fellow who receives wages amounting to more than $60 per week.

CONSIDERS ABILITY TO PAY

Here, in public housing, is complete consideration of the ability-to-pay factor—and the United States today would possess a far more equitable system of taxation if the same ability-to-pay factor had been given equal consideration in this respect.

As a matter of fact, if the ability-to-pay factor had been accorded its just importance, it is probable that the Federal gasoline tax never would have been levied.

Studies by the Federal Government itself disclose that the average motor-vehicle owner earns between $20 and $30 weekly. Experts point out that about one-quarter of all gasoline-consuming vehicles are owned on farms, and, most certainly, no person seriously will contend that the meager income enjoyed by farmers can be stretched to support a heavy tax bill. Truckers, traveling salesmen, workers who must use their cars to get to and from work—and all other classes of citizens who use their vehicles in connection with earning their daily bread or to haul the family to church—almost invariably are found to be persons of modest income.

GASOLINE-TAXPAYERS' ABILITY VIOLATED

The compelling reason for the construction of the San Diego project was, of course, to remedy the deplorable lack of housing which is typical in areas of expanding defense industries. In order to keep their families under a roof, many workers in the San Diego plants were being forced to drive up to 80 miles to get from their homes to the job and back again.

The worker's 80-mile drive to the plant provides a splendid example of how the gasoline tax violates the ability-to-pay principle. The California State tax of 3 cents per gallon—which is considerably lower than the national average—costs this worker about $66 in the course of a 300-day working year on his trips to his job alone. The 1½-cent Federal gasoline levy adds another $33 annually to this cost, which totals about $100. Thus, if this commuting worker is in the $16 to $20 weekly earnings bracket, and moves into the new Government housing project, he will save enough in annual gasoline taxes to pay his rent for 7 months. It is difficult to imagine any worker failing to make the move under these circumstances.

Now, the State gasoline tax, severe penalty though it is, partially may be justified on the grounds that the revenue therefrom is expended for the highways which the worker uses. Nevertheless, the tax obviously costs this worker far more than would a tax payment warranted by his small income.

But no justification can be found for the Federal gasoline tax, which is not a road tax, but is levied solely to provide revenue to finance the general functions of government, and which, like the State tax, bears no relation to the taxpayers' income.

ABANDON PROPOSAL TO INCREASE TAX

At the moment revenue is immediately needed, and it may be untimely to consider the repeal of the existing Federal gasoline tax. But, assuredly, current proposals to increase the levy rapidly will be abandoned if proper weight is given to the ability-to-pay factor. This factor, in all fairness, should be a paramount consideration in assessing the costs of general government, which should be borne by all citizens alike.

Inflation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PRENTISS M. BROWN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, June 12 (legislative day of Tuesday, June 10), 1941

ADDRESS BY PRESTON DELANO, COMPTROLLER OF THE CURRENCY

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I present for publication in the RECORD an excellent address delivered by Hon. Preston Delano, Comptroller of the Currency, at the convention of the District of Columbia bankers at Hot Springs, Va., June 5, 1941. In my judgment the address is a most excellent presentation of a subject currently of great public interest.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A few weeks ago the president of a national bank located in a middle western town had occasion to visit Washington and spent an hour in my office discussing the state of the Nation, and particularly the present outlook for the Nation's banks. It was inevitable that there should be some discussion of the much abused subject of inflation. Mr. Cooper (as I shall call him, and that, of course, is not his name) apparently had mulled that subject over in his mind pretty thoroughly. I think that you will be interested in his views, because they represent a somewhat characteristic attitude of some of our friends.

"I'm not worried about inflation," Mr. Cooper said. "On the contrary, I think that our bank, and I suppose most others, stand to gain from a reasonable degree of inflation. Of course, I'm not talking about a runaway printing-press inflation, such as Germany had in 1923.

"Let's look at our bank for a concrete instance. We have deposits of about $2,000,000 and our capital and surplus is about a quarter of a million. Speaking roughly, our resources are $600,000 of cash, $800,000 of loans, and $800,000 of Government and industrial bonds. We own our building and also a couple of dozen pieces of d. p. c. real estate.

"Suppose inflation were to come," he went on. "I haven't any idea about the theoretical economics of it, but I think I can see how it would affect our bank. Inflation helps debtors by making money more plentiful and easy to come by, so they have less trouble in paying their debts; it injures creditors because the money they get back isn't worth as much—won't buy as much—as when it was loaned. Well, banks are in a peculiarly protected position in this respect, because a bank is equally a debtor and a creditor; its liability to its depositors is a certain amount of money, but its assets are also money, either the cash itself or the money obligations of borrowers, the Government, and corporations. So, regardless of any reasonable inflation fluctuations, a bank is safe, because its gains or losses as a debtor to its depositors are always offset by the side of its balance sheet on which it figures as a creditor."

Our visitor warmed a bit to his subject and continued, "As a matter of fact, I think we actually stand to gain from a boom in prices and profits, even if the general apparent prosperity is fictitious as the professors claim. Over the course of the past 15 years our bank, like most others, has managed to accumulate some assets which are not first class. We have certain bonds that are in default and selling for half what we paid for them; we have a number of slow or even doubtful loans, some collateralled by stocks and bonds and others being the regular line of a local manufacturer or merchant who just doesn't quite break even every year. And we have a group of residential and Main Street properties taken in foreclosure, and one real lemon—a nice empty furniture factory, which fell on us late in the depression. Of course," he objected somewhat hurriedly, "all this weak stuff is adequately charged down or entirely charged off, but the bank still holds them, hoping for the best.

"Well, if inflation comes and prices, wages, and profits go up and the public and businessmen have more money in their pockets, we would be in clover on a lot of these items, as I see it. The corporations with the defaulted bonds would get out of the red and clear up arrears; the bonds would climb back to par and we would get rid of ours fast. That applies also to several of our weak local borrowers, who would get back on their feet, just as many marginal producers did in the last war. As the market price of stocks goes up, our underwater collateral loans will be in the clear again. And our 'other real estate' could be disposed of at least for a reasonable amount and perhaps at a profit; I recall how Main Street blossomed in 1919 and how many people bought homes As a matter of fact, I wouldn't be astounded if somebody nibbled at our furniture factory, because people have to do something with their extra money after spending a little more for better food and buying a few dresses and silk shirts, and you remember how furniture prices skyrocketed during the World War inflation.

"In addition—and this is important," he said, "there ought to be plenty of opportunities for putting to work some of our idle cash and possibly even some of the increased deposits that will flow in. Business expansion goes with inflation, and aggressive businessmen will borrow to expand their plants and get a larger share of profits, and also to build up inventories before prices go still higher. Interest on such loans will be almost pure profit because our overhead won't increase much even if we doubled our business. So, a reasonable dose of inflation doesn't worry me. Any damage to our stockholders because of the depreciated purchasing power of dividends will be offset by the increased value of our substandard assets."

Now, the interesting thing is that a great deal of what our fictitious Mr. Cooper has said is true. The major fallacy, of course, lies in the assumption that if nothing is done about it these inflationary forces which are now at work will run a reasonable or minor course, arresting themselves at some theoretical halfway station before actually beginning to undermine our free economy. Like the jinni in the fable, inflation is a force which, once loosed, is not easily persuaded or squeezed back into its bottle. The second fallacy emerges from the realization that it is quite impossible to experience even a reasonable dose of the inflationary spiral which Mr. Cooper is welcoming without ultimately running into the compensatory deflation with which we are altogether too familiar. Mr. Cooper overlooked something which a banker who lived through the post-war period should well remember—that the prosperity of American bankers rises and falls with the prosperity of the country. All of us, regardless of what business we may be in, are integral parts of society, the interdependency of which cannot be disputed. Anything which materially affects one part will inevitably and ultimately affect the whole, even though for some the day of reckoning may be delayed.

Let us take a minute to look at the problem. Inflation is perhaps well defined as "an increase in the general level of prices growing out of an increase in expenditures while goods available for purchase are not correspondingly increased in amount."[1] I think it will be clearer if we take an example.

Let us suppose a particular country has a maximum potential annual productive capacity (that is, the utmost that can be turned out, working full blast) of 30,000,000,000 units—call them francs, dollars, or pounds. After various bottlenecks have been widened—a difficult task—this productive capacity, consisting of men and machinery, is finally being fully employed, and the Nation's annual expenditure for goods absorbs the entire annual production. But now the country has embarked upon a war or a national-defense program costing $10,000,000,000 annually, and the money for this purpose is obtained through loans made conveniently easy by the large excess reserves of the banking system. The production of the required munitions, planes, and tanks necessarily takes that amount of consumers' goods out of the market in which the public buys. The result is that the public is left with thirty billions of purchasing power with which to buy the twenty billions of goods available. The law of supply and demand comes into operation, and the general level of prices rises.

If this tendency were completely uncontrolled, it would proceed in snowball fashion. Prices having increased 50 percent, with wages, etc., lagging only slightly behind, the next year the public would have forty-five billions to buy goods worth twenty billions at pre-war price levels; in a word, we would already have a better than 100-percent inflation.

The preceding example, of course, is greatly oversimplified. It disregards entirely, for instance, the situation created when labor's successful demands for increased wages anticipate and precede any general rise in the price level. Nevertheless, it shows in a crude way what can occur when a nation either willingly or unwillingly devotes a substantial part of its production effort to armaments, without exercising appropriate control (either voluntary or mandatory) over consumption and prices.

This is not mere theory. It was demonstrated throughout the world during and after the first World War. In the United States, for example, the total realized national income increased from $33,000,000,000 in 1915 to $68,000,000,000 in 1920. The average earnings of all American workers approximated $600 in 1915 and exceeded $1,300 in 1920.[2] Per capita income in dollars rose from $320 to $640, but the amount of food, clothing, housing, etc., which that $640 would buy in 1920 was no more—actually perhaps slightly less—than the amount which $320 bought in 1915.[3] In other words, the cost of living more than doubled during the 5-year period, so that the real income of the average American did not advance.[4]

As we all know, the result of such a violent economic dislocation is an arbitrary and quite unjust redistribution of wealth and of income. The widow or thrifty retired worker supported by the return from endowment-type insurance policies or annuities, from pensions, or interest from Government or corporation bonds, is injured through no fault of his or her own. During and after the last war such persons in the United States had taken from them at least one-third of their real income, in England about one-half, seven-eighths in France, eleven-twelfths in Italy, and virtually the whole in Germany, and in the successor States of Austria-Hungary and Russia.[5] On the other hand, a corporation or individual with a large indebtedness incurred before inflation obtains an unexpected and undeserved windfall.

Nor should it be imagined that the whole matter is straightened out by the deflation which always follows an inflationary period.

"If the new money—that is, the increased currency and bank credit—is withdrawn from the channels of trade after the price and income structure has been wholly or partially adjusted to it, the price level can be pushed down again, but the result is not to redress the injustices, but to start another series of inequitable transfers of wealth, and to increase greatly the burden of public and private debt. In addition, the contraction of money tends strongly to discourage productive activity."[6]

Redistribution of the Nation's wealth and income may possibly be desirable, but no one contends that it should be accomplished through such hit-and-miss, haphazard lotteries. An important concomitant of such effects of inflation is a justified dissatisfaction with the economic status quo. This dissatisfaction not only discourages the saving process essential to successful capitalism, but in extreme cases may even engender strains and maladjustments leading to social upheaval.

It was this deflationary tendency following inflation which, more than anything else, accounted for the unprecedented number of fatalities among American banks in the years 1920 to 1933. Speaking directly on this subject in August 1931, J. M. Keynes foresaw the possibility of critical breakages among banks of the United States, warning that "a decline in money values so severe as that which we are now experiencing threatens the solidity of the whole financial structure."[7] There is little reason to suppose that an inflation at this time would differ from all the previous inflations of our history and fail to be followed by a crippling deflationary period.

So I think it is becoming increasingly obvious that something must be done about this jinni which already threatens to get one arm and his head outside the bottle. No government today dares take the risk that inflation will not get out of hand. It must move to control the tremendously destructive forces which are inherent in all such movements just as soon as they appear, and to bring these forces under restraint before they become actively dangerous. A government which temporizes with this menace is culpable indeed. Somehow, either by free concerted effort or by legal compulsion, the restraints must be imposed.

It is right here—the extent to which Government is compelled to impose restraints—price ceilings, priorities, rationings, and all the regimentation that such things imply, that the danger to a free economy lies, and the real threat to Mr. Cooper's bank becomes apparent. What we should all be interested in is what can be done to make these governmental restraints as few and as light as possible. In a great crisis, how much can the people do in the way of self-discipline, how much will we do voluntarily to control ourselves, thus relieving the Government from the necessity of controls and at the same time preserving our traditional freedom and liberties? Man's progress is measured by the restraints he imposes upon himself and by far the most important and significant of these restraints are not those written into statutes but those which flow naturally from inner conviction and the development of character. Certainly this is the democratic and the better way.

And if we want to do this thing in the voluntary and democratic way, what are the steps to be taken? It seems to me there are several important things that we as bankers can do in the field of our competence. We have seen that inflation comes when people have more money and want to spend it, and the supply of the things they want hasn't increased, or at least hasn't increased as fast as their supply of dollars. Obviously, the problem is to hold down the volume of purchasing power clamoring for consumers' goods, so that it will keep step, by and large, with the available supply of such goods.

There are in the United States today some 15,000 banks. They are the nerve centers of our economy. The officers and employees of these banks share the responsibility of informing our citizens of the great changes imposed by the national emergency. In the matter of direct action, there is the limitation on credit to be extended either for the production or purchase of consumptive goods with particular reference to installment contracts. (As a matter of interest, consumer credit is at an all-time high.) A strong control over loans for speculative purposes is, of course, obvious, but it is in the realm of the fiscal education of the public that the banks of the country can really make their contribution toward the preservation of a decent world in which to live. The public must understand the importance of voluntarily withholding a substantial segment of its money income from ordinary purchases, diverting all it can possibly spare to savings or better toward the purchase of bonds which the Government is offering to finance its defense program. The people must understand the somewhat complex mechanism of inflation and its control—and that neither voluntary saving and self-restraint nor even the payment of higher taxes actually deprives them of any real benefits, but merely assists in checking a potential movement which could not fail to deeply injure the entire Nation. This is the task of each and every banker.

Clear and correct thinking on these fundamental economic problems is as essential in a democracy as is rapid production of the materials of warfare. It has been wisely said that—

"* * * the ideas of economists and political philosophers, both when they are right and when they are wrong, are more powerful than is commonly understood. Indeed, the world is ruled by little else. Practical men,

Rehabilitation in the Republican Valley

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HUGH A. BUTLER

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, June 12 (legislative day of Tuesday, June 10), 1941

STATEMENT BY HON. HUGH A. BUTLER, OF NEBRASKA

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the RECORD a statement by me at the first annual meeting of the Republican Valley Conservation Association, at McCook, Nebr., on June 10, 1941, on the subject Rehabilitation in the Republican Valley.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I had been looking forward eagerly to attending your meeting, and was planning to accompany Mr. John Page and others up and down the valley to acquaint them with recent flood damage and with irrigation possibilities. So it is with extreme regret that I am compelled to dictate this greeting to you, just before leaving the State to fly back to Washington.

Every man has a wide variety of interests, and a set of convictions concerning the swift pace of national and international events now taking place. As one of your representatives in Washington, I, too, have a number of matters which are receiving my earnest attention because of the bearing they have upon the stability of agriculture and business in Nebraska. I believe that the program of your association, seeking as it does flood control, irrigation, and soil and water conservation, meets almost completely the views of the administration. It would, therefore, appear that it is one Nebraska program which promises definite accomplishment—if diligently pursued. For this reason, I have frequently said, and say again, that in my mind it now is one of the most important, if not the most important, programs of our State.

Officers of the association told me the other day that nearly all Federal agencies now operating in your valley or in position to aid you are to be represented at this meeting. I think they have complimented your organization by their presence and have definitely indicated their interest in what you are doing. I hope that a large number of your landowners, county commissioners, and others will be present as an indication of the definite interest which our own people have in the objectives of your association.

Many of you may not know that I am an engineer, having practiced that profession in my early life. I have employed my limited knowledge in that field on my own farm property in the Republican Valley and have personally employed many of the principles and methods being advocated generally for landowners in the Republican watershed. As a means of guarding against flood control I have placed riprap along the banks of the river as it flows through my farm. I am pumping from wells to provide supplemental irrigation when inadequate rainfall is experienced. I have worked hard and spent my own money to accomplish soil conservation and to check soil erosion. I have sought to restore grass cover and to push forestation in my section, since these two operations are definitely linked with successful control of soil erosion. I regard my own time and expenditures in these fields as sound investments. Therefore, when I pronounce the objectives of your association as sound it is after my own personal experience.

I can remember only too well the great productivity of our watershed up until about 1930. The valleys annually produced abundant feed crops and sustained a large population of livestock which lent a high degree of stability to agriculture in the area. The table land was fertile, producing fine grain crops, and affording splendid pasture. Today, because of overgrazing, drought, and erosion, the picture of much of this land has changed. From 65,000 to 90,000 acres of flood plain in the valley are matted with undergrowth, timber, and poisonous weeds. At least a third of our inheritance in the Republican valley has been lost through the combined forces of flood, drought, and erosion. The Soil Conservation Service, I am informed, estimates that a $175,000,000 decline in assessed valuation of farm real estate occurred between 1930 and 1935 alone. This was about one-third of the valuation in 1930. Further extensive damages have been sustained annually since 1935.

Many parts of our drainage basin are not producing the annual volume of farm products they did as long ago as 1891, 50 years ago. Other sections today possess only 15 or 20 percent of the livestock they did as recently as 1930. You know of the loss of 65,000 in human population since 1930. These are hard, cold methods of measuring the economic distress which has come to a formerly rich and fertile section of the Great Plains. It is true that the Federal Government has generously sought to cushion the hardships by many forms of direct and indirect assistance. But when they have reached the point where they have expended, on an average, upward of $3,000 in loans and grants and various forms of relief for every farm we possess, and we still see more people migrating away, we must conclude that these practices do not afford an adequate remedy.

No matter what some Members of Congress think about Federal expenditures, I say solemnly to you that it is not right to spend billions of dollars of Federal tax money or borrowed money as a temporary remedy method to keep people contented or to enable them to merely live from one day to the next. If, however, there is a way to provide loans and grants which will truly rehabilitate an entire watershed, and make the residents self-sufficient thereafter, then I believe that to be a proper Government function. Had the Federal Government moved in this manner, beginning a decade or so ago, the money expended in this basin would, in all probability, have been sufficient to bring under permanent and complete control the entire soil and water resources of this watershed. This is no time to merely criticize what has gone before. But we would be lax indeed if we did not seek to bring about true rehabilitation with all further Federal, State, and county tax dollars which are to be expended from here on in this valley.

A few years back a cloud in the sky or a drop of rain would have brought hope and optimism to our area. Now it is a mingled hope and fear which we experience—frightened because of flood threats. Twice within the past 3 weeks damaging floods have swept down the valley and its tributaries. Valuable water resource was entirely wasted, instead of being conserved and beneficially employed later, when it would double a crop yield on adjoining farm lands. It is wrong to let this happen year after year.

The W. P. A., for instance, had a regulation drafted by Congress 2 years ago which permitted them to come in and help an area following a damaging flood. As many as six times within a year, I am informed, they were privileged, under this regulation, to enter one of our valleys to repair damages sustained in a flood. But the same regulation prevented them from doing those things which would permanently correct the situation. An amendment is now being offered to the W. P. A. regulations in the current bill before the Appropriations Committee of the House which would correct that unreasonable situation. Let me give you another illustration. As many as four times in a single year the bridge across the Republican at Oxford has been swept away, and each time it has been repaired and rebuilt much as it was before. That's like getting a part of a pair of half soles every week. This is not economy, nor is it protection to our people and our valleys.

If your cities, towns, and counties in southwestern Nebraska and in those parts of Kansas and Colorado which lie in the Republican watershed can continue your organization and maintain the same type of dignified, earnest promotional activities which you have evidenced since last October, I am sure that Senator NORRIS, Representative CURTIS, and myself will continue to give all possible aid and encouragement at Washington. There is little question in my mind that the very soundness of your program will win for you complete cooperation and understanding from all State and Federal agencies which are permitted, under law, to perform the type of services required in the permanent and complete rehabilitation of our entire watershed. Stick to it, fellows, and you'll win.

HON. ALBERT B. CHANDLER

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, June 12 (legislative day of Tuesday, June 10), 1941

ARTICLE FROM THE KNICKERBOCKER NEWS

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article published in the Knickerbocker News, of Albany, N. Y., of date Friday, May 23, 1941, entitled "Jim Farley Still Idol of Public," with which I agree.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Knickerbocker News, Albany, N. Y., of May 23, 1941]

JIM FARLEY STILL IDOL OF PUBLIC

(By Don Whitehead)

NEW YORK.—There is no privacy for Private Citizen James A. Farley.

Although he has been out of the national limelight for 8 months, the big fellow has about as much chance for obscurity as a movie idol on Broadway.

He's reveling in his role as a big businessman and enjoying his new freedom from the pressure of 8 terrific years as Democratic national chairman and Postmaster General.

He has no regrets, he says, over climbing outside the ropes of the political arena, while his family is delighted to have him once again as a more or less stable member of the household instead of a once-in-awhile visitor between hops about the country at the rate of 50,000 miles a year.

But, nevertheless, Jim Farley still belongs to the people, and his office would look like a convention hall today if all those trying to see him were permitted past a cute blonde reception girl and his efficient secretary.

They shield him from a horde of callers—job hunters, fellows who met "Good Old Jim" at a political rally back in Podunk Center, publicity seekers, panhandlers, and scores of others who have no legitimate reason for a call.

Even then he receives dozens of callers—businessmen, politicians, prize fighters, baseball players, and just plain folks. He carries on a tremendous personal correspondence with his political friends in every State in the Union who continue to keep him advised on the national situation.

He couldn't entirely shake loose from his political bonds if he wanted to, because of the close personal ties he formed throughout the years as ringmaster of the Democratic political circus.

But those years in Washington—beating the Roosevelt drum, keeping a finger on the Nation's voting pulse, ironing out intraparty strife, and flying across the continent just to make a speech at a post-office dedication—gave him a financial beating.

Now he's trying to recoup his losses.

Those with an appointment to see Farley these days are told by the blond receptionist to have a seat, please, and Mr. Farley will see you in a few minutes.

Then a door opens and there is private citizen Farley with his hand outstretched and a broad smile on his face as though an old friend had dropped in for a chat, when perhaps he never saw the visitor before.

He looks as fit as a fighter in training, and if the years in Washington maelstrom left any mark on his honest Irish face, there isn't a trace of it.

Only his surroundings seem strange. He moves a great deal in the plush-carpet quiet of big business as president of the Coca-Cola Export Corporation and president of the Coca-Cola Bottling Co. of Boston.

Soft-voiced aides move in and out of his office. Muffled typewriters barely can be heard, and buzzers buzz discreetly in the distance.

That's the picture of genial Jim Farley that his multitude of friends in every congressional district in the Nation hasn't seen. They know Jim Farley as the center of milling, sweating, loud-voiced meetings of politicians in hotel rooms blue with cigar smoke, where political campaigns were mapped and elections won.

It probably is inconceivable to them that he has no political ambitions and is happy in his new businessman role, but that's what he says.

"I have no plans to return to politics," Farley said in an interview. "I have no political ambitions. I'm more concerned now with the well-being of our country and the hope that we come through without getting involved in this war.

"And, too, I can't afford political ambitions."

There's talk, of course, that Farley be drafted to run as mayor of the city of New York or as Governor of the State. Many believe he could be elected to either position if he took off his coat and went to work for one of them.

Farley isn't interested in either the power or the glory, his friends say, declaring his 8 years in Washington left him with debts of more than $50,000 and the annual salaries of mayor and Governor ($25,000) would not permit him to make up these losses because of outside expense involved in holding such a position.

There's a possibility Farley could be lured back into the national political ring by the assurance of nomination as President or Vice President.

But he declines to discuss these speculations, just as he avoids any talk of his rift with President Roosevelt over the third-term nomination at Chicago last year. His political activity is confined to his work as chairman of the New York State Democratic Committee.

Despite this "retirement," Farley can't step outside his office that he isn't stopped by a mail carrier or an old friend for a chat. There's a constant demand for his services in civic work—which he gives generously. At present he's chairman of the greater New York fund campaign to raise money for charity.

"Actually, I don't think the return to private life has meant much change for me," he laughs, "except I get to be with my family more often. I've been with them more during the last 8 months than I was during the entire 8 years in Washington."

There's the same round of conferences, meetings, rallies, speeches—except they aren't political.

It's no secret that Farley's greatest ambition at present is to get control of the New York Yankee baseball chain. He heads a syndicate which still is dickering for the American League property with executors of the estate of Col. Jacob Ruppert.

Farley always has been a Yankee fan and a baseball addict ever since he played first base as a youth on the village team at Grassy Point, where he was born May 30, 1880, the son of a brick manufacturer.

Sports have been his hobby and from 1925 to 1933 he was New York boxing commissioner. He still can be found at a ringside or at the Yankee ball park whenever he can find the time.

His greatest baseball hero was Babe Ruth, and there's a possibility if he can get control of the Yankees, he will try to bring the Bambino back to the game. The team of Farley and Ruth would be a potent combination in the national pastime.

Whether it's business, politics, civic work, sports or the general run-of-mine office calls, Farley still packs more activity into one day than almost any other individual on Manhattan Island.

"The days would have to be 60 hours long for the boss to meet all the demands on his time," a secretary remarked.

That's what "political retirement" means to Private Citizen Farley.

Judge Ben B. Lindsey

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SHERIDAN DOWNEY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, June 12 (legislative day of Tuesday, June 10), 1941

ARTICLE FROM ROCKY MOUNTAIN NEWS

Mr. DOWNEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article from the Rocky Mountain News of Sunday, June 8, 1941, entitled "The Kids' Judge," by Lee T. Casey, relating to Judge Ben B. Lindsey.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Rocky Mountain News of June 8, 1941]

THE KIDS' JUDGE

(By Lee T. Casey)

It was my privilege during a recent vacation to spend part of a day with Colorado's most famous ex-resident—Judge Ben B. Lindsey, of the Los Angeles Superior Court. I take pleasure in reporting that Judge and Mrs. Lindsey are doing very well.

Right at the start I might as well admit partiality. Judge Lindsey and I, I am most proud to say, have been friends for many years. I first met him back in 1908 or 1909, when I was a cub reporter for the Kansas City Star and he had just been found, according to a poll conducted by the London Times, one of the three most notable Americans—the others being Theodore Roosevelt and Thomas A. Edison. He was kindly and helpful at that first meeting. He was that on many other occasions after I came to Denver. I underwent matrimony at his hands. As a newspaperman, I had a close-up on some of his countless fights. With the rest of Denver, I saw him in victory and, eventually, in bitter and humiliating defeat.

His disbarment was a blow that would have crushed almost any other man. The fact the State supreme court later repudiated the action and reinstated him on its own motion—in other words, denounced the entire affair as a frame-up—did not soften the shock at the time. After having been a great world figure, after having done more for the youth of the land than any other man, after having revolutionized the system of jurisprudence in matters affecting the welfare of children, Judge Lindsey was thrown out of his job (by a frame-up) and finally out of his profession. Personally he was broke; officially he was repudiated and discredited. He was more than 50 years old. Few men indeed could have survived.

AMIDST BATTLE

But the rock Denver rejected has become the cornerstone of the Los Angeles Temple of Justice. Less metaphorically, Judge Lindsey is more famous than ever, more powerful than ever, more enthusiastic than ever, more secure than ever.

I found him in the middle of a fight, which makes the picture of Lindsey happiness complete.

Last fall he was reelected for a 6-year term. In the primary he got a clear majority over no less than 18 opponents. In the general election he received the largest vote ever given to a candidate for office in Los Angeles, with a plurality of a half million over his nearest competitor. The job pays $10,000 a year. In 5 more years, if he chooses, he can retire at full salary for life.

But, even in Los Angeles, it's something of the same old story. The politicians don't like him any more than they liked him in Denver. Neither do the stodgier members of the bar. His department is the court of conciliation. Mainly, his aim is to keep families together and to prevent divorce for the sake of the children concerned.

TO THE PEOPLE

In these preliminary proceedings the narrow rules of judicial procedure are not always followed, partly because the aim is not separation but conciliation, partly because Judge Lindsey has retained his contempt for those legal forms that fatten fees and block justice. So a committee of the bench and bar recently "investigated" his court. The members found a subordinate, previously dismissed, had made some errors while Judge Lindsey was absent on a mission for the Governor, and that the judge himself had on occasion dispensed with certain formalities to get straight to the heart of a matter. With this report as a pretext, a legislative committee is considering a bill to abolish the court of conciliation

My guess is that the legislators will not take that risk. If they do, the fighting judge will take the case straight to the people. He did just that with 12 measures for children that now are in effect in California and should be in effect in Colorado some day, and he won. At 65, he is in fighting trim and a dangerous opponent.

Granted, that Judge Lindsey is less than perfect. Granted, that reticence is not among the Lindsey virtues, if indeed it is a virtue. Granted, that Judge Lindsey has a tendency to view antagonists as scoundrels—a view which, in his particular case, has by no means been wholly wrong. Nonetheless, I think that Colorado should rejoice in this great Coloradan who has kept right on fighting a winning battle for the cause he holds most dear—the cause of children and of the oppressed among mankind.

That he has won financial security for his wife and child is incidental. For many years he has lived under the fierce bright light of publicity. And I have never known a man who demanded less for himself or more for other men.

The War Situation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWIN C. JOHNSON

OF COLORADO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, June 12 (legislative day of Tuesday, June 10), 1941

LETTER FROM CLARENCE L. IRELAND

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President, today I received a most timely letter from a distinguished citizen, a former attorney general and a World War veteran of my State, with reference to the question of the hour—the most serious question, by the way, ever to face the American people. This letter deals in a realistic, logical, and common-sense manner with the advisability of participating in the wars which are raging throughout the world. This letter expresses my own attitude toward the issue so completely that I want to call it to the attention of my colleagues and the country; and I therefore ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

IRELAND & IRELAND,
Denver, Colo., June 9, 1941.

Hon. ED C. JOHNSON,
Senator from Colorado,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR ED: Heretofore I have not burdened you or any of our Representatives in Congress with any letters on this war situation. I have waited until the matter has become clear in my own mind as to what seemed the position this country should take, and in making up my mind I have read articles on both sides of the question, as well as listened to the speeches coming from both camps.

I think, without question, the thing that is now most clear to all of us is the fact that the United States is not prepared for war and cannot get prepared for offensive war for several years to come. Without question, the German Government, under the direction of Hitler, has been able to prepare and build a war machine far beyond anything even believed possible by our people. Lindbergh, so far as I can see, did not overstate the strength of Germany's position, and all that he prophesied and more has come true. No European country was prepared, and we are not prepared now.

Obviously, it would be to the advantage of the United States to spend considerable of her wealth and manpower in bringing Hitler and the German Government to its knees, if that were at all possible. It is now apparent to one, even in my position, that that is not possible. When Harry Hopkins writes an article, as he did in the American, stating that we can overcome Germany with our unlimited supplies of natural resources, the wish is father to the thought. Since Hitler has now taken over 14 countries, and within a short time will undoubtedly take others; he has without question placed Germany in possession of natural resources sufficient in quantity, with few exceptions, to keep ahead of the United States and Britain. I cannot, therefore, agree with Harry Hopkins.

It is now apparent also that if we do enter the war, it will be in the Pacific and not in the Atlantic, and that the battle will start in the East Indies and at Singapore. This we cannot afford. The possibilities of losing are too great and the consequences too enormous.

Senator Pepper talked here June 5 at East Denver High School, and the sentiment there expressed was definitely against our entering this war in any manner I have contacted from time to time a number of our young men in college, and they are definitely against entering this war. These boys are not afraid of war, but they do see the hopelessness of the situation.

It seems to me, therefore, that the only position we can rightfully take is to encourage England to make the most favorable peace possible and keep ourselves in a position to aid England in bringing about as favorable a settlement as can be secured. This is no time to be bragging about our strength, because we are simply not prepared for the kind of war that will be ahead of us. We can prepare only by putting this Nation under a dictator—we haven't begun to get prepared. We can prepare under our present form of democratic Government, however, for the defense of this country—and that we should do with all possible speed; but to prepare for offensive war—that is a horse of another color. We must not only match Germany, but we must surpass her and be twice or three times as strong as she is before we send our boys to fight on foreign fields. Any objective less than the invasion of Germany would be futile, if we entered the war at all.

I am not unmindful of the fact that the President and his aides are in possession of much more information than are even Members of Congress, and undoubtedly you, as a Member of Congress have much more information than the people have. Therefore, it was the duty of your constituents to trust you and have confidence in you to guide the people properly for their best interests; but now we have developed in this country two classes of people—those who want to aid England at any cost and who believe the United States can, by entering the war at this time, eventually win the war; and the other class who seem to be looking the cold facts in the face and who realize that there are some things that even the United States cannot accomplish; and I am now definitely in the latter class. We must remember that if the war is brought to an end and Hitler has no longer an excuse to keep the armies in the fields, even the German people and the German soldiers will return somewhat to normalcy. They are still human and undoubtedly still have some ideas of fairness, decency, and there is a possibility that a leadership will develop within the German nation to bring out those elements. It seems to me at any rate we can better afford to gamble that that attitude will prevail, than to take the attitude at this time we cannot trust any German leadership at any time, and that we must fight a war to the end. To pursue the latter course seems to me will lead only to destruction of this Nation and to absolute dictatorship here. To pursue the former course, democracy and freedom has an opportunity to return, even to the people of Germany and Europe; and we have a better opportunity to preserve democracy here. We cannot afford to play the ostrich and stick our head in the sand and not look forward to what is the inevitable. To employ in this country the means necessary to win, and that is putting this country under a dictatorship, because without it we cannot get the efficiency necessary to conquer Germany, would in itself destroy democracy in this country.

I hope, therefore, that as representatives of our fair State of Colorado, you will all continue to do everything within your power to keep this country out of war, build a strong Army for the defense of our own shores, and keep this Nation in a position to assert its influence toward bringing about a peace in Europe that will be fair on both sides.

Yours very truly,
CLARENCE L. IRELAND.

Priority of Production for Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HENRY CABOT LODGE, JR.

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, June 12 (legislative day of Tuesday, June 10), 1941

EDITORIAL FROM THE SPRINGFIELD (MASS.) DAILY NEWS

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, a thoughtful editorial appeared in the Springfield (Mass.) Daily News on June 4, which raises a question so basic to all national policies that I believe it should be called to the attention of the Congress. I, therefore, ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Springfield Daily News of June 4, 1941]

PRIORITY FOR DEFENSE OR FOR NEW SOCIAL ORDER

Now that William S. Knudsen and Sidney Hillman, as directors of the defense program, have formally declared that the production battle is just starting and have appealed for cooperation to put it through, we should like to have it made entirely plain that the Federal Government gives it first place. There is so much of unrestrained activity in undermining the program that there is occasion for questioning about it. The specter of the so-called new social order comes into the foreground whenever anyone in high authority urges cooperation and the speeding up of defense.

First and foremost is the plan for adjusting strikes by having the Government take over the plants when trouble breaks out, following the disastrous experiences in Russia in control and operation of industry by the Soviets. As a means for settling labor troubles, the taking over of industrial plants will in all probability result in retaining the strikes and all their attendant troubles only with the difference that labor will then be striking against Government instead of against corporations. A better way would seem to be to discourage strikes rather than promote them.

Concerning the defense program, it is noted that Uncle Sam has taken upon himself the new role of a public junkman, going about everywhere gathering in pots and pans of aluminum to eke out the dwindling supply needed for airplane production. This is an element of vital importance which has been quite overlooked in recent years except as activities persisted year after year in persecuting the aluminum industry, notwithstanding the fact that the prime importance of the product was fully known.

Also it is noted that Harry Bridges, radical labor agitator, is still harbored and defended against all moves by the Federal Bureau of Investigation for his deportation covering a period of many, many months. So we rise in this Congress of our democracy for information, not from curiosity but because Americans are entitled to it. We should like to know whether national defense is in first place or whether the new social order is first and defense somewhere down the line in importance.

Reorganization of the Federal Government—Plans I–V

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EUGENE J. KEOGH

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 12, 1941

EXCERPTS FROM ARTICLE BY CORNELIUS H. SULLIVAN, JR.

Mr. KEOGH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am glad to insert excerpts from an article showing the charges made by Reorganization Plans I–V, prepared by Cornelius H. Sullivan, Jr., of the technical staff of the Edward Thompson Co., of Brooklyn, legal publishers and one of the official compilers of the United States Code. The excerpts are as follows:

REORGANIZATION OF THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT—PLANS I–V

(By Cornelius H. Sullavan, Jr.)

SCOPE AND PURPOSE OF PLANS

The changes made by the reorganization plans affected every one of the 10 executive departments and many of the bureaus within them, not to mention a host of independent agencies. They range from simple transfers to more complex abolishments and consolidations. What is more, the President expected them to save the taxpayer as much as $21,700,000 annually.

The Reorganization Act of 1939, which authorized the President, within limitations as to time and scope, to submit his proposed reorganizations to the Congress, declared five definite purposes:[1] (1) To reduce expenditures, (2) to increase efficiency, (3) to consolidate agencies according to major purposes, (4) to reduce the number of agencies by consolidating those having similar functions and by abolishing such as may not be necessary, and (5) to eliminate overlapping and duplication of effort.

In effecting these purposes President Roosevelt promulgated five reorganization plans. The first, which was transmitted to Congress on April 25, 1939, took effect July 1, 1939, and was designed to improve the over-all management of the executive branch. It was followed on May 9, 1939, by Reorganization Plan No. II, effective July 1, 1939, which was intended to effect a better allocation of certain agencies and activities among departments. Plan No. III, submitted to Congress on April 2, 1940, and effective June 30, 1940, was a step to improve intradepartmental management through internal adjustment in certain agencies. The fourth plan, promulgated April 11, 1940, and effective June 30, 1940, provided for a number of interdepartmental reorganizations designed to increase efficiency in the administration of Government services by a more logical grouping of certain functions and by a further reduction in the number of independent agencies reporting directly to the Chief Executive. The last of the plans, Reorganization Plan No. V, was submitted to Congress on May 22, 1940, to afford more effective control over aliens. It transferred the Immigration and Naturalization Service from the Department of Labor to the Department of Justice, effective June 14, 1940.

EXPLANATION OF TABLES

The two tables set out below present a consolidated compilation of all basic changes effected by Reorganization Plans Nos. I–V.

Table I is an alphabetical listing of agencies and functions as they existed prior to the reorganization plans, the second column describing the nature of the change, and the third showing the post-reorganization repository of the old agency or function.

Table II shows the post-reorganization structure of executive departments and independent agencies insofar as they were affected by the Reorganization Plans. The second column gives the pre-reorganization status of the affected agency or function, and indicates the nature of the change which took place.

Racial Discrimination

REMARKS

OF

HON. LOUIS J. CAPOZZOLI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 12, 1941

Mr. CAPOZZOLI. Mr. Speaker, until recently I chose not to believe the numerous complaints of racial discrimination which I have heard from time to time. I rather believed that these complaints were imaginary, and that they were made by persons who thought they had no other way of explaining whatever disappointments they suffered.

However, by virtue of some matters which have come to my notice, I am forced to the conclusion that, in spite of my deep-seated desire to believe otherwise, the fact is that discrimination is taking place. It is almost unbelievable that such a condition should exist in our country. Most people do not like to believe it because it tends to take away something dear to them in their appraisal of American ideals.

You and I were taught in our American schools to respect, to revere, and cherish the principles which have been laid down as the basic foundation of our American form of government by those great characters of American history who courted, and many of them did actually suffer, death to the end that you and I might enjoy equal opportunities in this great land, under our American system of government, free from prejudice because of race, color, or creed. We have lived our lives thus far believing and practicing what we were taught. Is it any wonder, therefore, that many of us hate to admit that today, because of the workings of propagandists, bent upon the division of our peoples into hostile classes, such a condition actually exists?

Upon what do I base my contention of the existence of this condition? Is it because I am easily led by the chronic complaints of this nature, made by those who are otherwise unable to explain their shortcomings? No; that is not the reason. The true reason is that I have evidence of the existence of such a condition from a source which I consider unimpeachable.

The Governor of my State, appreciating the existence of this condition, appointed the State Industrial Commissioner, Frieda S. Miller, as chairman of the Governor's committee on employment discrimination. What has this committee uncovered along these lines? I cannot attempt at this point to give detailed facts of each individual case which the committee has had brought to its attention, but I do believe that it is very appropriate to quote from a statement made by Commissioner Miller in connection with this subject. This quotation reads as follows:

> We are particularly concerned with two forms of discrimination. The first bars from defense employment many citizens of Italian and German extraction, even though they have unquestionably proved their complete loyalty to this country. The second makes it difficult for qualified Negroes and Jews to secure defense jobs.
> Citizens who have served in this Nation's armed forces and hate the present governments in their countries of origin have been barred from work in factories which turn out clothing, kitchen utensils and other nontechnical items.

Is it any wonder why I have had to revise my earlier opinion on this subject? Think of it. Ex-service men being discriminated against in the exercise of their right to work.

When Commissioner Miller's statement, as above given, was called to my attention, I wrote to her and asked her to be so kind as to advise me as to the source of her information. I received a reply, in which she stated that one of the sources of her information consists of reports received from managers of local offices of the New York State Employment Service. Therefore, it is evident that this fear of discrimination is not a fancied one, but based on actual facts.

I come now to the question: Just what is behind this ugly practice? Do the persons who are guilty of this conduct feel that they are helping the cause of national unity? Do they not realize that they are being used by propagandists who are endeavoring to divide Americans amongst themselves and set class against class and group against group? We have never wanted these things to exist at any time, but, certainly, now less than ever.

All good Americans, regardless of origin, are ready to contribute to the preservation of our democracy and the freedom that we cherish. America must be preserved for all Americans and not for particular groups. Every American must be made to feel that he has a definite interest in the preservation of the ideals of this country and he must not be led to believe that he is excluded from any of the privileges which this country offers because of his race, color, or creed. The only limitation which good Americans recognize as to these privileges is the duty incumbent upon each one to conduct himself in a manner which will best contribute to the present and future safety of our country.

Let us all remember, whether we be Jew or gentile, native-born or foreign-born, white or colored, that no one of us has had any control over these natural facts. No one can say that he is personally responsible for where he was born, what he was born, and the color of his skin. The most that can be said is that we are what we are because of the accident of birth, but, as to whether we are good, loyal Americans, is something which is peculiarly within our own ability and within our own control and, therefore, a person's Americanism should be tested, not by what he orally professes, but is to be measured by his willingness to make sacrifices in the service of America. No one is rendering any service if, by his utterances or deeds, he sets the example of intolerance. He will best serve America who, both by word and deed, will so conduct himself as to treat his fellow-Americans, irrespective of race, creed, or color, in such a manner as he would himself like to be treated. It is by the observance of this rule that we shall get back to the road of sanity, to the road leading to complete national unity.

It is quite obvious that any discrimination against any class of Americans will necessarily interfere with the wholehearted cooperation on the part of those persons discriminated against. Naturally, they must be made to feel that they have a stake in the welfare of America and they cannot be permitted to believe that, as to them, there is no future. It seems to me that, when Americans are called upon to make sacrifices for their country, we do not limit the Americans from whom we would expect sacrifices to be made. We have the right to expect that all Americans, irrespective of race, color, or creed, must join in the common effort of serving our country. And so we find a great many individuals now serving in the armed forces of our country who come within the definition of the classes of Americans mentioned in Commissioner Miller's statement. If they are good enough to be expected to offer their bodies as targets of enemy aggression and good enough to be expected to pay taxes for the upkeep of our country they are certainly entitled to be given the same consideration by industry as all other Americans when they present themselves as applicants for employment. I maintain that the only test for employment in the defense industries should be loyalty to America, provided, of course, that the person is otherwise fit for the position.

We, as Members of the House of Representatives, are looked upon by our various communities as important factors in our Government. Let us go back to our respective districts and bring this message home to our people. Let us, by our example, show the way of tolerance, which, in turn, leads to a united America, so necessary in the present crisis.

I know that in uttering these sentiments, the people of the district which I have the honor to represent stand united in their approval.

Maximum Production for Defense

OF

HON. A. WILLIS ROBERTSON

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 12, 1941

Mr. ROBERTSON of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present to the House my letter of May 21 to Hon. William S. Knudsen, Director General of the Office of Production Management, and his reply of May 22, and my letter of May 21 to the Honorable Frances Perkins, Secretary of Labor, and her reply of June 9:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., May 21, 1941.

Hon. WILLIAM S. KNUDSEN,
Director General, Office of Production Management, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. KNUDSEN: In connection with the framing of a defense-tax bill calculated to raise an additional three and one-half billion dollars of revenue, I have been asking sundry witnesses questions concerning the effect of the 40-hour week on defense production. And because of my interest in the defense program, I ask the privilege of submitting the following questions to you and your associates:

First. Has the application of the 40-hour law with heavy penalties for overtime interfered with production under the defense program?

Second. To what extent have these heavy penalties for overtime increased the cost to the Government?

Third. Is it true that all defense contracts now being negotiated carry clauses under which the manufacturer passes on to the Government overtime penalties, with a further agreement for the Government to assume any further increases in wages?

Fourth. If our objective in the defense program is to be an expenditure of $2,000,000,000 per month, when will full employment in defense industries be reached?

Fifth. And when full employment is reached and it is no longer necessary to use overtime penalties to spread employment, should, for the remainder of the emergency, the restrictions of the 40-hour law be relaxed and, if so, to what extent?

Sixth. In plants where overtime has been resorted to, has there been a falling off of production per man-hour for the first 40 hours?

Seventh. If from the standpoint of unselfish patriotism, industrial workers of the Nation are willing to yield overtime payments for a workweek in excess of 40 hours, to what extent should industrial corporations be willing to yield to the Government in excess-profits taxes the additional profits that would flow to them as a result of the defense program?

In conclusion, if the Office of Production Management feels at liberty to do so, I would welcome an expression of its views concerning the policy to be adopted to secure maximum production in this emergency with fair wages to the workers and fair cost to the Government and to consumers of nondefense goods that will be affected by the Government program.

Sincerely yours,

A. WILLIS ROBERTSON.

OFFICE OF PRODUCTION MANAGEMENT,
OFFICE OF THE DIRECTOR GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., May 22, 1941.

The Honorable A. WILLIS ROBERTSON,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. ROBERTSON: Replying to your letter of May 21, I shall try to answer your questions in the order in which they appear.

First. On some fixed-price contracts there has probably been some delay, but not much.

Second. On firm-price contracts, none; on negotiated or fixed-fee contracts, from 5 to 10 percent, depending on the spread of overtime.

Third. Escalator clauses are included only in fixed-price negotiated contracts, not in bid contracts, and in fixed-fee contracts the Government pays the actual cost, including overtime premiums.

Fourth. March or April 1942.

Fifth. I do not see any need for that.

Sixth. Not very much; on straight machine work, none.

Seventh. I expect that the tax requirements will include heavy excess-profits taxes, which I think is only right.

I do not know whether this covers your questions; if not, if you will call at my office some afternoon around 5 o'clock I shall be willing to clarify any point.

Yours very truly,

WILLIAM S. KNUDSEN.

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., May 21, 1941.

Hon. FRANCES PERKINS,
The Secretary of Larbor,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MADAM SECRETARY: Being deeply interested in the defense program and hopeful that we can profit by the mistakes made in the defense program of 1917–18, when uncontrolled prices added $15,000,000,000 to the cost of the program and several times that amount to the cost of domestic consumer goods, I will appreciate your kindness in giving me answers to the following questions:

First. Has the 40-hour-week law curtailed production (a) in defense industries, (b) nondefense industries?

Second. How much overtime at time and a half has there been since October 1940 in (a) defense plants and (b) nondefense plants?

Third. To what extent has reemployment been affected by the 40-hour law, and how many employables are now unemployed?

Fourth. Assuming a national income next year of more than $90,000,000,000 and an effort to raise defense expenditures to the level of $2,000,000,000 per month, do you not expect a labor shortage in the spring of 1942?

Fifth. Do you favor legislation to relax the restrictions of the 40-hour week when unemployment has been eliminated during this emergency; and if your answer is in the negative, please indicate your reasons.

Sincerely yours,

A. WILLIS ROBERTSON.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOR,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, June 9, 1941.

Hon. A. WILLIS ROBERTSON,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN ROBERTSON: I am very glad to reply to your letter of May 21, and I regret that it was not possible for me to do so sooner. I most certainly share your hope that in preparing for national defense at the present time we will avoid the mistakes of 1917–18.

I shall deal with your questions in the order in which you have asked them:

"First. Has the 40-hour-week law curtailed production (a) in defense industries, (b) nondefense industries?"

There is no evidence that the wage-and-hour law has curtailed production in either defense or nondefense industries. It was not until March 1941 that average hours of work in all manufacturing industries reached and exceeded 40 a week. For that month the average was 40.4 hours a week. While this is the most recent figure available, and expansion undoubtedly continued during April and May, the March average indicates that as yet overtime schedules have not become heavy. Production has been expanded primarily by increasing employment rather than by lengthening hours, and present indications are that shortages of basic materials constitute a much more serious problem in defense production than shortages of labor supply.

Attached is a schedule showing average hours of work in March in a representative group of defense industries and the over-all averages in the durable and non-durable-goods industries. You will note that in such industries as the machine-tool group, which are under severe pressure to maintain production at maximum levels, hours of work have been extended well beyond 40 a week. Information gathered directly from industries by several agencies in this Department seem to show that when the volume of business available requires overtime operations they are used unhesitatingly. It should be recalled that under the wage-and-hour law overtime may be worked in the discretion of employers and employees without the necessity of any administrative action upon the part of the Wage and Hour Division. The only requirement of the law in respect to hours of work for covered employees is that if they exceed 40 a week the employee must be compensated for the excess hours at time and a half the regular rate at which he is employed.

"Second. How much overtime at time and a half has there been since October 1940 in (a) defense plants, and (b) nondefense plants?"

The amount of overtime employed since October 1940 has varied widely from industry to industry, depending on the extent of available facilities and the character of operations. In the steel industry (blast furnaces, steel works, and rolling mills), for example, capacity operations have been sustained with little overtime, weekly hours in February and March averaging only 39.9 and 40.1 respectively. Schedule B, which is attached, presents average weekly hours of work in durable goods, nondurable goods, and all manufacturing industries for each month from October 1940 through March 1941. The Bureau of Labor Statistics has conducted a series of surveys of important defense industries to determine the extent to which multiple shifts are being used, prevailing practices regarding the week-end shut-down, and the importance of the overtime factor. The material developed is contained in a reprint from the "Monthly Labor Review" and a series of brief reports which also are enclosed. These data, together with those contained in Schedules A and B, previously referred to, probably constitute the best available answer to your second question. Perhaps the most significant conclusion to be drawn from the information available is that in most defense industries, as well as in nondefense industries, there is still considerable opportunity for increasing production by increasing the forces employed in second and third shifts so that overtime for the individual worker need not yet be resorted to.

"Third. To what extent has reemployment been affected by the 40-hour law and how many employables are now unemployed?"

It is not possible to state in absolute terms the extent to which reemployment has been effectuated by the wage-and-hour law. Employment has been steadily increasing for more than a year. It is not possible to say in each instance how much has been due to the demands of the defense program, and how much has been due to the wage-and-hour law. We have in the files of the Wage and Hour Division a large number of statements made by individual employers, and reports of wage-and-hour inspectors, attributing employment increases in individual instances solely to the overtime provision of the wage-and-hour law. Many such reports come from establishments which are not engaged in defense production.

The Department of Labor compiles no estimates of the number of employables now unemployed.

"Fourth. Assuming a national income next year of more than $90,000,000,000, and an effort to raise defense expenditures to the level of $2,000,000,000 per month, do you not expect a labor shortage in the spring of 1942?"

Since the industrial workweek is an elastic factor, with average weekly hours at their present relatively low levels, and since the future is obscured by such influences as potential shortages of raw materials and probable development of specialized industrial facilities—factors which are not related to any possible restricted labor supply—it is impossible to forecast any general stringency in the near future.

The possibilities of increasing the labor supply by utilization of women not presently in the labor market, such as was done in the last war, and the shifting of unneeded agricultural workers to urban centers, will be studied. Taking all these factors into account, and assuming an intensive effort to train these workers in the necessary skills, I cannot visualize a general shortage of labor in the forseeable future, although shortages in particular crafts undoubtedly will develop.

"Fifth. Do you favor legislation to relax the restrictions of the 40-hour week when unemployment has been eliminated during this emergency; and if your answer is in the negative, please indicate your reasons."

So many factors must be weighed that only a qualified answer is possible. Employees in the principal defense industries, particularly skilled workers, are working under collective bargaining agreements which require the payment of time and a half wage rates—and in certain instances even more—for hours in excess of 40 a week. In basic iron and steel it is estimated by the Bureau of Labor Statistics that 67 percent of all employees are subject to such agreements, in steel fabricating 50 percent, in rubber 67 percent, in shipbuilding 50 percent, in aircraft and parts 33 percent, in automobiles and parts 75 percent. Legislative relaxation of the 40-hour week would not, of course, affect these organized workers; it would merely deprive the unorganized, who generally are the lowest paid and therefore in greatest need of protection, of the overtime benefits.

Retention of the 40-hour week provides the employer with an incentive to improve the efficiency of his operations in order to obtain maximum productivity from his labor. The relationship of longer hours of work to national health and worker morale should be taken into consideration. Finally, the ability of employers to pay the penalty overtime rate should be ascertained.

If the time should come when greater production is needed after all employables have been put to work, after everything has been done to increase output by improved efficiency of labor and management, and if, in addition, it appears that employers are unable to pay the penalty rate for overtime beyond 40 hours, then I should be in favor of the legislative relaxation which you mention. But even in that event thought should be given to whether the relaxation should be given to all industries, including those not concerned in the defense effort, or whether it should be extended only to those immediately concerned with defense production. Relaxation for all occupations might have the effect of stimulating certain of the luxury goods industries to a point where they would begin to divert needed labor from defense production.

It seems to me that our problem is not so much one of working hours as of training. Relaxation of the overtime provision, in my opinion, would have the effect of also relaxing the training effort; it would contribute to the exhaustion of our present supply of skilled labor and leave us unprepared at a future time when our necessities may be even more critical than they are now. As some one has said, our problem is not merely to win the 50-yard dash but to make sure that we win the 4-mile run.

I do not mean to imply that some overtime will not be necessary to meet the requirements of the projected defense load. But the considerations I have mentioned lead me to the conviction that the known disadvantages that would result from the elimination of the overtime penalty are far greater than the advantages that could be expected to result from its retention.

Sincerely yours,

FRANCES PERKINS.

My letters to Mr. Knudsen and Secretary Perkins were prompted by my keen interest in and my desire to secure maximum effort in our defense program, and that presents three separate questions: First, how to secure maximum production regardless of cost? Second, are rising costs, due to penalty payments, on top of wage-rate increases inimical to our national interests, including the question of inflation?

In agricultural sections a shortage of labor already exists. It is reported that military authorities have experienced difficulty in purchasing canned goods at what it considered to be fair and reasonable prices, and some believe that the present wage-and-hour law is affecting the output and the prices of canned goods, aggravated by a shortage in some crops, such as peas. Last week the Chairman of the Social Security Board reported that reports from reemployment offices throughout the country indicated a shortage of labor in 100 different occupations connected with the defense program, for 16 of which not a man could be furnished by any reemployment office. Last week an official of the Office of Production Management estimated that by next spring 4,000,000 additional skilled workers would be needed in the defense program if we are to produce defense matériel in accordance with present plans and expectations. Funds for five different agencies have been appropriated to train new workers for these jobs, but it should be apparent to all that 4,000,000 additional workers cannot be trained in that period. And from now on every farm boy taken for military service or a defense industry will accentuate the existing shortage of labor in agricultural sections.

It has been developed in the hearings of House and Senate committees that camp and other emergency construction in the defense program encountered a shortage of skilled workers as a result of which the Army was forced to pay much overtime. It was estimated that on the Camp Meade project alone overtime amounted to $200,000 per week. Practically all industry engaged in defense work is now working overtime and the Government, which in the final analysis means all the people, is footing the bill for penalty payments. Every major strike since the first of this year has been settled on the basis of increasing the base wage until the hourly or daily rate of pay exceeds anything heretofore known in this or any other country. Some of those increases may have been justified, and certainly I have never had the disposition to deny the fundamental fact that the laborer is worthy of his hire. On the contrary, I recognize the dignity of labor and will welcome the time when the financial reward for one who does a good job with his hands will be on a par with a good job with his head. In view of the fact that labor represents anywhere from 30 percent to 60 percent of the cost of a manufactured article, if we are to avoid a dangerous spiral of rising prices, we must cease treating overtime penalty payments as a proper wage scale and consider them in the light in which they were proposed to us in 1935 and as such written into the wage-and-hour law, namely, as a penalty designed to spread employment.

And if, as many of us believe, a satisfactory standard of living for all cannot be maintained in peacetime on a 40-hour week, it necessarily follows it cannot be maintained when we are called upon for the greatest productive effort in our national history. Those who will take the time and trouble to read the hearings of the Ways and Means Committee on the pending tax bill will find considerable testimony bearing on this subject. This week the Secretary of the Interior has called upon all householders who can afford to do so to buy now their coal for next winter on the ground that the coal mines running at full capacity will be unable to meet the demand at that time. Yet a new coal contract has just been negotiated for a 35-hour week, with a base pay of $7 per day, time and a half for overtime, and double time for certain other periods. That pay increase will of course be shortly reflected in a sharp increase in the price of coal, to say nothing of the shortage to which Secretary Ickes referred.

It is futile, of course, to attempt to designate any one thing that brought about the downfall of France, but many now agree that the French people were foolish to cling to a 40-hour week when their need for full production was so urgent. And it is reported when the Government took over the production of airplanes in France, the production of military planes fell to 38 per month, while Germany, working on a 60-hour week, was stepping up her production to 1,200 per month.

In my opinion, the situation that now confronts us is far more critical than the situation that confronted us in the spring of 1917. At that time Germany, with nothing comparable to her present war machine, was confronted by Great Britain, France, Italy, Russia, and Japan. We knew if we entered the war, our Allies could certainly hold Germany to the continent of Europe until we were prepared to render substantial assistance. Yet, on March 4, 1917, and before we knew definitely that we would enter the war, the Congress passed a bill authorizing President Wilson to suspend during the declared emergency the operation of the 8-hour day. It is now well recognized that if Great Britain goes under, we will be left facing Germany alone, and with no assurance in such contingency that Hitler will not be able to force the British as well as the French to turn over their fleets to him for operation in the Western Hemisphere. It will pay those who have not done so to read the article in the June issue of Reader's Digest on the plans of Hitler's brain trust for operations in the Western Hemisphere when his present program reaches that point. In a word, the situation that confronts us calls for our best productive effort consistent with health, and I, for one, do not believe our best productive effort can be made on the basis of a 40-hour week during this great national emergency. But whether or not I am right on that, I bring the situation to your attention with the hope it will from now on receive your best attention and the best attention of the executive branch of the Government. It is my purpose to shortly introduce a resolution calling for a study and a determination of this question as the basis for the adoption of a congressional policy, unless the joint committee now investigating defense expenditures include that in their study.

Shipment of American Oil to Japan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DAVID I. WALSH

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, June 12 (legislative day of Tuesday, June 10), 1941

ARTICLE FROM THE NEW YORK HERALD TRIBUNE

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, in view of the discussion in the press recently in regard to the eastern seaboard being threatened with gasless Sundays and other economies to supply petroleum supplies for national defense, I ask unanimous consent to have incorporated in the RECORD an informative article by Joseph Driscoll which appears in the Herald Tribune today.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Herald Tribune of June 12, 1941]

EIGHT HUNDRED THOUSAND BARRELS OF OIL A MONTH GOING TO JAPAN—WITH GASLESS SUNDAYS IN OFFING, UNITED STATES MAY MOVE TO CURB SHIPMENTS OF FUEL

(By Joseph Driscoll)

More than 800,000 barrels of American oil are being shipped monthly to Japan, it was learned yesterday, at a time when New York, the New England States, and the whole eastern seaboard are facing gasless Sundays and other economies to conserve petroleum supplies for national defense.

Investigation reveals that an embargo on oil shipments to Japan, a step urged by friends of invaded China, would permi conservation in this country of millions of gallons of oil, and, in addition, would permit return to the American flag of tankers now being used to transport the oil across the Pacific. Such tankers are badly needed to move oil from Texas and Gulf ports to New York and Baltimore, and to Canada and Great Britain.

Prodded by Members of Congress, Democrats and Republicans alike, the Roosevelt administration is reported to be considering the feasibility of halting oil shipments to Japan.

"If excessive shipments of oil to Japan are contributing largely to tanker shortage in the Atlantic, I think the situation should be corrected," Representative WILLIAM P. COLE, Jr. Democrat, of Maryland, wired the New York Herald Tribune in response to a request for his views. Mr. COLE has been leading the administration's fight in the House for passage of his bill to offset the shortage of tankers by facilitating construction of pipe lines in the Atlantic seaboard area.

Rear Admiral Harry E. Yarnell, former commander of the Asiatic Fleet, and honorary chairman of the American Committee for Nonparticipation in Japanese Aggression, has been a leader in the long campaign to deprive Japan of American war material used to kill Chinese. He believes an embargo on exports to Japan would not result in hostilities against the United States, and that it would be suicidal for Japan to tackle the American Navy.

Recalled to active duty last January 3, Admiral Yarnell is for the time being unable to speak out about American supplies for Japan. He wired the New York Herald Tribune from Newport, R. I., yesterday:

"In view of fact that I am now back on active duty, I feel it would be inadvisable for me to make any statement regarding oil supplies to Japan."

According to many authorities, Japan could not continue her undeclared war on China were it not for the generous shipments from the United States of petroleum, and other goods required to keep the war machine rolling. The United States Government could cut off these supplies immediately by officially recognizing that a de facto state of war exists between Japan and China. In that event, however, Japan might demand that the United States also cut off supplies to China.

FEAR RETALIATION MOVE

Even without recognizing the Sino-Japanese war, the State Department, through its Export Control Board, could refuse licenses for export of oil to Japan, as it has done with certain other products classified as essential to American defense. It is understood the State Department hesitates to take this step through fear that Japan, cut off from American supply sources, might strike in desperation at the oil fields of the Dutch East Indies.

Information obtainable here and abroad confirms the fact that the Japanese need for American and Dutch oil to run its navy, its army and its air force grows more acute each month. For 5 months a Tokyo mission has been negotiating with the Dutch East Indies for a new trade agreement to fill Japan's need for oil. These negotiations have just broken down; British-American support of the Dutch is blamed by the Japanese press, which is making veiled threats that the Japanese may resort to force to get the oil necessary for warfare.

Meanwhile, American oil is being shipped to Japan at the rate of 800,000 to 900,000 barrels a month, perhaps much more. Exact figures are difficult to obtain, since the Department of Commerce has curtailed its monthly summaries of American exports.

American oil sent to Japan is still considerable, although gradually being reduced. During 1940 oil exports to Japan averaged close to 2,000,000 barrels a month, the year's total being more than 22,000,000 barrels.

In March, the latest month for which figures can be had, the United States exported 1,553,000 barrels of petroleum products to Japan, compared with 1,279,000 barrels in February and 1,491,000 barrels in January. This year's reduction is attributed to a worldwide shortage of tankers, due to sinkings, and to American restrictions on the export of large metal drums and containers used for transporting crude oil and gasoline.

SHIP DATA KEPT SECRET

Complaint has been heard in Congress that the Maritime Commission, which has jurisdiction over American merchant ships, is unwilling to disclose how many American tankers, or former American tankers, are presently engaged in the oil export business. Detailed information on movements of American shipping is withheld as a military secret.

Upon inquiry an official of the Commission said no American tankers have gone to Japan for the last 3 years, although six tankers are plying to the Philippines and also to China "when they can get into China." The inquirer was assured that Japan is getting her American oil in bottoms flying foreign flags, not American.

There is a joker in this, study indicates, in that some of the tankers serving Japan formerly flew the American flag, were American owned and presumably are still largely American owned, having been transferred to the flags of small neutral countries to avoid supervision by the Maritime Commission and responsibility under the American neutrality law. For instance, it has been reported without contradiction that three American tankers recently were transferred to the flag of the Republic of Panama and were promptly chartered to Japan.

Japan, of course, has tankers, but they have been engaged mainly in ferrying oil from the Dutch East Indies. To haul oil from the Western Hemisphere, she has been obliged to charter tankers which until recently flew the flags of the United States, Norway, and other maritime powers but which now owe nominal allegiance to Panama, not heretofore famous for its merchant marine.

QUESTION ON OWNERSHIP

In Congress recently, during debate on the Cole pipe-line bill. Representative W. R. POAGE, Democrat of Texas, said: "I believe this Congress owes it to the people to determine what has become of the transport fleet owned by the oil companies of this Nation. What are the tankers doing that have been transferred into foreign registry? What oil are they carrying? Who is carrying oil to Japan today? I want to know who is carrying that oil. I called the Maritime Commission and they cannot tell me. They could not tell me how that oil is going. I cannot find out who in authority in this Nation will admit knowledge of how that oil is getting there, although there is no denial that the oil is moving across the Pacific Ocean, taking many times as long to make the trip across that ocean as it takes to bring a load of oil from Port Arthur to New York or from Houston to Baltimore."

With several other House members, Representative POAGE suggested that, if the State Department delayed action, Congress should take steps to prohibit oil exports to hostile nations, all the more so since the Berlin-Rome Axis was expanded to take in Tokyo.

Representative John M. COFFEE, Democrat of Washington, estimated the United States is now shipping 800,000 barrels, each containing 42 gallons of gasoline, to Japan every month. Representative Cole replied that the figure was actually higher, being around 30,000 barrels daily. And he added:

"I believe if the State Department would explain the reasons supporting the present policy the people of our country would appreciate their position."

The Manufacture and Production of Magnesium

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS A. JENKINS
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 12, 1941

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I wish to discuss for a few minutes the question of the manufacture and production of magnesium. Very little is known by the average citizen with reference to this commodity. Some are inclined to associate it with magnesia or with manganese. It is a different product entirely. It is a product that resembles aluminum and is used largely for the same purpose.

Magnesium is better adapted to many usages than is aluminum. The demand for it in the world is increasing tremendously. There is no danger that it will displace aluminum because there is a great demand for both of these products. In fact the demand for defense purposes is so great that the demand is far in excess of the supply. By reason of this fact, many commercial plants manufacturing aluminum articles will soon be restricted in their production because of the demand for aluminum in the national-defense program. The same is true as to magnesium. Scientific men of the Nation are driving themselves to discover methods and to perfect plans whereby the production of magnesium can be increased. It is estimated that 30,000,000 pounds will be produced in the United States in this year, 1941. This compares very favorably with the fact that 12,500,000 pounds were produced in 1940. The amount produced in 1940 was twice as much as that produced in 1938. Magnesium was used during the World War only for very unusual work. The amount produced was so small that it was practicably negligible in the production of war materials. Magnesium is used now in its regular form in the production of some war material but its use is multiplied when it is used as an alloy mixture with aluminum and zinc and other metals. This metal is in great demand because of its lightness as well as its tensile strength and its reaction to high degrees of heat.

Magnesium is produced only in a few places in the United States. The Dow Chemical Co. of Michigan is, without doubt, the largest producer of this important metal. A very great percentage of this production is produced from salt brines taken from the earth and from salt water taken from the sea. I think that all the production of the Dow Chemical Co. is from salt brines. There is some production from rock in which some form of magnesium is found. The Government has been experimenting very extensively with reference to the production in this method. It is likely that the inventive genius of the American scientists will unlock Nature's door and will find sufficient stores from which this very necessary metal can be manufactured.

The salt brines can be located in many parts of the country. In southeastern Ohio, where the district which I have the honor to represent is located, can be found unlimited quantities of salt brine in which there is a very heavy magnesium-chloride content. For years salt brines have been developed in that section and a large quantity of salt has been manufactured in Meigs County and in other counties in that territory. This manufacture of salt has been carried on for the last 75 or 100 years. At one time the salt industry was more flourishing than it is now. These salt brines are reached by drilling wells. In some places the brines are found to be shallow and reachable without much drilling, while in other places they are located deep and the process of drawing them from the earth is rather difficult and expensive.

For several years these salt brines have been tapped in the section around Charleston, W. Va., and in that section is now located one of the largest chemical manufacturing centers in the world. This location is only 40 or 50 miles from the territory in southeastern Ohio to which I have already referred. There have been many experimental wells drilled in southeastern Ohio. Some of these in Lawrence County have been operated and the salt brine has been resolved into its component parts and has been disposed of for various purposes all over the world. These brines yield many byproducts that find their way into the channels of commerce. At the present time there is a great agitation in that section of the State by reason of the prospects of the manufacture of magnesium. The residents of Athens, Perry, and Hocking Counties have been very much interested in salt brines in that section. Many wells have been drilled and the products of the wells have been analyzed. Those who are especially interested in these operations assert that the brines in that section of the country are more thoroughly charged with magnesium chloride than the waters of any other section. One scientific analysis has indicated that these salt waters are charged with 203 different valuable ingredients. Mr. Philip Faine and Mr. Charles Jaynes, of Athens County, Ohio, have been very active in presenting to the world the merits of the salt brines available in their section of the country. The people all through southeasten Ohio are confident that time will prove that the supply of magnesium chloride in that section of Ohio is inexhaustible and that if developed it will answer the needs of the country and the world for this very necessary and valuable metal.

It is to be hoped that the Government scientists will immediately investigate these salt brines in southeastern Ohio and that they will find there a source of supply for which they have been looking.

The Dow Chemical Co. has, and I think with some encouragement from the Government, established a plant at Freeport, Tex., which is on the Gulf of Mexico. This plant will attempt to manufacture magnesium from sea water. It is expected that within a year this Freeport plant will be in operation, and if the experiment is a success will produce probably 25,000,000 pounds a year. This experiment may prove a success because the sea water is an inexpensive product, easy to get. Those who are familiar with the manufacture of magnesium, however, maintain that salt brines located in southeastern Ohio contain a very much greater content of magnesium chloride than does the salt water of the sea.

I am glad to call this matter to the attention of the House. I also hope that the Federal Government through its various agencies will exert every possible influence toward the manufacture of this very necessary product. It is well known that no country in the world has been so forward in the production of these new materials as our own great country. We produce a very great percentage of all the aluminum produced in the world, and it is my hope that we will be producing an equal quantity of magnesium within the next 2 or 3 years. Our section of the country, which has given to the country unlimited quantities of the finest coal produced anywhere, is ready, willing, and anxious to make its contribution to the production of another great commodity which the world needs so badly.

Gasoline Taxes and the Farmer

OF
HON. WILLIAM L. NELSON
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 12, 1941

Mr. NELSON. Mr. Speaker, I often feel that I was born at a most fortunate time. It has been my privilege to witness the passing of much that was old and the coming of more that is new. In memory I still see long lines of covered wagons passing the old farm home in Missouri, the occupants on their way to take up new lands to the west. While the linchpin wagon had even then become a curiosity, I recall having seen such. Gradually, as a family vehicle, the farm wagon, provided with extra seats on Sunday, gave way to the spring wagon or hack, the buggy, and then to the more pretentious carriage. Next came that great revolutionary change in transportation—the automobile.

The first automobile, a crude "horseless buggy," owned west of the Mississippi River, as far as I have been able to learn, was brought to Boonville, Mo., in my old home county, by Ferd E. Arn, a local gunsmith and dealer in firearms and accessories. I recall with what pity, ridicule, or contempt, as the case might be, Mr. Arn was looked upon. Some questioned his sanity, practically everybody his judgment. Surely such a thing as a horseless vehicle was out of the question. While there was much resentment that such a horse-frightening monster should claim the rights of the road, there was, of course, curiosity.

At the time referred to, I was connected with the county fair. Anxious to increase gate receipts, a deal was made with Mr. Arn, owner of the "devil buggy," as automobiles were then frequently called, to take his car a distance of 15 miles to the fairgrounds and drive it around the half-mile track, for which he was to receive $50. The event was widely advertised; the result was most disappointing. Many, who otherwise would have attended the fair on "big Thursday" remained at home for fear they might meet the monstrosity burning up the road at 15 miles per hour. Remember that in those days horses were not accustomed to cars.

It is a far cry from the day of that pioneer Missouri automobile to the present, when many millions of cars are owned in the United States, more by far than in any other country. So every car owner, every truck owner, every tractor owner is directly interested in legislation which the Congress is about to consider. I refer to proposed higher Federal taxes on gasoline. While my concern is for all, I am thinking first of the farmer.

The great majority of the people whom I am privileged to represent in Congress are farmers. Nor have I ever been without farm ownership and interest. The story of Ferd E. Arn, coupled with familiar scenes of today on every street and road, on every farm and in countless fields, is without a parallel. In this connection the years have brought a most revolutionary shift from animal power to mechanical power on the farm. The extent to which such substitution has taken place is generally well enough appreciated to make unnecessary any great elaboration on my part.

But I cannot resist a brief reference to the widespread use of the farm tractor in the planting, cultivating, and harvesting of farm crops; its use in bringing in the hay, in hauling wood, in repairing farm roads, and in providing power for other farm work.

I mention, too, the use of the stationary gasoline engine on farms to run threshers, ensilage cutters, feed grinders, small sawmills, and water pumps, or its extensive use as the power unit to generate electricity where R. E. A. or other electric power is not yet available.

I also mention briefly the economic importance of the automobile and the truck to the farmer and his family. Before the development of the automobile and motortruck, the farmer's trading area was limited by the transportation provided by "flesh and blood" animal power. The farmer's market was the nearest market unless he enjoyed an unusually favorable location on a railroad. In the business of farming delays are costly because the products are usually perishable. Even livestock may lose weight during shipping delays on the way to market, the farmer's income being thereby reduced.

The farmer has turned to mechanization not because of any desire to avoid hard work nor because he has had excess money to burn. The problem of the farmer in any economic system is to produce as efficiently and as unfailingly as possible. Farmers as a group have found the development of mechanisms powered by internal-combustion engines an invaluable aid in the solution of that problem. Commercial farmers who fail to mechanize their operations frequently face increasing difficulties resulting from the more efficient operations of competing farmers.

I hope I have been able to make clear to you in a few words the truly essential importance of the internal-combustion engine, which really is the basis of agricultural mechanization to the farmer and to his business. The importance of the internal-combustion engine to the farmer stresses the importance of the gasoline used to operate these engines. Gasoline is as fundamental to farm production as is much farm machinery long in common use and is as essential to modern means of transportation as is the wheel. Probably the principal factor responsible for the widespread use on the farms of mechanisms driven by internal-combustion engines is the reasonable cost at which gasoline has been available.

Twenty-odd years ago our farmers were told, "Food will win the war." The war was won—if, in fact, wars are ever won—and food from America's farms had a big part in the winning. Now, with much of the world again at war, the importance of food is again stressed. There is, though, a very decided difference as compared with a quarter century ago. Gasoline-powered machinery is now, on a great number of farms, used instead of horses and mules. So any burdensome Federal tax on gasoline would fall heavily on the farmer.

It has been said that the cost of gasoline is as important an item in the cost of running a farm as in almost any other business except that of the commercial trucker.

The Federal Government for the past few years has been striving to improve the lot of the farmer by bringing farm prices at least up to the cost of production, the present House having gone far toward making parity prices possible. The good that has been done should not now be undone by the levying of a much higher Federal gasoline tax, which would add greatly to the cost of farming.

Farmers are said to use about one-quarter of all the gasoline consumed in the United States each year. Their success depends to a great extent on the ability to grow crops and to transport them to market as cheaply as possible. The cost of gasoline is one of the most important factors in determining these costs. So, Mr. Speaker, I trust that in the revenue bill now being written no additional Federal tax on gasoline may be found necessary.

In closing I wish to make one additional observation, digressing to some extent, but still having in mind the automobile—yes, and its owner and the man who services it.

Along the highways of our country there are today thousands of well-kept filling stations and tourist camps, many of them beautifully landscaped, and with flowers and shrubs so arranged as to make most attractive surroundings. Almost without exception, so far as my experience goes, the owners, attendants, or others in charge are most courteous, ready to extend every assistance. "Service with a smile" is not limited to patrons but is extended alike to all travelers. Furthermore, I have found these men—yes, and there are efficient women in charge of filling stations, too—exceedingly well informed. A pretty good rule when seeking information in any community is to follow the advice, "Ask the man at the filling station."

Referring to courtesy and consideration, would that the conduct of the average man in the automobile characterized these qualities so completely as does the conduct of the men who sell him gas and service his car. Road courtesy has changed during the few decades which have passed since Ferd E. Arn first tried out that early and crude car in Missouri. This, though, is no reason why a burdensome Federal gasoline tax, which would fall most heavily upon the farmer, should be levied.

Unselfish and Helpful?

ARTICLE FROM THE BRIDGEPORT (CONN.) LIFE

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, from the February 15 issue of the Bridgeport Life, Bridgeport, Conn., comes the following editorial:

[From the Bridgeport (Conn.) Life of February 15, 1941]

MORE ABOUT ELEANOR

At one of Eleanor's press conferences—oh, yes, both the President and Mrs. President have their press conferences—the First Lady of the land was asked, "What is the name of the charity to which you claim you are giving your earnings as a columnist and a lecturer?" Eleanor ducked the inquiry and the question remains unanswered. It will be remembered that Congress voted to exempt her from paying income taxes on her earnings, as she claimed she gave them all to charity. The echo still is, "What charity?"

Up in Pittsfield, Mass., they tell another good story about Eleanor's charity business. It seems the big Democrats of that community were staging a charity drive and thought by engaging Eleanor to open the drive with one of her sympathetic appeals to all mankind, it would pack the hall and increase the funds. A letter to the First Lady inquiring the price and the date was answered regarding date only, which gave the committee the idea there would be no charge for her services in such a good cause.

The affair was given to a half-filled auditorium and the gross receipts hit only $450. Now for the shock. Two weeks later the committee received a bill from the First Lady for $1,000 for the lecture. The committee was forced to pass the hat among the townspeople to collect the other $550. This tops the concert singer who appeared as the star in the President's birthday drive when the receipts were $2,400 and she demanded $2,000 for her services. Charity is not such a bad racket after all.

Mrs. Roosevelt loves money as much as she does the workers. She loves money as much as she does publicity. This is her right, but why be so hypocritical about it all?

Overcoming Bottlenecks In Strategic, Critical, And Essential Materials In National Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HOMER D. ANGELL
OF OREGON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 12, 1941

REPORT BY THE RESEARCH INSTITUTE OF AMERICA

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, in forging ahead with our national-defense program, each day we are confronted with the lack of sufficient supply of certain strategic, critical, and essential materials needed in defense production. Mr. Stettinius, Director of Priorities in the Office of Production Management, states that our defense orders will require 95 to 100 percent of all available aluminum, including scrap, during the month of June, by reason of increases in quantities going into aircraft, naval construction, and steel mills for alloys and other purposes. As a result, serious curtailment of civilian uses of this metal becomes necessary. The 53,000,000 pounds of aluminum produced this month will go to defense production, and it is estimated that expansion in the production of this essential metal will boost the 1940 yearly output of 420,000,000 pounds to more than 800,000,000 pounds by July 1942. As a matter of fact, it seems probable now that this increased output will be wholly insufficient to meet our defense demands, regardless of civilian needs.

Through speeding up of power production on the Columbia River, we are now producing in the Columbia Basin 30 percent of the present aluminum demand. Mr. Gano Dunn, of the Office of Production Management, states that there will be a deficit of 1,400,000 tons of steel production during the calendar year 1941, and a deficit of 6,400,000 tons for 1942 is forecasted. He advises that at the present time 75 percent of current steel production is going into purely civilian use.

The United States has the natural resources and power and plant potentialities to make us practically self-sufficient in these materials so vital to national defense. There is included in the supply bill for the Interior Department an item of $130,000 for the purpose of presenting ways and means to establish broader uses of Bonneville power in helping to solve this problem by locating and developing natural deposits contiguous to the Bonneville project, which will add to our supply of many of these essential materials. There are vast deposits of metals and nonmetals in the whole Northwest area which, together with cheap electric power, may be the means of adding materially to the stock piles so urgently needed in furthering our program of defense.

By substituting various materials for those which are scarce and difficult to obtain, we may also find a partial solution to this vexing problem. The Research Institute of America recently made a survey and report on the substitution of materials for those which are scarce which is illuminating and gives valuable information on this important subject and, under leave heretofore granted me, I include as a part of my remarks the report, which is as follows:

A REPORT ON NATIONAL DEFENSE
(By the Research Institute of America, New York, N. Y.)

SUBSTITUTES FOR SCARCE MATERIALS

The increasing production due to the defense program is creating serious shortages in items essential to many businesses. In particular, nondefense industry is being hit by the fact that essential materials are being diverted, in some cases almost completely, to defense industry while nondefense industry faces starvation. The system of priorities is one of the factors responsible. The Director of Priorities has frankly stated: "Wherever there is a priorities situation, somebody is going to get hurt." In some cases, price rises make it uneconomical for a businessman to use materials formerly going into his products. The necessity for diverting shipping facilities for the carrying of war materials also creates a problem for nonessential industry where it must have its supplies—particularly those from abroad—transported over large distances.

In order to avoid going out of business, firms confronted with such problems have either of two alternatives. They may (1) convert their activity to defense production or (2) seek substitutes for the unavailable materials. The following pages list substitute possibilities based on suggestions made by the Office of Production Management's Conservation Unit and on measures taken by institute members to meet the problem.

Research Institute of America recommendation: In order to solve problems of this kind, the Government has set up a Conservation Unit in the Office of Production Management under the direction of Robert McConnell. It works in close cooperation with the National Academy of Sciences and the Bureau of Standards. Do not hesitate to take your problems to the Conservation Unit, Office of Production Management, or to the United States Bureau of Standards, both in Washington, D. C. Another valuable source of information is your own trade association. If it has not already begun to study the problem of substitutes, take the initiative yourself in urging that it be done.

SUBSTITUTE MATERIALS USED IN GERMANY

The institute has studied the use of substitute materials in Germany where a most extensive campaign for the development of substitutes has been waged since 1933. The German Society of Engineers and other organizations issued frequent industrial standards for substitute materials and literature discussing possible substitutes in the light of their durability, machining qualities, resistance to stress, wear, temperature, etc. Below are some of the most popular of the German substitutes.

Article	Material substituted
Acid-proof vats, tanks, containers, chemical equipment of corrosion-resistant metals—lead, nickel, copper, tin.	Plastics, in particular Haveg plastic and Havegit cement for ceramic joints, tiles, etc.
Agitator rods (in chemical industry particularly rayon).	Glass.
Alkali-proof vats, tanks chemical equipment.	Various plastics, in particular I. G. Dye Trust alkali-resistant cements for ceramic joints (Asplit cements), alkali-resistant plastics (Havegit).
Asbestos	Glass wool.
Asbestos filler in plastics	Wood as sawdust or pulverized.
Bathroom fixtures, plumbing (metal).	Glass and porcelain.
Bearings friction (heavy duty).	Synthetic resin.
Beer brewing equipment (copper).	Glass, porcelain.
Bristles, pig	Whale hair and beard, plastic bristles.
Bearings, tin alloy	Lead, bronze, nickel-containing lead alloys, cadmium alloys.
Cables, electric (lead covered).	Plastic covers.
Chemical equipment. (See Alkali-resistant and Acid-resistant.)
Copal	Synthetic copals.
Cork (bottle)	Poplar wood.
Cork for men's hats	Pressed flaked "foam" plastics.
Cork (heat insulant)	Rubber, foam, plastic foam, glass wool, aluminum foil, cardboard, diatomite, kieselguhr (these substances cannot easily be used as cold insulants as they are not water resistant).
Corrosion-resisting piples, containers.	Porcelain and other ceramics.
Doorknobs	Glass or plastics.
Doorplates (for locks)	Do.
Drapery rods	Glass.
Electric condenser foil (tin, lead).	Pure aluminum or magnesium-aluminum alloy.
Furniture fittings (metal)	Plastics.
Gear wheels, bearings	Laminated phenol plastics.

Article	Material substituted
Guttapercha	Plastics.
Hot-water boilers, copper (for small residences).	Copper-plated steel or aluminum sheets, zinc plate, enameled sheet metal.
Insulants	Glass wool, glass cotton, glass wool on wire netting, corrugated cardboard, spun-glass mats, strips of glass wool.
Insulation against water in cellars or building.	Synthetic resin sheets, bitumen sheets.
Insulants, heat resisting	Glass wool.
Insulant, sound proofing	Do.
Leather, decorative	Plastics, in particular Mipolam.
Leather packings	Synthetic rubber (Buna).
Light fixtures (wall brackets, etc.).	Glass.
Linoleum (cork, sisal, etc.)	Various plastics such as Igelit, Mipolam, Stabol.
Linoleum filler	Flaked plastic "foams."
Mattress filling	Rubber foam, plastic foam, glass wool, slag foam.
Packings, leather	Synthetic rubber (Buna).
Pipes and other plumbing fixtures, metal.	Porcelain and other ceramics.
Pipes, cast iron, zinced	Bituminous coverings.
Pipes, copper, used in food industry.	Glass.
Pipes, low pressure (cold water).	Thioresins (Mipolam).
Platinum metals as electric contact points.	Small bands of platinum-iridium or palladium silver imbedded in bronze by rolling.
Radiators, cast-iron	Sheet metal (33⅓ percent saving in weight).
Red lead	Iron oxide.
Rods, agitator (in chemical industry, particularly rayon).	Glass.
Rods, drapery	Do.
Roofing, metal	Slate and tile.
Steel shapes in residential buildings.	Bricks, arches, brick work.
Tin plate for canning	Glass.
Toilet flush water containers, metal.	Glass or porcelain.
Towel racks	Glass.
Tubes, containers for foods and cosmetics (tin, lead).	Aluminum.
Warm water heaters (for kitchens and small residences).	Pressed glass.
Washboards	Do.
Waste water plumbing	Glass or porcelain.
Waxes, natural	Various synthetic WAXES.
Weights for fish nets	Pressed glass.
Wicker for furniture	Plastic materials.
Zinced sheet metal	Pressed glass.

Resolution of Executive Committee of San Francisco Chapter of "France Forever"

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SHERIDAN DOWNEY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, June 12 (legislative day of Tuesday, June 10), 1941

Mr. DOWNEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a resolution adopted by the executive committee of the San Francisco chapter of "France Forever," relating to the critical conditions in the world today.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the executive committee of France Forever in New York did, on the 16th day of May 1941, address to the President of the United States a communication expressing the views of said executive committee upon the present French situation, manifested by the action taken by the Vichy regime in acquiescing to the demands made by the Nazi Government; and

Whereas it appears to the members of the executive committee of the San Francisco chapter that the forced collaboration imposed upon the Vichy regime by the Nazi forces of evil threatens the liberty of all the freedom-loving people of the world, as well as the security of the Western Hemisphere; and

Whereas the granting of the use of naval, air, or military bases by the Vichy regime in France, North and West Africa, to the Axis Powers is a threat to the safety of the United States and its historic Monroe Doctrine; and

Whereas Gen. Charles de Gaulle has demonstrated that he is a fearless, conscientious, and courageous leader of the free French forces, and there is continually rallying to his said forces the liberty-loving Frenchmen throughout the world, including those who are able to escape from the Nazi dominated French territories: Therefore be it

Resolved by the executive committee of the San Francisco Chapter of France Forever:

1. That we are in accord with the views communicated by the executive committee of France Forever to the President of the United States under date of May 16, 1941; and be it further resolved;

2. That it is urgent to protect against Axis penetration into Martinique, North Africa, Dakar, and Indochina, penetration which is helped by Vichy agents; and be it further

3. That we believe that the time has now arrived when the free French forces, led by Gen. Charles de Gaulle, should be recognized by the United States Government as the only free and independent government of France; and be it further resolved,

4. That a copy of this resolution be sent to the President of the United States, the Secretary of State, the Attorney General, the chairmen of the Senate and House Foreign Relations Committees, and to United States Senator DOWNEY, of California.

Attested a true copy.

A. CUEVERDID,
President, San Francisco Chapter, France Forever.

PAUL CRUCIANO,
Secretary, San Francisco Chapter, France Forever.

Shall the Nation Passively Submit to the Desecration of Its Own Flag?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BERTRAND W. GEARHART

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 12, 1941

LETTER FROM CAPT. JAMES P. McGOVERN, OF WASHINGTON, D. C.

Mr. GEARHART. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a letter addressed, under date of June 10, 1941, to Hon. HATTON W. SUMNERS, chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, from the capable pen of Capt. James P. McGovern, of the District of Columbia Bar, a letter which relates to a measure now pending in the House of Representatives in which I am very much interested, a bill to prevent the desecration and mutilation of the flag of the United States.

In its original form the bill, indexed and numbered as S. 218, was introduced in the Senate on January 8, 1941, by Senator CHARLES O. ANDREWS, of Florida. Supported by numerous patriotic organizations, including the American Legion and the Daughters of the American Revolution, the bill, amended as to form in accordance with the suggestions of the Attorney General of the United States, passed the Senate on April 4, 1941.

Prior to its enactment in the other Chamber, Senator VAN NUYS, as chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary of the United States Senate, submitted the measure to the Attorney General, who, after study, endorsed the proposed legislation and suggested that, in the interest of uniformity, the form of the bill be changed so as to conform to a similar statute now in force in the District of Columbia, a suggestion which was readily complied with.

Discussing the legislation, the Attorney General said:

> There is at present no Federal statute of general application making it a criminal offense to desecrate or mutilate the flag of the United States. * * * Legislation on the subject appears to be desirable. The bill under consideration, however, would not sufficiently protect the flag against use for advertising purposes. It is suggested that perhaps the best approach to the matter would be to extend the existing law relating to the District of Columbia to the rest of the United States.

Captain McGovern, the author of the communication to the distinguished chairman of our Committee on the Judiciary, to which I have referred, is a lawyer of great ability and national reputation, whose public expressions in respect to public issues command the attention of the country. As a veteran of the World War, with a record of service with the American Expeditionary Forces, there can be no question of his right to be heard in relation to the subject with which he deals.

Those who are so fortunate as to find the time to give consideration to his learned and constructive comments upon this very timely legislative proposal will agree that that which he had to say is well worthy of the serious consideration of the Congress, I am quite sure.

Captain McGovern's letter follows:

McGOVERN & McCARTHY,
Washington, D. C., June 10, 1941.

Hon. HATTON W. SUMNERS,
Chairman, Committee on the Judiciary, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Re S. 218: An act to prevent desecration and mutilation of the flag of the United States.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: It is not my purpose to make a Flag Day speech in reply to your letter of April 23, 1941, nor to intrude on your patience by reviewing legislative history regarding the flag, with which you are most familiar. However, the approach of the one hundred and sixty-fourth birthday of our national emblem arouses my patriotic fervor to such a degree that I feel constrained to make a further attempt to alleviate, if not overcome, the opposition which you have indicated to the above bill. In so doing I shall address my appeal to your judicial temperament and not resort to any flag waving.

The purpose of Senator ANDREWS' bill, S. 218, which passed the Senate April 4, 1941, and has been referred to the Committee on the Judiciary of the House, of which you are chairman, is to provide Federal or national legislation "to prevent desecration and mutilation" of the national emblem. As originally introduced, S. 218 was limited to provisions to prevent the desecration and mutilation of the flag, but as reported and amended by the Senate Judiciary Committee and subsequently adopted by the Senate, it followed the language of the present act applicable to the District of Columbia and included restrictions against the use of the flag for advertising purposes. Such revised bill is in accord with the opinion of the Attorney General relative to S. 218 dated March 5, 1941, which stated, among other things, that—

"There is at present no Federal statute of general application making it a criminal offense to desecrate or mutilate the flag of the United States. There is such a statute applicable to the District of Columbia, which forbids the public mutilation or defacement of the flag and which also prohibits the use of the flag for advertising purposes (U. S. Code, title 4, sec. 3). Legislation on the subject appears to be desirable. * * * It is suggested that perhaps the best approach to the matter would be to extend the existing law relating to the District of Columbia to the rest of the United States."

Your objections to S. 218 appear to be based on the fact that all the States have enacted various, but not uniform, laws affording a measure of protection to the flag, and that the States can be trusted to enforce such laws. Many, if not all the States, have adopted their own State flags, and I am sure you are acquainted with some of the city flags of various municipalities. The people are and should be proud of these emblems, Federal, State, and municipal, but it is no reflection on their attachment to these standards to be reminded that the Stars and Stripes, Old Glory, is the flag of the people in their capacity as citizens of the United States as distinguished from their capacity as citizens of the State and municipalities. It therefore seems a little strange that the representatives of the people in their capacity as citizens of the State have taken steps to protect the national emblem and that the representatives of the people in their capacity as citizens of the United States should do nothing about it. In answer to this, you express the view that, if the principles of democracy are to prevail, all governmental powers which they can discharge should be held back in the States and local units and that the people back home "must be kept on the job if they are to retain their interest, their serious responsibility, and develop their governmental capacities." You also state that "it would be a much healthier thing for all communities for the constable to arrest a person desecrating the flag, or that the people in the community do it, have them tried in a local court by local officers elected by the people, than to have them arrested by a Federal marshal and tried in a court commissioned by Washington." These sentiments might well be applied to many Federal laws but, concededly, there are conditions under which the people may not be able to act locally. If there is any purpose or merit in a law to prevent the desecration and mutilation of the flag, I propose to show that there may be circumstances under which such protection cannot be extended except pursuant to Federal legislation.

As stated by Mr. Justice Harlan in Halter v. Hayward (27 S. C. 419, 422), in which case the Supreme Court recognized the right of the State to adopt legislation for the protection of the national flag, the flag "signifies government resting on the consent of the governed, liberty regulated by law, the protection of the weak against the strong, security against the exercise of arbitrary power, and absolute safety for free institutions against foreign aggression." He also stated that "one who loves the Union will love the State in which he resides, and love, both of the common country and of the State will diminish in proportion as respect for the flag is weakened." The flag being a symbol, it seems unfortunate that laws must be enacted to insure its protection and respect, but such laws have apparently been found necessary. If laws, like flags, could be regarded as emblems of those principles which we, as citizens, are proud to maintain, there would be no occasion to impose fines and penalties for their infringement. I have witnessed the respect and emotions of people standing before the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution and even the Magna Carta on display in the Congressional Library, but it is very doubtful that they would doff their hats in the presence of the Federal Statutes at Large.

Although, as indicated, all the States have adopted laws to prevent the desecration and mutilation of the flag, a very interesting situation arises in regard to the enforcement of such laws on lands or property acquired by the Government in such States. Until recently it was generally accepted that all lands and property acquired by the United States were within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Federal Government and prosecution for offenses occurring on Government lands and property could not be maintained under State laws. This question of jurisdiction, as you will recall, arises under article I, section 8 (par. 17) of the Constitution, which provides, in part, as follows:

"The Congress shall have power to exercise exclusive legislation * * * over all places purchased by consent of the Legislature of the State in which the same shall be, for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dockyards, and other needful buildings."

In view of the rapid expansion of the acquisition of lands and properties by the United States for governmental purposes, the nature of the jurisdiction over such lands becomes very important. In the recent case of James, etc. v. Dravo Contracting Co. (302 U. S. 134, 58 S. C. 208), decided December 6, 1937, the Supreme Court held, in effect, that the extent of the jurisdiction acquired by the Government over such lands, etc., depends on the degree of sovereignty conveyed or surrendered by the States. The Court stated as follows:

"It is not unusual for the United States to own within a State lands which are set apart and used for public purposes. Such ownership and use without more do not withdraw the lands from the jurisdiction of the State. The lands 'remain part of her territory and within the operation of her laws, save that the latter cannot affect the title of the United States or embarrass it in using the lands or interfere with its right of disposal.' Clause 17 governs those cases where the United States acquires lands with the consent of the legislature of the State for the purposes there described. If lands are otherwise acquired, and jurisdiction is ceded by the State to the United States, the terms of the cession, to the extent that they may lawfully be prescribed, that is, consistently with the carrying out of the purpose of the acquisition, determine the extent of the Federal jurisdiction."

Acting under the above provision of the Constitution, the Congress has defined certain crimes and made same punishable under Federal law when committed within or on lands reserved or acquired for the use of the United States "for the erection of a fort, magazine, arsenal, dockyard, or other needful building" (U. S. Criminal Code, ch. 11, sec. 451, par. "third"; 18 U. S. C. A. 451). Said provision, as recently amended by the act of June 11, 1940, provides as follows:

"The crimes and offenses defined in this chapter shall be punished as herein prescribed: * * *

"Third. When committed within or on any lands reserved or acquired for the use of the United States, and under the exclusive or concurrent jurisdiction thereof, or any place purchased or otherwise acquired by the United States by consent of the legislature of the State in which the same shall be, for the erection of a fort, magazine, arsenal, dockyard, or other useful buildings."

The act of June 11, 1940 (H. R. 8119) inserted "or concurrent" after "exclusive" and before "jurisdiction" and omitted "exclusive" before "use of the United States." As indicated in the report of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary (No. 1708) on said bill, the amendment was necessary to overcome the effect of the above Dravo case in which it was held "that a State may properly maintain partial or concurrent jurisdiction over certain Federal reservations," and that "the bill will have the effect of giving the United States concurrent jurisdiction with the States over criminal matters arising on such reservations where the United States does not have exclusive jurisdiction."

Following the reasoning and logic of the Dravo case and prior decisions of the Supreme Court, it is difficult to understand how the Congress can confer jurisdiction on the United States where the State has withheld it. The jurisdiction acquired by the United States depends on the nature and extent of the grant by the States. If the State reserves a measure of jurisdiction or concurrent jurisdiction the United States acquires something and undoubtedly the amendment was intended to allow the United States to proceed under such jurisdiction as it acquired—although it might not be exclusive.

However, chapter 11 of the Criminal Code, in which the above provision appears, relates only to the crimes therein specified. Needless to say, there is no reference in said chapter to desecration and mutilation of the flag, but the following interesting provision does appear:

"Whoever, within the territorial limits of any State, organized Territory, or district, but within or upon any of the places now existing or hereafter reserved, or acquired, described in section 451 of this title, shall do or omit the doing of any act, or thing which is not made penal by any laws of Congress, but which if committed or omitted within the jurisdiction of the State, Territory, or district in which such place is situated, by the laws thereof in force on February 1, 1940, and remaining in force at the time of the doing or omitting the doing of such act or thing, would be penal, shall be deemed guilty of a like offense and be subject to a like punishment" (U. S. Criminal Code, sec. 289, as amended, June 6, 1940; 18 U. S. C. A. 468).

As stated by the Supreme Court in People of Puerto Rico v. Shell Co. (302 U. S. 253, 58 S. C. 167), "Prosecutions under this section are not to enforce the laws of the State, Territory, or district, but to enforce the Federal law the details of which instead of being recited are adopted by reference."

Assuming that violations of the State laws relating to the desecration and mutilation and even advertising of the flag may be prosecuted in the Federal courts under the above section, the question nevertheless remains as to the extent of the jurisdiction acquired by the United States in and to the lands or property on which such violations occur. In any event it is extremely doubtful that such crimes can be prosecuted in the Federal court if they are committed on lands other than those acquired by the United States "for the erection of a fort, magazine, arsenal, dockyard, or other needful building."

If the above observations arrest the attention regarding the extent of jurisdiction acquired by the United States, as it is believed they should, the situation becomes more serious and important as to lands and property acquired under the act of August 21, 1935 (U. S. C. A., ch. 1 (A)), entitled "An act to provide for the preservation of historic American sites, buildings, objects, and antiquities of historical significance," etc., it being declared to be "a national policy to preserve for public use historic sites, buildings, and objects of national significance for the inspiration and benefit of the people of the United States." Under said act, the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to make surveys, researches, and investigations to determine what properties possess value as commemorating or illustrating the history of the United States and to acquire, in the name of the United States, by gift, purchase, or otherwise, any such properties or to enter into agreements with States, municipalities, associations, and others to restore, protect, maintain, and operate the same. The Secretary is also authorized to perform all acts and to issue such rules and regulations as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of the act, and any violation of such rules and regulations is made a crime. Among the many historic sites and objects which the Federal Government has acquired and now being maintained by the Interior Department "for the inspiration and benefit of the people of the United States" (to say nothing of the great national parks) may be mentioned Gettysburg, the Lincoln Memorial, the Lee Mansion, the Statue of Liberty, and Fort McHenry, over which fort the national emblem was flying to afford the inspiration for the national anthem. Said act contains the following significant provision:

"Nothing in this act shall be held to deprive any State, or political subdivision thereof, of its civil and criminal jurisdiction in and over lands acquired by the United States under this act" (sec. 5).

The fact again remains, however, that the nature and extent of the jurisdiction acquired by the United States over lands under the above act depends on the nature of the consent or grant by the States. It is very doubtful, to say the least, that the provisions of chapter 11 of the Criminal Code, referred to above, including those adopting State laws, apply to lands acquired under the act of August 21, 1935, but are confined to lands acquired "for the erection of a fort, magazine, arsenal, dockyard, or other needful building."

In conclusion and reverting to the doctrine of "States' rights," if not "State responsibilities," emphasized in your letter, it might be argued that the Federal Government has taken over and assumed the concurrent power of enforcing all State crimes on Federal lands acquired "for the erection of a fort, magazine, arsenal, dockyard, or other needful building," but I am constrained to the view that as to other lands—and there are many such—the jurisdiction of both the Federal Government and the States must depend on the nature of the grant by the latter to the former.

The Attorney General has apparently not given the provisions of section 289 of the Criminal Code the general effect which others might attach thereto, for, as stated, he has advised that "there is no Federal statute of general application making it a criminal offense to desecrate or mutilate the flag." If all State crimes have been incorporated in Federal law "by reference instead of reciting them," including those relating to the desecration and mutilation of the flag, the adoption of S. 218 would clear up all uncertainty in this regard and surely there could be no harm at least in these times, for the Federal Government to place itself on its record that an insult to its flag would result in its condemnation.

Cordially and respectfully yours,

JAMES P. MCCOVERN.

American Federation of Labor and Its Affiliates Cooperate With National-Defense Effort

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MICHAEL J. KENNEDY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 12, 1941

ADDRESS BY GEORGE MEANY

Mr. MICHAEL J. KENNEDY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include therein the address of Mr. George Meany, secretary of the American Federation of Labor, before the New York Building Congress at the Hotel Astor, New York City, on June 3, 1941.

I commend this address to the Members of this body today, because it outlines the fine record of achievement of the American Federation of Labor since its inception, as well as its record of cooperation with the present defense activities of the Government. In my opinion, it is unjust and unfair to penalize the entire membership of the American Federation of Labor for the isolated abuses inimical to the public interest that might exist. This fine organization represents the great majority of the working men and women of this country who are members of a labor organization, most of whom join with us in deploring the existing strike situations in those industries vital to the national defense.

The American Federation of Labor, on behalf of its membership, has stated publicly its position of complete cooperation with the defense program, and its record speaks for itself. I think that this record is a great tribute to its outstanding leadership, which has put forth tremendous efforts to maintain order and discipline within the ranks of this organization during the national crisis. I am aware, too, of the fine spirit of cooperation of its affiliates and their efforts to avoid strikes within their particular organizations. I am particularly familiar with the efforts of the International Longshoremen's Association, under the able leadership of Joseph P. Ryan, which is located in my district. The conduct of this organization in connection with the vital shipping problem has been exemplary. The record of the checkers, watchmen, bricklayers, wire lathers, and all other patriotic affiliates of the building trades of the American Federation of Labor is equally commendable. This joint effort is truly deserving of the commendation of the Congress as a contribution to the preservation of harmony and good will within the ranks of labor in these trying times.

The Congress should accordingly deliberate long and carefully before indulging in the hasty action of placing legislation on the statute books which will adversely affect the rights of millions of loyal and patriotic Americans who are glad and willing to work, for many years to come, in order to penalize the abuses of a very small minority, which may be penalized severely in other ways. Do not let us legislate collectively to punish the innocent victims of an un-American assault on the rights of labor; to correct a wrong that may be dealt with in another manner.

The betterment of the working conditions of labor has always been the pride and joy of our democracy. The American Federation of Labor, and its affiliates, typify the true, loyal, and patriotic laboring man. Let us express our confidence in its continued cooperation with our Government instead of enacting unjustifiable legislation at this time.

The address follows:

Organized labor's responsibility in the present national emergency is to do everything humanly possible to cooperate with our Government in its defense efforts, and at the same time continue to pursue its traditional objectives. This responsibility is gladly shouldered by the workers who make up what we feel is the outstanding trade-union of all history—the American Federation of Labor.

The objectives of the American Federation of Labor are well known. They are the objectives of any vigorous, free trade-union movement, which are to improve, through organization, the conditions under which wage earners must work and must live. And these objectives have been attained. Despite depressions and other setbacks from time to time, the American worker today stands, and for a great many years past has stood, head and shoulders above the workers of the rest of the world in conditions of work and of life. And it is not a mere claim, but a matter of recognized historic fact that the envied position of the American workingman has been produced in very large measure through the activities of the American Federation of Labor, and of the unions affiliated therewith. But our organization has always had another objective that runs concurrent to that of raising wages, reducing hours, and improving working conditions for the toilers of our Nation. The American Federation of Labor has from the very day of its inception been dedicated to the defense, the protection, and the preservation of the democracy under which it has been possible for trade-unions to contribute so much to the national welfare.

In the final analysis, this is nothing more than plain horse sense. The workers of America have attained a higher standard of living than have any other workers through the free collective-action machinery of their trade-unions. The free trade-union system exists because we operate in this country under a governmental formula under which it is possible for workers as well as employers and all other groups to collectively strive for improvements in their particular field of activity. Hence the preservation of that governmental formula means the preservation of the opportunity for workers not only to maintain the standards already secured but raise these standards to an even higher level.

It is this sincere, deep-running determination with which the workers of the American Federation of Labor's building trades, metal trades, and all other crafts are imbued, which has distinguished the American Federation of Labor from rival labor movements that have sprung up in this country at intervals during the past 60 years, made a furor for a few years, and then disintegrated and disappeared from the scene.

Just a week ago, in an address to the people of America, our President made it plainer perhaps than ever before that we cannot maintain our free governmental system in a world dominated by Nazi Germany. The rule of brute force rather than the rule of justice and reason is unacceptable to the American people. I think it is plain now to everyone possessed of ordinary common sense that there can be no compromise between our system of free institutions and the brutal, inhuman system sponsored and practiced by Hitler, Stalin, and Mussolini. There may be some who disagree with this theory—there may be some who feel that we can maintain our system and achieve a decent, equitable relationship with a Nazi-dominated Europe—but very recent history tells us that this is not possible. In Norway, Holland, Denmark, Belgium, and in other countries of continental Europe there were many who felt this way a year or so ago, but I am sure that you would have an extremely difficult task if you were to visit these countries today seeking to find someone who sincerely and honestly believed that appeasement of dictators is a good policy.

I think it is appropriate to point out at this time that the American Federation of Labor saw Hitlerism for what it was 6 full years ago—a long, long time before the people of our country achieved such a virtual unanimity as now exists with respect to this so-called government. To most people at that time Hitlerism was a pretty remote sort of thing. They read about it, they heard about it on the radio now and then, and that was about all.

But the labor movement of this country realized, as long as 6 years ago, that the Nazi regime constituted a threat to the cherished privileges of democracy even in a nation so distant from Germany as is the United States. We denounced Hitler and Hitlerism then, we denounced them repeatedly, and we have for many years now maintained a strict boycott of Nazi-made goods in an effort to contribute something to the destruction of totalitarianism.

As in the case of Mr. Hitler's dictatorship, where subsequent events proved that the American Federation of Labor had been 100-percent correct in its appraisal of the Nazi system of cruel oppression, so it was in the case of Mr. Stalin and his dictatorship of the left.

The American Federation of Labor never had any illusions about the Communist dictatorship and did not hesitate to point out its most vigorous disapproval of the Russian brand of tyrannical rule. We refused to see any substantial difference between the Fascist type of dictatorship and the Communist type, and the unholy pact between Stalin and Hitler 21 months ago—the pact which was the signal for Hitler to start this war—proved that the American Federation of Labor had been right in its refusal to draw any line of demarcation between a dictatorship of the right and a dictatorship of the left.

I am pointing these things out to give you the background of the American Federation of Labor's forthright opposition of totalitarianism going back over a period of many years. Those of you who are affiliated with the labor movement undoubtedly are familiar with this background, but the representatives of management here today may not realize that the American Federation of Labor has the longest and most consistent record of hostility to nazi-ism of any group in this country. So far as the 5,000,000 workers represented by the American Federation of Labor are concerned, there is no need to educate us to the vicious character of nazi-ism, for we have had it seared into our consciousness for close to a decade.

Seven months ago, at the sixtieth annual convention held in the city of New Orleans, the American Federation of Labor unanimously pledged that it would rally to the cause of democracy and make every necessary sacrifice to aid national defense. The convention further pledged that American workers, as represented by the A. F. of L., would do everything in their power to avoid strikes and to speed up production.

Last January the building and construction trades department of the A. F. of L., which represents more than a million and a half construction workers throughout the country—bricklayers, carpenters, electrical workers, engineers, plumbers, lathers, roofers, laborers, sheet-metal workers, iron workers, plasterers, painters, and the other building trades—held a conference in Washington.

The building and construction trades department pledged the Nation that stoppages on defense projects because of jurisdictional disputes or for any other reason would be avoided. And the department established machinery to see to it that this policy was made effective.

Now we have seen headlines galore in which the word "strike" appears. We have seen the essays of columnists and the writings of editorial authors and the drawings of cartoonists all seeking to give the impression that labor is striking left and right and impending the national-defense program. The American Federation of Labor cannot be held accountable for the actions of other groups. This is so obvious that it should not be necessary to take the time to say it. Yet the fact remains that the columnists and the cartoonists and the editorial writers, with only the rarest of exceptions, have not differentiated between the A. F. of L. and these other groups. Nothing could be more inaccurate; nothing could be more unfair.

Let us take a look at the American Federation of Labor's record and see whether or not we have kept our pledge to keep working and to work out solutions of differences in a peaceful manner. Let us look specifically at the War Department's and the Navy Department's building construction programs in which, as everybody knows, the workers involved have been A. F. of L. workers. Has the A. F. of L. been merely giving lip-service to the defense program? What does the record show?

Recently Secretary of War Stimson issued a very interesting report. This report dealt with the $1,200,000,000 construction program of the War Department, authorized by Congress so that accommodations would be available for the young men inducted into the Nation's new Army. Did the building trades of the A. F. of L. impede the cantonment construction program? Or did they buckle down and turn in one of the finest pieces of cooperation in history? The report of Secretary Stimson supplies the answer. The answer is this: Out of a total of 40,607,000 man-days worked on the cantonment program, only 14,875 man-days were lost as a result of labor difficulties.

This percentage of delay was so infinitesimally small that it amounted to only three one-hundredths of 1 percent. In other words, if there had been 33 times as many stoppages as there actually were, the delay would still have amounted to only 1 percent. Is this cooperation? I submit that it is—cooperation of the most outstanding type, cooperation which has not been surpassed by any other part of the national community.

And on the Navy's air-training station and other building construction the story is much the same. The Navy Department has not issued a report on labor's cooperation similar to the one issued by the War Department, which I have just described. But the records of the Building and Construction Trades Department show that there was only one stoppage. This was in Boston, where there was a dispute over the employment of W. P. A. workers. This was the only stoppage.

John P. Coyne, the president of the building and construction trades department, stepped into that picture promptly, and within 2 days this lone strike was at an end. So here again, with reference to the building-construction program of the Navy Department, man-days lost, as compared with man-days worked, amount to only the most microscopic fraction of 1 percent.

And when we look at the situation as regards the construction of arsenals, factories, and other buildings imperatively needed by the Nation in this emergency, we find once again that the bricklayers, carpenters, plumbers, engineers, and other A. F. of L. building-trades mechanics have been doing their part and that stoppages have been practically nonexistent.

Yet, despite this truly wonderful cooperation in the national effort, you have seen and heard little praise of labor. On the other hand, you have seen quite a few brickbats tossed. However on that score we won't worry a great deal. Labor representatives are not the least bit thin-skinned and being on the receiving end of fast-traveling brickbats is no new experience.

Now I have mentioned the 99.97 record of uninterrupted work on the part of the A. F. of L.'s building trades in the defense program, which in my opinion, is more than enough to have earned for the building trades a permanent place in the Hall of Fame of service to the Nation. But this is not all that the building trades have done. As a matter of fact, I couldn't begin to tell the whole story if I kept you here for a week. But there is time for one typical example of what I have in mind.

At Corpus Christi, Tex., which is down on the Gulf of Mexico, the Navy Department decided that it would like to erect a naval air-training station. Not just a little proposition, mind you, but a project to cost the sum of $44,000,000.

The mission of this station is to train thousands of young men to defend their country in the air, where so much of the fighting in this war is taking place. In July of 1940 the first ground was turned at Corpus Christi. Eighteen thousand men were employed in the gigantic job of constructing that air base for Uncle Sam.

Big as the State of Texas is, and it's the largest State in the Union, Texas couldn't begin to supply the thousands of craftsmen needed to construct this training station out in the wilderness beside the Gulf of Mexico. The Navy Department advises me that one-fourth, or almost 5,000 of the workers had to be brought in from outside Texas. And most of these did not come from just the other side of the Texas line. Most of these came from as far away as Chicago and New York, and San Francisco, and Seattle.

How was this done?

Through the machinery of the building and construction trades department. No other agency, public or private, could have accomplished this job of producing such large numbers of trained men, for no other agency has the facilities or the organizational set-up required to accomplish such a feat. The building and constructions trades department had made an inventory of available manpower, and when it was informed of the job requirements, the department reached out for these men and dispatched them to Corpus Christi. These men were brought in without it costing the Government a single penny for transportation costs.

The A. F. of L. mechanics at Corpus Christi put up with primitive living quarters—tourist camps, trailer carts, and beach shacks—without complaint. For they knew that these were not normal times. They knew that they were making their contribution to the preservation of our American way of life. They worked hard. And the result was that the Corpus Christi training station was completed months ahead of schedule.

This sort of cooperation has been given by the A. F. of L. time and again. We expect to continue to give this type of service to the Nation.

Now, while I come to you today as a representative of labor, not as a spokesman for management, I would be less than fair if I were to attempt to leave with you the impression that labor alone is solely and exclusively deserving of credit for the splendid record of cooperation in the national-defense program.

The truth is that this record of uninterrupted work would not have been possible but for the fact that the Government, when it started on this vast building program, awarded the contracts to outstanding firms who had enjoyed contractual relations with the building-trades organizations of the American Federation of Labor for many years. These employers had many years' experience with collective bargaining, with the unionized condition of their workers, with the set-up, in short, in which workers and employers pull together harmoniously most of the time and, when a difference of some sort does arise, it is quickly adjusted in a peaceful manner.

I would be less than frank if I were to say that in all other fields of national-defense effort records have been made quite as good as that made in the construction end of the defense program. On the other hand, it is a fact that, so far as the American Federation of Labor is concerned, records of uninterrupted production have been made which are far superior to what was done in 1917 and 1918. The millions of working men and women in the rank and file of organized labor have made sacrifices, maintained strict discipline, and kept the wheels of production turning.

Yet today we find that the rights and freedom of these patriotic American workers are threatened right here at home, by the forces of reaction within our own land, as well as by the menace of the Nazis abroad.

There is today before Congress a proposal known as the Vinson bill which provides—with criminal penalties—for a 25-day compulsory work period before a strike could take place. This measure is a vicious antilabor proposal which would destroy the traditional rights of free American workers under the pretence of aiding national defense.

The advocates of this bill beat their breasts and say that it is really not an antilabor bill. They say that the bill merely calls for a compulsory cooling-off period before a strike begins. This compulsory cooling-off period, they point out, is limited to 25 days.

But the time limit is of no consequence. If Congress has the power—despite the thirteenth amendment to our Constitution which abolished slavery in this country for all time—to force men and women, under threat of criminal punishment, to work against their will, not for 25 days, but only for 25 hours, or 25 minutes, or even 1 minute, than Congress obviously has the power to compel them, by the same method, to work indefinitely without their consent. And that is slavery. That is what Hitler has done. That is what we are supposed to be building planes and guns and tanks and ships to prevent from coming to our country.

It is one thing when we have voluntary cooling-off periods as a result of contracts between labor and employer voluntarily entered into. You men in the construction industry know that; as a matter of fact, this is one of the standard provisos in such contracts and has been for a period of many years. That, I say, is one thing.

But it is quite another thing indeed when Government undertakes to impose a doctrine of force upon workers; it is quite another thing when Government proposes to wipe out the fundamental American principle of free labor in a free nation; it is quite another thing when a worker is made to face a fine of $5,000 or 1 year's imprisonment if he refuses to be subjected to a system of involuntary servitude identical with that which exists in Nazi Germany and Nazi-conquered countries.

There is no need for such legislation as this vicious bill I have described. Furthermore, if this bill were passed, it would hamper rather than further the progress of our national-defense effort. It could not be enforced without the extreme use of police power. It would cause such resentment as to bring about a chaotic condition in industry which would seriously impede the defense program.

The Vinson bill seeks to establish a totalitarian principle. That principle, in the opinion of organized labor and, I may say, in the opinion of enlightened employers, has no place on the statute books of a nation like ours, which is dedicated to liberty and justice.

The great national effort in which we are now engaged calls for a spirit of national unity based on the fundamental principles of the democracy in which we all share a common vital interest. We cannot defend that democracy by methods which are repulsive to all who cherish liberty nor by methods which by their very nature destroy democracy itself.

But this does not mean that the American Federation of Labor recommends or urges strikes in this time of critical national emergency. Quite the contrary.

By proclaiming an unlimited national emergency, the President has brought home to the American people that it is incumbent upon all of us to make sacrifices for the national defense. Forces beyond our control have disrupted the usual procedures of our daily lives. We are not living in normal times. If we try to pretend that there is no emergency, we invite the tragedy which has befallen nation after nation in Europe.

In recognition of this critical situation in which our country now finds herself, the executive council of the American Federation of Labor has now followed up its no-strike policy, which was first enunciated when the national-defense program began. Let me read this declaration of the executive council, which was adopted at the council's meeting in Washington only last week, so that you may see for yourself just where the A. F. of L. stands today with respect to national-defense production. This is what the council says, and I quote:

"The President of the United States has said that national-defense production must not be interrupted or obstructed by industrial disputes." He has appealed to us in all good will to utilize the conciliation and mediation machinery set up by the Government to avoid stoppages of production.

We must do this. We can do this. And we pledge our good faith as Americans to the President that we will do it.

Therefore, we call upon every union affiliated with the American Federation of Labor to refrain for any reason whatsoever from calling a strike interfering with national-defense production until full opportunity has first been given to the Conciliation Service of the Department of Labor and to the National Defense Mediation Board to bring about a peaceful settlement of the dispute.

The American Federation of Labor will take disciplinary action itself against any local union coming under its direct jurisdiction which violates this policy.

That is the statement of the Executive Council of the American Federation of Labor, and it seems to me that if anybody at this late date had any doubts as to whether or not the American Federation of Labor was or was not cooperating in the national-defense program, this statement should put any such doubts at rest for good and all.

The need of the hour is for national unity. Sound management, constructive liberal government and free, loyal labor—we must all unite in this effort, we must all roll up our sleeves and we must work. We must work as we have never worked before. We must all work and we must work together. People talk and people have written of the production which Adolf Hitler achieved in Nazi Germany, but I say to you now that when our industrial set-up here in free America really begins to roll, no country on earth will be able to equal the production rate attained.

Organized labor, as represented by the American Federation of Labor, stands four-square behind the President of the United States. Organized labor knows better perhaps than any other group of citizens what happens to the liberties which we cherish when democracy goes under and totalitarianism comes into power.

Trade unions—nor for that matter, any other form of freedom—cannot exist under a dictatorship. By the same token, dictators cannot long hope to maintain their power, where free trade unions operate.

As in 1916, 1917, and 1918, so again in 1941 the American Federation of Labor, made up as it is of millions of workers who know that we cannot be good trade unionists unless we are, first of all, good citizens, is giving and will continue to give, to our national Government the most wholehearted type of cooperation. I cannot speak for other organizations claiming to represent American labor, but so far as the American Federation of Labor is concerned, that is where we stand.

And so the answer to those who would inquire as to labor's responsibility in this emergency is very simple. Labor's responsibility—labor's job, if you please—is to use its trade-union machinery to the very limit to achieve a national defense that dictators will fear as well as respect. How will labor discharge this responsibility? How will it meet this supreme test? Speaking for the millions of workers affiliated with the American Federation of Labor, I can say to you here and now, that we will discharge our responsibility in a way that will prove beyond question that the American system of free institutions maintained by free men is superior to any other system the mind of man has ever been able to devise.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Daily Argus-Leader, Sioux Falls, S. Dak.:

COST-PLUS EVILS

Representative ENGEL of Michigan has rendered a rather notable individual service to the Nation. Hearing many reports a few months ago about heavy expenditures in the construction of Army camps, he decided to make a personal investigation. He visited camp after camp, conferring with contractors, Army officers, and others. He obtained figures on construction costs, analyzed them and ascertained just why the expenditures in many instances were far in excess of estimates.

His surveys were published in full in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, providing a factual basis for additional comment and action.

Now he comes forth with the sharp accusation that about $250,000,000 of the $800,000,000 appropriated for cantonments has been wasted. He blames much of this waste to the fact that these jobs were handled on a cost-plus-fixed-fee contract basis.

"It is my recommendation," he concludes, "that all construction contracts hereafter be advertised and let on a competitive-bid system, giving the job to the lowest qualified bidder. I am firmly convinced that every cantonment project could have been let on a competitive-bid basis with a loss of very little, if any, time at a saving of millions of dollars to the taxpayers."

To appreciate his thought, one must understand the cost-plus system. Under it, the contractor takes a job with the agreement that he is to be paid for the total costs plus a percentage fee. Thus the more the job costs, the larger is his fee. In consequence, there is no particular reason why the contractor should resist efforts to advance either material or labor costs. And there are reasons why he should welcome them because the more the camp costs, the more he gets.

In private business, cost-plus contracts often work out satisfactorily but the relationship there is different. The private spender will check carefully and if the contractor spends too much money, his reputation will suffer. But no such attitude prevails in respect to Government business.

As we consider this subject, we are reminded of an incident described recently by C. A. Christopherson, of Sioux Falls. As a Member of Congress, he served on a committee checking World War costs shortly after the cessation of hostilities. One item was the expenditures made for mules. The Government, it seems, needed many mules. So a man was hired to go and get them. He was awarded the job on a cost-plus basis. If we recall the figures rightly, he received a fee equal to 5 percent of the purchase price. Thus, if he bought a mule for $100, he got $5. But if he paid $200 for the same mule, he got $10. Well, it seems, the prices for mules went sky-high. The buyer didn't argue with the sellers when they said their mules were worth $200 or $300 or even $500 each. The Government got the mules, to be sure, but the buyer made a fortune out of his share in the transaction.

We should not make the same error this time, having the experience of the World War as a guide. Representative ENGEL's current recommendation merits consideration.

ARTICLE FROM THE PHILADELPHIA RECORD

[From the Philadelphia Record of May 15, 1941]

OF RICH AND POOR—1891–1941

(By Gervase N. Love)

Fifty years ago today a man of the mountains, one of the greatest intellects of his century, wrote a letter from his prison in Rome. The letter went to the far corners of the earth, and for half a century it has influenced, directly or indirectly, the thinking of men great and small, of princes and bishops, teachers and students, workingmen and those who employ them.

The imprisoned mountaineer was Pope Leo XIII. His prison was the Vatican. His letter was the famous encyclical—addressed to his bishops on five continents—on the condition of labor. It is known as Rerum Novarum, from its first two words.

The encyclical was the voice of the Catholic Church, crying against principles of materialism and false liberalism which in a recently industrialized world had made the lot of the workingman an unhappy one. It was the voice of the church pointing out what the world had forgotten—the dignity of those who work and of their labor, the social justice that could stem only from religious principles.

THE EVIL AND ITS REMEDY

Pope Leo pointed out with unerring finger the grievances of working people. Then he restated with new clarity and authority the traditional teaching of the church on the relations of employers and employees and on the rights and duties that accompany property, and applied it specifically to conditions that in great degree are nearly as widespread now as in 1891. He upheld the right of private property and refuted socialism, then outlined the remedy for the evil: The joint action of state, church, employer, and employee.

"It is no easy matter," he wrote, "to define the relative rights and duties of the rich and of the poor, of capital and of labor.

"But all agree—and there can be no question whatever about it—that some remedy must be found, and found quickly, for the misery and wretchedness pressing so heavily and so unjustly, even at this moment, on the vast majority of the working classes.

"The custom of working by contract and the concentration of so many branches of trade in the hands of a few individuals have brought about a condition of things by means of which a small number of very rich men have been able to lay upon the masses of the laboring poor a yoke little better than that of slavery itself."

These words have a familiar ring today.

Socialism, the Pope maintained, did not offer a way out of the difficulty. First to suffer under its doctrine that private property must be abolished and come under common ownership, to be administered by the state, would be the worker, he asserted.

"When a man engages in remunerative labor," he wrote, "the impelling reason and motive of his work is to obtain property, and thereafter to hold it as his very own."

To acquire and hold private property by legitimate means, he contended, is the natural right of man.

It is impossible to reduce society to a dead level as socialism would do, he claimed. Inequalities in fortune are the natural result of inequalities in capabilities, intelligence, health, and strength.

Basically, he added, all men are equally the children of God; as human beings they share the same human rights and liberties. He denied flatly that one class is naturally antagonistic to another. Capital and labor complement each other, he asserted, and are not by nature intended to live in conflict.

GUIDEPOSTS OF RELIGION

Religion, the Pope declared, sets up guideposts for each class in its relations with the others.

The worker, the church teaches, must carry out in good faith all equitable agreements he makes with his employer. He must respect his employer's person and property, and must not indulge in violence or rioting to gain his ends.

The employer, it teaches, must not regard his workers as his slaves. He must not treat his employees as a soulless commodity, the source of so much muscle or skill to be used to build up his fortune.

"To exercise pressure upon the indigent and destitute for the sake of gain, and to gather one's profit out of the need of another, is condemned by all laws human and divine," he wrote.

STATE MUST ACT

If mankind lived by these precepts, he said, the problem would be resolved and industrial strife banished. But many "worldly and ambitious" men to whom punishment for an injustice is something in the vague future will not live by them. Hence, wrote the Pope, the state must step in when controversy arises.

"When workpeople have recourse to a strike," he wrote, "it is frequently because the hours of labor are too long, or the work too hard, or the wages insufficient.

"The grave inconvenience of this not uncommon occurrence should be obviated by public remedial measures, for such paralyzing of labor not only affects the masters and their workpeople alike, but is extremely injurious to trade, and to the general interest of the public.

"On such occasions violence and disorder are generally not far distant; and thus it happens that the public peace is seriously imperiled."

It is the duty of the state to eliminate such troubles by legislation removing the cause, he claimed.

"Wages, as we are told, are regulated by free consent," he said, "and, therefore, the employer, when he pays what was agreed upon, has done his part, and seemingly is not called upon to do anything beyond."

But—

"Let it be taken for granted that workman and employer should, as a rule, make free agreements, and in particular should agree freely as to wages; nevertheless, there is a dictate of natural justice more imperious and ancient than any bargain between man and man, that remuneration should be sufficient to maintain the wage earner in reasonable and frugal comfort.

"If through necessity or fear of a worse evil the workman accept harder conditions because an employer or contractor will afford him no better, he is made the victim of force and injustice.

"(Concerning) * * * the hours of labor in different trades, and the sanitary precautions to be observed in factories and workshops, it is advisable, in order to supersede undue interference on the part of the state * * * that recourse should be had to societies or boards * * * or some other mode of guarding the interests of wage earners, the state being appealed to should circumstances require, for its sanction and protection."

THE NEED FOR UNIONS

Most important of all such societies are unions of working people, declared Pope Leo. He approved the ancient guilds, but held that unions should be adapted to the present.

"It is gratifying to know that there are actually in existence," he wrote, "not a few associations of this nature, consisting even of workmen alone, or of workmen and employers together.

"But it greatly were to be desired that they should become more numerous and more efficient. * * * Let the state watch over these societies of citizens, banded together for the exercise of their rights, but let it not thrust itself into their peculiar concerns and their organizations; for things that move and live by the spirit inspiring them may be killed by the rough grasp of a hand from without."

That resounding utterance came at a time when unions, in most countries, had few friends among rulers and legislators. Such elementary things as picketing were allowed or restrained upon judicial whim.

The philosophy behind Rerum Novarum is, of course, that of the Catholic Church and as such is based in Revelations. Perhaps the greatest influence upon Pope Leo was that of the Jesuit teachers, at whose feet he sat from his childhood through his ordination. From them he learned respect and love for St. Thomas Aquinas (died 1274), greatest teacher of the church.

Perhaps the foremost popularizers of the encyclical in this country are the Catholic Central Verein and Catholic Women's Union, the Jesuits, and the Catholic Conference on Industrial Problems.

The Catholic Central Verein and Catholic Women's Union is an outgrowth of the active interest in social reform carried to the United States by German emigrants in the last century. Tonight its members in Philadelphia will mark the anniversary of the papal letter they have so long worked to put before the public.

In St. Boniface's Hall, Hancock Street below Diamond, Dr. Anthony L. Ostheimer, of the faculty of the Roman Catholic High School for Boys, will speak on the encyclical that won for Leo the name of the "workingman's Pope."

St. Lawrence Waterway

EDITORIAL FROM THE BOSTON HERALD

Mr. STEARNS of New Hampshire. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Boston Herald of June 11, 1941:

[From the Boston Herald of June 11, 1941]

ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY

The lukewarm interest of the public and Congress in the President's renewed proposal for a Canadian-American-St. Lawrence waterway seems to foreshadow another refusal to authorize such a project. Senate and House conferees have voted already against the use of R. F. C. funds for it, and there is evidence that Canada is so hard pressed financially and otherwise that Ottawa will not see fit to urge the undertaking. The matter stands about where it was in 1934, when a treaty failed in the Senate. The only difference is that the administration now presses for an agreement instead of a treaty, the reason being that a majority in Congress would suffice for such an arrangement, whereas a treaty requires a two-thirds approval by the Senate.

The President's new statement of the case is not impressive. To his assertion that there will be a shortage of electricity and of shipbuilding, a shortage which the project would remove, opponents reply vigorously and effectively. The required electricity could be obtained more quickly and more economically from steam plants, which could be built where they are needed most. They could be producing in a year and a half. The waterway hydroelectric machinery would not be operating until 1945.

There is also the powerful objection that the building of the huge waterway would divert men and materials, of which there is an actual shortage now. The best-informed men in Boston and New England question whether any benefit would come to us from the loss which it is claimed New York would suffer.

"First things first" is the strongest of all the protests. A costly undertaking which would not mature for 4 years is entitled to little consideration in a crisis when months, weeks, and even days are of vital importance. Planes, tanks, and guns for immediate delivery are what we must concentrate on at present, plus expansion of the facilities already available for shipbuilding. The reluctance of Canada to sign the agreement carries its own implications.

ARTICLE FROM THE BALTIMORE SUN

Mr. D'ALESANDRO. Mr. Speaker, it has been brought to my attention that Bernard Ades, a former Baltimorean, is now employed with the United States Housing Authority. He is a leader affiliated with communistic groups. With so many worthy people seeking employment why should the Government employ people like that?

I immediately called the offices of Mr. Nathan Straus, Administrator, Mr. Leon Keyserling, and Mrs. Case, of the personnel department, and demanded his immediate dismissal.

In the Baltimore Sun of this morning His Excellency Archbishop Michael J. Curley, archbishop of Baltimore and Washington, D. C., in his address at Mount St. Mary's College commencement, stated that the United States must fight the "red" Nazi doctrine. When a clerical leader such as Archbishop Curley must forcibly bring to the attention of the people of this country a situation such as this, it is time that we awaken to the menace of the "red" and "pink" Nazi Communists. The last place that we should expect to find them is in the Government employ. What a sad state of affairs that our taxes are being used to pay their salaries.

The article follows:

"REDS" CODDLED IN WASHINGTON, PRELATE SAYS—ARCHBISHOP CURLEY MAKES DECLARATION IN ADDRESS AT MOUNT ST. MARY'S—POINTS TO DAMAGE DONE IN SCHOOLS AND LABOR BY PROPAGANDA

EMMITSBURG, MD., June 11.—Archbishop Curley today declared "Washington coddled Communists even when our own President was hissed as he addressed some of the seemingly misguided youth of the Nation."

Speaking at Mount St. Mary's College commencement exercises this afternoon, the archbishop said "the greatest danger to our country comes from the splendidly organized propaganda of those who swear allegiance to the murderer of Moscow and the philosophy of Karl Marx as interpreted by Lenin, Trotsky, and the present occupant of the dictatorial throne in Moscow."

WORKERS LOSE FREEDOM

The archbishop asserted that "minority groups in labor control the workers to a point where the latter lose their freedom to work, and we have witnessed only a few days ago the position where organized minorities snapped their fingers not only in the faces of their recognized labor leaders but also in the face of the Government itself."

He also declared "it is not so long ago since the lady occupying the highest place in the country spoke in favor of strikes—not limiting them to any time.

"Now when she finds herself confronted with the present sort of situation, she deems it just a pity that our Army had to be called out to protect the workingman in his rights to earn an honest living and at the same time to give his services for the immediate welfare as is demanded in our present course of national defense.

"The whole attitude is so stupid that to me it is one of the minor mysteries which somebody else must solve."

CONDITIONS IN EUROPE

Taking a phrase a speaker had used at the exercises, "What do we face in the future?" the archbishop said:

"You face the Army camp and $21 a month."

After outlining the present conditions in Europe, the archbishop continued:

"Nation after nation in Europe have lost all that they held dearest, their liberty and all the privileges that go with free men who govern themselves.

"The first monuments of European culture have been wiped out. But still worse, the fields of Europe have been fertilized with the blood of hundreds of thousands of fighting men—and not only fighting men but noncombatants, men, women, and children, without any consideration whatsoever given to their status.

"This is the common knowledge of all who read the pages of our daily press."

IMPRESS ON AMERICA

"No events such as we have witnessed during the past 2 years can take place without leaving its impress on our own country, which although separated from Europe by nearly 3,000 miles of sea, is today close to foreign lands as a result of improved methods of transportation.

"Someone said in the past that the Nazis must be counted as the No. 1 enemy of Christianity and civilization.

"They may be counted No. 1—call them what you will—but I feel that while the Nazis may wreck and destroy as they did during the last war before 1917, the greatest danger to our country comes from the splendidly organized propaganda to those who swear allegiance to the murderer of Moscow."

WORK OF "RED" PROPAGANDA

"If the Nazis seek, as I am persuaded they seek, to control the world, it is, nevertheless, a fact that before Hitler ever came to power, Communist propaganda was doing its work in practically every section of our country and along two well-defined lines.

"They succeeded in getting a foothold in our schools, colleges, and great secular universities to such a point that when pressure was brought to bear on our democratic administration to recognize the so-called government of Stalin and his associates whose hands were dripping with the blood of millions—that pressure came not directly from Moscow or from the Internationale (which after all means the same thing) but from well-known professors and teachers in our own American educational system and from left-wing writers who stormed the White House and Congress with demands for recognition of 'Russia's great democratic system.'"

EXAMPLES NEAR HOME

"There is no man who has kept in touch with conditions in our American system of education who does not know that communism has made itself felt among teachers and the pupils. We have had examples of that influence quite near home.

The second line of communistic propaganda was among the laboring classes. Well-trained propagandists for this type of work endeavored to obtain for themselves key positions in groups of splendidly organized American workers with the result that the power of an organized minority was felt very soon in union after union.

"The purpose of communistic propaganda is not to better conditions of the workingman; their chief objective is to arouse discontent, and that will be their objective even if the workingman were receiving double the union wage of today.

"It was the old method of Lenin and his followers in the years preceding 1917—it is their method today, and the unions that permit themselves to be guided by such so-called leaders are blind to their own best interests and the best interests of our Nation.

"What I cannot understand is that this whole system of communistic propaganda must have been known to those elected by the people to steer the ship of state in our beloved country, and yet the fact remains that Washington coddled Communists even when our own President was hissed as he addressed some of the seemingly misguided youth of the Nation.

"WOULD BE HAPPIER

"I have often said—and I repeat it—that the less one knows about the situation in Washington, the happier he is, and if he were as far removed from the Capital City of Washington as the North Pole he would find himself very probably a better American with finer loyalty to the men who are the heads of our Government today.

"This is a time when Americans everywhere are confronted with a mighty task of emerging from a recognized state of unpreparedness to a position where we can defend our own country at least—and, if possible, make that defense more effective by helping lovers of democracy everywhere.

"The time for coddling has gone. The Nation needs strength and vigor in those who are responsible for its welfare, but those qualities are never evinced when the findings of the Dies committee are referred to as a 'sordid procedure.'

"CALLS FOR ALERTNESS

"This 'sordid procedure' calls Americans everywhere to be on the alert. And now our Attorney General tells the Nation that the strikers on the Pacific coast are more in the nature of an insurrection than a strike.

"When all is said and done, there is little difference between the Nazis and Communists of the present time since Hitler and Stalin have kissed and made up. The propaganda today must be called the Nazi-Communist propaganda.

"Our country is the victim of it and it is a fertile field for the growth of the principles of Hitler and Stalin."

PLEADS FOR UNITY

John E. Haltigan, senior attorney for the Veterans' Administration, Washington, urged the graduates to adhere to the "home-spun virtues of honesty, sacrifice, loyalty, and industry in the struggle for existence in an unstable world."

Pointing out that conditions now parallel those of 1916, when his class was graduated and that some members of that class "died on the battlefields of France to preserve our form of government," Mr. Haltigan pleaded for unity among the people and loyalty to the Government.

In its 133 years, he said, Mount St. Mary's "has taught the principles of human liberty, justice, and the dignity of man" and "students of the college always have been ready to defend the liberties of our people."

Congratulating the Right Reverend John L. Sheridan, president, on his work, Mr. Haltigan said "alumni all over the country have noted that their alma mater is taking an eminent place in Catholic thought and action in this section of the country."

Appropriation for W. P. A.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM R. THOM

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 12, 1941

Mr. THOM. Mr. Speaker, it has seemed to me, from my observation of the working of the W. P. A. in my section of Ohio, that the rule requiring dismissal of workers after 18 months has been productive of little or no good. It has just brought worry and deprivation to families. The monthly income of the worker is insufficient for him to lay aside money to keep his family when the 18-month period expires, so the first thing he has to do is to obtain restoration to the relief rolls. The whole arrangement of transferring from one agency to the other uses up valuable time of administrative officers. In the end the W. P. A. worker is knocking at the doors for reinstatement to the W. P. A.

The rule was established on the theory widely held that W. P. A. workers shirk other work in private fields. That may be true in individual cases. By and large, however, the W. P. A. worker is eager to better himself. Otherwise 855,000 of them would not have voluntarily left the rolls in the first 9 months of this fiscal year.

In my home county of Stark, in the State of Ohio, the total of W. P. A. employees is 1,522, whereas a year ago it was 3,506. That sharp decrease is understandable. We have important defense industries in the country. The Government is erecting a large additional plant for defense purposes. The work is there and the W. P. A. workers are accepting the new employment.

In the neighboring county of Tuscarawas, the population is 68,816. This compares with a population of 234,887 in Stark County. Yet Tuscarawas County, only one-fourth as large as Stark, has a W. P. A. roll of 1,000. This shows a drop from 1,462 on January 1, 1940. Why should Tuscarawas County have so many idle compared with Stark? The answer is easily found. Tuscarawas County has not received the benefits of defense orders. In the past years that county suffered severe economic losses, such as removal of railroad shops, exhaustion of coal mines, and the dismantling of two sheet-steel plants employing 1,600 men due to industrial consolidation. Today in Tuscarawas County one-fourth of the W. P. A. workers are former steel workers and one-fourth former coal miners. Many of them are now too old to find work in other industries.

A good many of us have been contending that older workers on W. P. A. find difficulty adjusting themselves to new trades. This argument has been scoffed at in some quarters. Yet General Hershey of the Selective Service Administration has painted a darker picture of the usefulness of older men. He asked for exemption of men over 30 years from Army service, saying:

> Men are too settled after that age. They are past their physical peak, and others find it hard to learn new skills. That has been our experience in the draft to date.

Many employers in the industrial field take the same view, and that is one reason why W. P. A. rolls do not diminish at a faster rate.

It Doesn't Make Sense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HALE BOGGS

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 12, 1941

EDITORIAL FROM THE NEW ORLEANS ITEM

Mr. BOGGS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the New Orleans Item of June 10, 1941:

[From the New Orleans Item of June 10, 1941]

IT DOESN'T MAKE SENSE

When Mr. Roosevelt speaks of the electric power which may be had—after 4 years or more—from his St. Lawrence seaway scheme, we Louisianians who are concerned in immediate national defense should blame ourselves for having left the President ignorant of our own facilities for providing power immediately. The President can't know everything, not even with Mr. Ickes' help.

For years Washington has known Louisiana principally as a political stench. We have failed to put its better side before the country. So the national administration treated our dictatorship to a few cheap jobs, a lick here and a sop there, in recognition of political "nuisance value," while it did serious business with other States.

Jeff Davis, our oil editor, showed 2 years ago that in the immediate neighborhood of New Orleans enough natural gas was escaping from wells to run all of the factories of a city twenty times the size of New Orleans. Wasted gas is just so much wasted power. But Louisiana's gas could probably be delivered here or anywhere, in its own form or as electricity, in 4 months instead of 4 years.

Louisiana has the greatest gas fields in the world. Why, then, does Washington not put its defense industries near these gas fields?

Why does it pass bills to spend from $70,000,000 to $100,000,000, and use up 2 or 3 years and a lot of labor, building pipe lines to carry our gas up there, needlessly to aggravate the economic atrocity it has committed by foolishly squeezing all that industry into a few unduly favored States?

New Orleans and the Mississippi River cities are strategically central to 70 percent of all the oil produced in the world. Oil is fuel. Fuel is power.

Here it is. Yet the sages in Washington prepare to pipe it to the East through lines subject to sabotage for more than a thousand miles.

To do the obvious and economic thing, to set up their emergency industries where the fuel, power, and transport are, has not even been seriously considered.

Why? In part because of our own inertia in not impressing these facts on Washington. But only in part. There must be other causes. These are in Washington.

Power can also be generated cheaply and well at the mouths of the coal mines in Alabama, Tennessee, Kentucky, West Virginia, and Illinois. But if the coal must be moved elsewhere, it can be moved in barges for about a quarter of the rail rates. We have the barges.

Federal lines on the Mississippi River and its tributaries, and the Warrior River, tapping most of the coal and iron of America, are an ideal method of offsetting the rail and highway congestion and the ship shortage of the East. Notwithstanding that the Government has spent its own money on this barging system, Washington gives little evidence that it knows the barges exist.

With cotton production restricted, hundreds of thousands of men and women in these Southern States are idle. We have the greatest surplus of labor on the continent. Our responsible unions have passed resolutions binding themselves not to strike against defense industries. They did so not as a bid for their fair share of Federal work, but because the southern people are taking the needs of the country seriously and patriotically. Foreign agents, Communists, and other troublemakers don't find favor among these people. Most southerners are old-time Americans.

The Government asked New Orleans to do some shipbuilding during the World War—looking to 4 or 5 years of conflict. Our people responded by building the industrial canal. It cost them $40,000,000 and is fit for defense industries of most kinds. But it has been completely ignored in Washington. After years of struggle one shipyard is building on it, but this is a local enterprise.

By possession of power, oil, gas, coal, mild climate, large labor supply, safety against attack, Louisiana has everything a defense industry needs—and they are immediately available. Yet the President and his advisers ignore them all to go into a congested area of great labor shortage to set to work on a billion-dollar seaway scheme which may provide us 5 years hence with power which is actually going to waste right now in Louisiana.

Many months of the year the St. Lawrence and the Great Lakes are closed to shipping by ice. Our Lake-to-Gulf waterways are navigable the year round. Someone should convey such information to Washington.

Intelligent southerners are tired of hearing the South described as Economic Problem No. 1 by Washington sages, who hope to uplift its people to the point of wearing shoes and pretend to help it by ignoring its just claims and by starving it through economic discrimination.

We have heard more than one thoughtful person express the view that the Nation's economic problem No. 1 is the administration at Washington.

Looking Into the Future

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RICHARD B. WIGGLESWORTH

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 12, 1941

ADDRESS OF HON. JOSEPH W. MARTIN, JR., OF MASSACHUSETTS

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address of Hon. JOSEPH W. MARTIN, Jr., minority leader of the House of Representatives, at the seventy-fifth commencement exercises of Dean Academy, Franklin, Mass., on Tuesday, June 10, 1941:

Mr. President, members of the faculty, the student body, and visitors, many precious memories come to me here today. I used to visit this academy to play baseball and football. Dean was a tough rival for us schoolboys of those days. Visitors seldom took away with them the laurels of victory.

As I looked over your beautiful campus today I recalled a hard-fought football match of long ago played on that ground. A gravel walk divided the field just about the middle chalk line. It almost hurts yet when I think of the punishment we took that day. It was strange, but it seemed most of the plays were concluded on that gravel walk. At the end of the game it was a badly battered, scratched, and defeated team which left the field in the twilight of a crisp October day. And yet—or is it the years creeping up on me—it seems to me those were good old days. Those were good days for America because happiness, security, opportunity, and confidence were everywhere. American boys and girls knew they had a real chance to get ahead. America was on the march. With determination, courage, a passion for work and thrift, we were helping to build what has become the richest and most powerful Nation of all history.

We were a people unafraid. We had faith in ourselves and in our future.

Today doubt, confusion, and despair are universal. Even we in America face questions of greater gravity and more potential danger than ever before, except, possibly, when the Revolutionary War was decided upon, and when the Civil War rent the Nation.

Despite all these threats, I still believe in the future of our Nation. We will struggle through because the spirit of our pioneering ancestors is not extinguished. Self-reliance still animates the American people. What we most need to do is to be on guard, so that purveyors of fear cannot undermine the confidence of too many of our people. Whatever may befall, we will face it as a united nation, unafraid. Unity of spirit and unity of action will overcome any threat to our security and freedom.

I welcome this opportunity to talk to young people. We of my generation are getting ready to turn over to you younger citizens the trusteeship of this great, free Nation; this rich heritage of priceless liberty and equality of opportunity. You, in turn, will hold it in trust, and enjoy its advantages until you pass it on to the hands of those who shall come after you.

I do not want to say too much, my young friends, about what we, of the passing generation, have done with our stewardship of this great Nation and its resources. I am afraid we do not hand the country over to you in the condition it should have been. However, nothing is to be gained from recrimination or vain regrets. There is a job ahead for the youth of America to get this Nation back on an even keel.

It is, I believe, the custom at commencement exercises to say, "The world lies before you." It does. And you are courageous enough to face the truth frankly and unafraid. It is a tough world which lies before you. Problems which hold within themselves the fate of civilization will be passed on to you by the present generation to be solved.

On the one hand, we face the onslaughts of men who lust for power and dominion; they are ready to shed blood, bomb cities, blast innocent men, women, and children into mangled forms, and destroy the noblest works of men, to attain power and dominion.

On the other hand, we are confronted by internal problems. They have to a great extent been obscured by the hysteria of war, and the frenzied defense activities. But they have not in the slightest degree been solved. They have been aggravated instead. There is just as much danger to be guarded against in these internal problems as there is in any external threats.

Our national debt is already far above any figure hitherto dreamed of. How much higher it must go, no man can say. You are coming into activity at a period when taxes will be heavier than ever before in the history of this Nation. These taxes will retard expansion. They will make progress of the individual difficult. They may well become so burdensome as to threaten our whole system of private enterprise. That would not be displeasing to a well-organized group in this country which is stronger than many suspect. It is a group to be closely watched.

We must begin again to practice the old New England habit of thrift and economy. There is need for many billions for our national defense. There can be no stint in the building of that defense. We must build and maintain a two-ocean Navy. We must become all-powerful in the air. We must build up and maintain an efficient army, fully mechanized and equipped. These are all essential for our security in this age when the world has gone war-mad.

These vast demands make it imperative to reduce drastically our non-defense expenditures. Every dollar unwisely expended is a blow against our national security. Every dollar wasted means a dollar less for vital airplanes and warships.

We must eliminate expenditures which in normal peace times would be highly desirable. We cannot meet the needs of national defense without sacrifices and self-denial. We must have the courage to put our affairs in order.

Men are being called to the colors to make this Nation secure. Those who stay at home have an equally difficult and patriotic task. They must be a powerful stabilizing force for a sound government. They must be a mighty force to uphold democracy and make certain that in this free land of ours there shall not be one-man or one-party rule. Absolutism in any form is incompatible with a free people or a free government.

You young people are entering upon your trusteeship of this Nation in an era when too many of our people are being persuaded, free constitutional government lacks efficiency in this modern day. Don't be fooled by that. Constitutional government does not lack efficiency. Some of the people who are charged with operating our Government may lack efficiency, but there's nothing wrong with constitutional government when it's run right.

You of the graduating class are now going out from this peaceful academy which has done so much for your spiritual and cultural progress. You will take your places in a confused and fearful world. You must consecrate yourselves as citizens to your task of maintaining that eternal vigilence which has ever been the price of liberty. You must meet with courage and determination the attempts which are being made to destroy the American way of government and of life. This is a battle which will take all the courage of which loyal American men and women are capable. Our internal problems, the problem of want in the midst of too much of everything; the growing dependence of the people on the Government for support; foreign propagandists, and proponents of alien philosophies who would overthrow our American system of government and of life; all of these problems must be met—and solved—here in America.

You have so much to offer, so much to give; there is so much you young men and women can do for your country, for yourselves, and for posterity. While the situation calls for great sacrifices, it also offers tremendous opportunities for leadership; for the happiness and the satisfaction which comes from a sense of doing your duty well.

Those men and women of a past day who patriotically sacrificed their own lives, or the lives of their loved ones, cherished their Government and their country because they gave so much to establish the American way. And so today we must prepare to sacrifice for our Government and our way of life. But the one thing which is greater than to die for one's country is to live for it.

We—you—must at all hazards preserve Americanism. When we speak of the American way we are speaking of a form of government—rather a method of government—and a way of life, which have evolved here in the United States. Our American way of government is a bi-party system; it is based upon the concept that men can approximate truth and justice most closely, short of Divine inspiration, by our method of proposal, disagreement, discussion, and compromise.

Our American way of life, under our constitutional republican form of government, is the way of free enterprise.

For several years we have witnessed a growing tendency to increase concentration of power in the Federal Government at Washington. Such centralization of power operates to the impairment of the rights and liberties and powers reserved by the Constitution to the States and the people. All trends toward the concentration of power in the Federal Government at Washington are to be regarded with grave suspicion and a very critical attitude. Statesmen and students of other years have warned us over and over that the whole tendency of government is constantly to seek to increase its power. They have warned us that every bit of power given to government will be utilized by the Government, whenever the opportunity offers, to acquire still greater power for itself.

You young ladies and gentlemen of this academy have had a rare opportunity to fit yourselves for the struggle which lies before you to maintain Americanism and to protect and perpetuate the Constitution. You are well prepared to continue the trusteeship of the great Bill of Rights. That Bill of Rights holds for you all the liberties and privileges which make life worth living.

I want to speak a few words directly to three of you students who I understand will have fulfilled the requirements for a junior-college diploma. What a real distinction is yours to be the first three graduates of the Dean Academy Junior College. You should be proud of that distinction. In the years to come it will be a source of very great pleasure to each of you to be able to say "I was one of those first three."

I hope you will not forget to pay tribute in your hearts to a great and able man who is known as the father of the American school system. Just about 2 miles from here is the birthplace of Horace Mann. You all know something about that great American statesman and educational reformer. He was born at Franklin in 1796. I think I have a special reverence for him because he started out in life a poor boy. He struggled in poverty to acquire an education. He loved an education because he sacrificed so much for it. He wanted you young people of today to have a broader opportunity for higher education than he had. He labored hard, indeed, to bring it about. Out of the great heart of Horace Mann, out of his great lover for his fellow men, has come that practical affection for you, whom he never saw. It has resulted in your having this opportunity at this academy for the education you are receiving.

I wish I had time to discuss more fully Horace Mann, and the tremendous and undying work he did for the furtherance of American education. But, as your headmaster so very sensibly observed in one of his letters to me concerning this talk, "No souls are saved after 20 minutes."

I do want to give you, however, and I hope you will write it large upon the tablets of your memories, one of the last statements made by Horace Mann, in 1859, a few weeks before he died at the age of 63 at Yellow Springs, Ohio. In his last baccalaureate address he said to his students:

"Be ashamed to die until you have won some victory for humanity."

Your great task, my young fellow citizens, the great struggle which lies before you, is to preserve our American way of government and of life. Pressure from many different directions is being exerted to break down the ideals of our forefathers. We must not give up our faith in ourselves. We must not lose confidence and reliance in ourselves. Our forefathers, fleeing from oppression, came to the uncharted shores of this continent seeking liberty. From its unwatered plains and trackless forests they carved out the greatest nation ever achieved by any people since the dawn of civilization. They did it through self-reliance and courage. The United States today contains 6 percent of the world's area and 7 percent of its population. It normally consumes 48 percent of the world's coffee, 53 percent of its tin, 56 percent of its rubber, 21 percent of its sugar, 72 percent of its silk, 36 percent of its coal, 42 percent of its pig iron, 47 percent of its copper, and 69 percent of its crude petroleum. The United States operates 60 percent of the world's telephone and telegraph facilities. It owns 80 percent of the motorcars in use and operates 33 percent of the railroads. It produces 70 percent of the oil, 60 percent of the wheat and cotton, 40 percent of the lead and coal output of the world.

The United States possesses more than $17,000,000,000 in gold, it has two-thirds of civilization's banking resources, and the purchasing power of its population is greater than that of 500,000,000 people in Europe and much larger than that of more than a billion Asiatics. Its capacity to produce armaments of war or the needs of peace is greater than all the nations of Europe combined.

That, my young friends, is the kind of a country you are inheriting. You can make of it what you will.

Have faith in yourselves. Have faith in your citizenship. Have faith in your people. Have faith in your Nation. Be not daunted by any threat of any assault from dictator-driven peoples. Slaves were never the masters of free men—and never will be. You will have to sacrifice much. You will have to bear much. You will have to give much to support your Government and your country. In those sacrifices, in the support, in the giving, you will find your richest blessings and your greatest happiness. Your lives certainly will not be drab or dull. Struggles give opportunities for victories and victories mean thrills. You will get a lot of fun out of them.

Let me say to you that, as the years roll on, long after these pleasant corridors of this quiet academy have ceased to echo your footfall, when time has frosted your brow, you will learn what so many of us have learned before you; only in giving, in giving the best of yourselves, to your country and to your fellow men, can you really find the joy of living which, if you do not find it, leaves human experience a puzzle of unhappy confusion and futility.

Let me again say to you in the words of Horace Mann:

"Be ashamed to die until you have won some victory for humanity."

The Farmer's Fight for Parity Crop Loans

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROSS RIZLEY

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 12, 1941

EDITORIAL BY CLARENCE ROBERTS, EDITOR OF THE FARMER-STOCKMAN

Mr. RIZLEY. Mr. Speaker under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include therein an editorial by Clarence Roberts, editor of the Farmer-Stockman, entitled "The Farmer's Fight for Parity Crop Loans":

THE FARMER'S FIGHT FOR PARITY CROP LOANS

(By Clarence Roberts, editor of the Farmer-Stockman)

The fight for crop loans of 85 percent of parity was one the farmer could not avoid. The fight was forced on him. He has no apology to make and, if forced to, he would do it again.

The idea of cheap food based on low farm prices was spreading dangerously through the Nation. Cabinet officials had endorsed it. The consumer, of course, did so.

The farmer faced not only a growing public opinion in favor of low farm prices, but also increasing prices of things he must buy. He had to act quickly, and vigorously, in his defense.

Much of the criticism to which the farmer has been subject is most unfair. Here are two examples:

The president of the American Bakers' Association threw one fit right after another when Congress passed the 85-percent parity bill and urged the President to veto it.

Now, the baking industry is one which takes flour made from 1.5 to 2 cents' worth of wheat, as the farmer sells it today, and makes it into a loaf of bread for which the consumer pays 10 cents.

If the farmer gave his wheat away, that 10-cent loaf of bread would still sell for 8 cents. The farmer contends that he is entitled to 2 cents out of a dime loaf and that a farm price of 96 cents (85 percent of parity Oklahoma basis) is only a fair price. And for that contention he will keep on fighting.

The president of the Association of Cotton Spinners was also highly critical of the 85-percent parity bill. He worked desperately to defeat it.

While cotton was going up 2 cents a pound to the farmer as the result of the parity bill, cotton yarns went up 8 cents a pound. After allowing for waste, the mills had put on an increase equal to three times the increase in the price of raw cotton.

So greedy did the cotton spinners become that a price ceiling was clamped down on certain yarns as a measure to protect the public. Yarns which had been hiked to 42 cents a pound were cut down to 30 cents.

Complete data has been widely circulated among farmers to show that even at 50 cents a pound cotton mills will make plenty of profit. Their profit from a 42-cent price, had they been permitted to get it, would have been enormous.

When the farmer considers such criticism from those apparently ready to hike prices to the sky, he gets just a little cynical and wonders how many friends he has among the general public.

It is estimated that the national income this year will increase by $10,000,000,000 over last year. On the basis of population, the farmer ought to get one-fourth of that, or 2.8 billions. Instead, he merely hopes to get one billion of it. And he will get that one billion by grace of the 85-percent parity bill, without which his income would be little greater than in 1940, while paying higher prices for everything he buys.

The farmer is not exactly happy over the fact that he must fight in Congress for a fair share of the national income. But he well knows he didn't start the fight. It started long decades ago when industry demanded and secured high tariffs. It was then taken up by labor, which has secured ample legislation for its protection. The farmer has no choice but to fight on.

At last farmers are agreed on what they want and must have—a fair price for farm products. It is not going to be easy to swerve them from that objective.

ARTICLE OF JUDGE JONAH J. GOLDSTEIN, OF THE COURT OF GENERAL SESSIONS, NEW YORK

Mr. CAPOZZOLI. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an article written by an outstanding American, the Honorable Jonah J. Goldstein, a judge of the Court of General Sessions, county of New York, State of New York, which I regard as being most timely and appropriate. A translation of Judge Goldstein's article was recently published in Il Progresso Italo-Americano, a publication of New York City.

The article follows:

Whenever I hear of a case of intolerance shown to an individual in this great city I am grieved. I know that it happens—and if it just happens once, that is once too often. We all know that upon occasion some person, firm, or organization will put an "ad" in the paper seeking employees; the "ad" may finish up with the words, "Americans only need apply." Anyone who uses such language and harbors the thoughts that these words imply when used in this way just doesn't know the meaning of the word "American." I love America and everything for which it stands. In my heart the very word symbolizes tolerance, freedom, and equality of opportunity. It should, for America has been very good to me more particularly and generally to all the people of the city of New York. The fact that I love America first, foremost, and always does not blind me to the virtues of the peoples from other lands. In fact, a great many of them have come to live here, and the opportunity to observe them has enlarged my life and has made it possible for me to know the virtues of their countrymen. We all know that no group of individuals nationally, racially, religiously, or any other way, has a monopoly on either the virtues or the vices. America has her artists, but Italy had her Benvenuto Cellini, Holland her Van Dyke, Germany her Durer. Our Nation has had a George Washington, Abraham Lincoln, Woodrow Wilson, and Franklin D. Roosevelt; Italy has had her Garibaldi, England her Cromwell, and all the other countries have had their national heroes. Their descendants and their countrymen's descendants have come to our shores. In every field of life they have brought with them the characteristics and qualities that made them worthwhile citizens in their native lands. Those who are here are Americans, as am I. I know that to all Americans it is a matter of keen regret that so many countries have made it a national policy to persecute and discriminate against the members of minority groups. I honestly believe and prefer to believe that in the vast majority of cases it is not a true expression of national feelings, not a true expression of thoughts of the individuals who live in those countries.

But we as Americans rejoice in the fact that our country is built on a foundation which does not permit of prejudice. The principles of our Constitution do not allow room in this country for bigotry or intolerance. There must be do discrimination on the basis of race, creed, or color. That is a principle worth having. What is worth having is worth preserving, and what is worth preserving is worth fighting for.

The daily press, the radio, and our own common sense tell us that those who would destroy our American way of life are united in thought and action and have the will to sacrifice to accomplish their ends. Common sense should tell us that to avoid destruction of our way of life and to preserve our form of government requires from us unity of thought, unity of action, and the will to sacrifice. The fundamental principles of which I spoke guarantee life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness to all and must be preserved not only for ourselves but also for our children and civilization generally. Independence can be effected only if all those who want it will live and work in harmony, not discord. The theme of our symphony of peoples is all for America and America for all of our people.

It can be done. We can live that way. I know from personal experience. It has fallen to my lot to be a candidate for public office and I have been chosen by the people of New York County as one of their judges. In neighborhoods where the population has consisted largely of Italians (for example), some born here, many who came here, I received overwhelming majorities. They did not vote against me because I came from a different religious, racial, and social group, just as I am sure that on other occasions they did not vote for others of their own race because of that fact alone. I know that they voted in accordance with their political beliefs and their consciences and I take pride in the fact that I was elected by my fellow Americans.

That is the American way of life. It must be preserved not only politically and socially, but also economically. I deplore the attitude of anyone who says, "No Italians wanted here." "No Jews wanted here." "No colored men wanted here." "No Catholics wanted here." No man can say that or have that feeling in his heart and fairly call himself an American. Thoughts of that kind are being encouraged by those who would destroy us. These expressions of prejudice are wedges which they are attempting to drive among the many peoples who go to make up our Nation, to create discontent. It does not become anyone in this day and age to have such thoughts. It is up to us to preserve the American way of life and the very first thing to do is to make sure that all of us, regardless of where we or our ancestors came from originally, continue to do our part to keep the harmony of our symphony of America.

Food for the Democracies

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT A. GRANT

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 12, 1941

Mr. GRANT of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, before we further consider taking part in another foreign war, should we not give some consideration to a plan for making available some of our surplus foodstuffs to the starving millions of Europe? With our granaries filled to overflowing, will not those victims of aggression—the old people and the little children with their stinted bodies—have reason to blame us equally with the aggressors for their horrible plight in the dark days ahead? Whether it be the plan as suggested by our former President, Herbert Hoover, or some other plan, is it not our Christian duty to give some thought to these starving millions?

I enclose herewith an editorial that appeared in Collier's for June 14, 1941, together with short excerpts from recent editorials from the South Bend (Ind.) Tribune and the Fort Wayne (Ind.) News Sentinel:

[From Collier's of June 14, 1941]

FOOD FOR FRANCE

Every time an American food ship unloads flour, vitamin concentrates, etc., at Marseille, and pathetic school children troop out to welcome it, the question boils up again whether we're doing as much for France as we might.

What makes the matter especially heartrending is the fact that the Vichy government is doing nothing to strengthen the case for large-scale American food shipments.

The truth about France appears to be as reported by various observers who have visited both the occupied and unoccupied areas since France checked out of the war; namely, that 95 percent of the French people are pro-Ally, but are being run by the remaining 5 percent, who hope to live rather handsomely on crumbs from Germany's table in event of a German victory.

We're for helping the French people as extensively as may be, as well as the people of other occupied countries.

But the set-up at Vichy is so frail throughout and so phony in spots that it looks as if we'd be suckers to trust it in the handling of any substantial amounts of the food. What is evidently needed is a relief organization such as the one Herbert Hoover operated during the other war. Mr. Hoover is still in active circulation. He could round up a staff of hardheaded humanitarians in short order. What's preventing a fair trial of the plans he has already set forth?

[From the South Bend (Ind.) Tribune]

Mr. Hoover properly continues to emphasize the fact that Great Britain, along with other parts of the civilized world, would be seriously menaced by the social and political results of starvation in the continental countries overrun by the Nazis. British shortsightedness in the matter, because of the war crisis confronting the British, can be understood, but understanding of it does not commit Americans to subscription to it.

[From the Fort Wayne (Ind.) News-Sentinel]

Europe (and the world at large) will not be helped toward stability if the populations in its most progressive countries now held captive are to be haunted after this war by bitterly resentful recollections of privations which might have been prevented had American officials persuaded their British beneficiaries to relax the food blockade for relief of noncombatant innocents. After all, to the Belgian or the Hollander or the Frenchman or the Finn, his life and the lives of his loved ones are as important as the lives of the English.

Is It Our War?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANK C. OSMERS, JR.

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 12, 1941

ADDRESS OF HON. FRANK C. OSMERS, JR., OF NEW JERSEY

Mr. OSMERS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include a speech which I made before the Bergen County branch of the Committee to Defend America by Aiding the Allies at Englewood, N. J., June 9, 1941:

Mrs. Morrow and ladies and gentlemen of the committee: There is no truer demonstration of the American spirit of fair play and the belief of our people in the Bill of Rights than my presence on this platform tonight. I come as no stranger to the city of Englewood. The leaders and the good people of this city have been my friends, supporters, and counsellors since my entrance into public life several years ago. I was born in Leonia, just south of this city, 33 years ago, and I have lived since I was a child in Haworth, a few miles to the north of here. My religious, educational, and social life are so well-grounded in this atmosphere that I feel obliged to answer the outrageous and untruthful charges of this committee pertaining to my beliefs and ideals in direct contradiction of the American spirit of tolerance and decency. For instance, in its latest release the Committee to Defend America by Aiding the Allies said that I was "a friend of Hitler and his Fascist and Japanese satellites."

I am taking this opportunity to tell you something about these ideals of mine in my own words.

Nazi and Communist are evil names to apply to a young American raised in the bosom of a great, liberal faith and a product of the public-school system of America. From the pulpit of my church and in its Sunday school I was taught all of the Christian virtues and the commandments and rules of life that are in themselves abhorrent to Nazis and Communists. I was taught to love my neighbor, to shun the word "kill," and I was taught over and over, "Blessed are the peacemakers." And in all of these teachings I believe.

In our great, free, school system I was taught the Bill of Rights, our Constitution, and the right of one man to disagree with another and still remain true to American principles and maintain his own and his neighbor's respect.

Want Britain to win? How could any American, proud of his heritage of freedom and kindness for all men, want any other victory?

In September of 1940, before the latest election, the Committee to Defend America by Aiding the Allies asked my position on aid to Great Britain, in a questionnaire, prepared by the committee, and in reply I wrote:

"Yes; I favor aiding Britain.

"Yes; I favor the sale of whatever material can be spared from our Army and Navy, without weakening our national defense.

"Yes; give priorities to Great Britain in the production of our arms, planes, tanks, and other military supplies, without impairing our rearmament program.

"Yes; I favor the use of American ships to bring mothers, children, old, and sick people to our land.

"Yes; I am opposed to attempts to appease Hitler. As a strong advocate of peace I favored a general world settlement based on economic and human realities. I urged Secretary Hull to this course long before the European war started.

"Yes; I favor a maximum effort to preserve civil rights and civil liberties, while taking strong action against 'fifth column' activities."

Do those answers sound like a Nazi or a Communist? But let us remember this fact. At that time, the Committee to Defend America by Aiding the Allies was headed by William Allen White, great American editor, whose keenest wish, and whose every effort was directed toward keeping America out of war by aiding the then allies. What happened to Mr. White? That fine old man of American letters was pushed out of the chairmanship of this committee by war-minded groups in New York and Washington and before he had time to return to his desk in Emporia, Kans., he was branded an appeaser and a Laval by these insolent warriors of intolerance and hate. I leave it to the members of this committee: Has the committee changed or have I changed? When I answered that questionnaire, I said your ideas and mine in large measures coincide.

I have been accused by this committee of "being a bottleneck" a "friend of Hitler" and other scurrilous characterizations unworthy of the many fine people who are members of this committee. Does this committee now want war?

Can this be because I am opposed to a declared or an undeclared war? I cannot believe this to be so, for all of our elected officials, executive and legislative, are supposed to keep our Nation at peace unless we are attacked, and some of us are even pledged to do so. Can it be because I am opposed to declared or undeclared dictatorship in our own country? Surely we would not think of fighting the world to force the "four freedoms" on all peoples and lose our own liberties at home.

It cannot be because I am opposed to an American expeditionary force, for Mr. Churchill himself has said "We do not need men. Give us the tools and we will finish the job." And on Saturday our Ambassador to the Court of St. James's, Mr. Winant, said: "I see no necessity for the United States to intervene provided this country intensifies its present aid programs." No; I am called these names because President Roosevelt and the political Janissaries responsible for our defense program have fallen down on their jobs, and this committee, wittingly or not, has joined with these new dealers in a mass smear campaign without equal in American history. In my opinion, mud slinging will not change the views of the majority of American people.

I have tried to represent you in the Halls of Congress in the manner outlined by our founding fathers in the Constitution. There is no one but myself responsible for my acts or my votes. They represent my considered judgment and my idea of representative government. I do not appear here to apologize for, alter, or change any of these views or actions. Your committee claims that I do not represent a majority of my constituency in my desire to keep this country out of the war. That's their guess and hope. Let me say this right now: It is more important to me to be right than be reelected, and that minority or majority pressure does not mold my opinion. To race with the tides of public opinion would require the crystal gazing of George Gallup and the conscience of Boss Tweed. I come to stamp out the infamy of those false leaders who foment discord, seek to create a false division among our people, capitalize on the generous impulses of sincere Americans, and who are the "fifth column" of disunity in our country.

I will state as briefly and simply as possible my position on armed intervention.

I do not suppose that there are more than a handfull of people in the United States and certainly none in this room who wish to see a German victory. We have too much in common with Great Britain, too much hatred for Nazi oppression, and are too solidly agreed that we desire no changes in the type of government under which we live from without or from within. We have, with the British, a common language, a common literature. We do business the same way. We enjoy and love the same liberties and the same traditions. Conversely, we despise the methods that Hitler employs, and we hold dear and sacred those liberties and freedoms which he denies to those he rules.

But even beyond those cultural reasons, we desire a British victory for very practical reasons. Britain has provided us by her heroic struggle with Hitler with the time which we so short-sightedly have wasted and which we so desperately need to provide for our own impregnable defense, and for very much the same reasons we should not intervene in this war.

The first and gravest question we must ask ourselves, and it is a question which will answer all the others: Is it our war?

If the answer is yes, then we are playing the most despicable role in history. If it is our war, then we are indeed the most dastardly kind of cowards to let England fight it alone. If it were our war and if I believed it were our war, I would go to Washington tomorrow and demand of the Congress that we get into it at once. That would be the only course of honor.

Great Britain is fighting the battle for the British Empire. That is a very real cause for the British people. But it is not our cause. Our cause is the safety, the future, and the destiny of America, and that, as it always has, lies right here in America.

Believing that, let me repeat again: As long as I am a Member of Congress I will never vote to send American boys to die on foreign battlefields.

But, supposing that we do enter the war either by the back door by having someone shoot at our patrols or convoys, or whatever new name they may devise for them, or by the front door by deciding belatedly that it is our war. What will happen?

In the first place, with the first shot all aid to Britain ceases instantly. Public opinion will demand, and rightly, that our men be armed first. We are not now in a position to arm ourselves and to supply Great Britain. We have chosen to supply Great Britain. With that I have no quarrel. But we can't do both, and if the bitter truth be known, because of the scandalous break-down of our national defense, we are not successfully doing either. If there is a bottleneck in our defense program, it is the Chief Executive, who has refused to delegate power in this crisis to competent industrialists and managers and to take the people of the United States into his confidence.

The administration makes ringing pleas for national unity. We have national unity on every issue of importance. We are united on aiding the democracies. We are united on our defense program. We are united on stamping out subversive activities. We are united on staying out of war.

It is not my intention to make a belittling or undignified attack on the office of President of the United States. I have no thought of carrying on partisan debate. Even in war-torn Britain the Government is not immune from criticism of its policies by the press or by the representatives of the people. For the same patriotic motives I will not deny to myself or others the right to censure the inadequacies of the defense of our country. To do otherwise would be treasonable.

The administration is now and has been for many months in possession of the true facts on the labor situation. It has either refused or been unwilling to take the firm stand that would end needless work stoppages. More than any single factor they are responsible for the break-down of our defense program.

The use of troops is a fraudulent solution. Edward Collins, financial editor of the Herald Tribune, had this to say this morning: "It is true that the use of troops indicates that the President is out of patience with labor and wants at last to do something about defense strikes. But seizure of a privately owned plant as a solution for labor troubles is hardly a thing to be regarded as hopeful. On the contrary, it is evidence of the administration's bankruptcy as far as a real labor policy is concerned."

In view of the facts now at our command an invasion of Europe would be the most appalling, ghastly military expedition ever conceived in the mind of man. We can be of vastly more help to Great Britain by staying out than by getting in. By fighting in Europe we play Hitler's game. We fight where our communications are all external, where they have to be protected by ships and planes, and where the enemy has all overland communications. If we fight here, which pray heaven we will not have to do, then all of those advantages accrue to us. It would be the course of madness and suicide for us to fight in Asia, Africa, and Europe. What, then, is our course?

I think this:

Supply material aid to Great Britain, in as great quantities and as speedily as we can; build our defense until it is so impregnable that we need fear no attack and fearing none, none will come; remember that America's destiny lies in America; stamp out subversive elements in our midst; make our defense effort work; run out the bureaucrats; put production men in places where they can work; stop political and theoretical interference; crack down on any influence of labor, capital, or government which tries to sabotage the defense program; steer away from propaganda; take a sane, thoughtful, tolerant American viewpoint toward our problems and their solutions.

Let me say, with Mr. Van Dusen, whose words I quote from the Christian Century: "Those who wield public leadership at this hour are not merely toying with ideas. They are handling issues and decisions which will control the fate of multitudes. What may be at stake is the lives of tens of thousands of people, the deepest existence of millions, now and for countless years to come."

Longevity-Pay Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LE ROY D. DOWNS

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 12, 1941

RADIO ADDRESS OF HON. LE ROY D. DOWNS, OF CONNECTICUT

Mr. DOWNS. Mr. Speaker, under permission granted to me, I wish to insert a speech I made over station WICC, Bridgeport, Conn., on June 7, in support of H. R. 1057, the longevity-pay bill:

Ladies and gentlemen of the radio audience, as a Member of Congress I take to the air tonight in behalf of a most humane piece of legislation, namely, the longevity-pay bill for employees of the Postal Service.

Enactment of this legislation is long overdue. It is by no means an attempt to raid the Treasury of the United States but is a reward for loyal and efficient service. Adoption of this measure will tend to hold in the Service—and properly so—men who have learned their job in their first few years and who are anxious to remain when they realize that their skill, acquired by years of experience, is being rewarded in a modest way. In another sense they are receiving something in nature of a promotion.

The people in whose interest I am speaking tonight, in my opinion, are among the most loyal and capable in the Government service. They are the representatives of an excellent governmental department which is operating within its income. I speak of loyalty at this time because if ever, in the history of this Nation, we need loyalty, it is now.

Getting away from the subject of my talk for a minute, I must say that we have those in this country with disloyal tendencies, who would honeycomb the very foundation of our Government. In these critical times we must work within as well as without. Actions which brought about the downfall of other great nations are taking place in this country today, and I shudder when I think of the wide scope of these activities. I, for one, intend to crack down on these disloyal groups at every opportunity afforded me.

So I come to the assistance of a loyal group tonight and urge that this group be rewarded for its splendid service. The longevity-pay bill does not call for any tremendous increase of salary for employees of the Postal Service, but simply says that employees shall be granted $100 per annum in addition to their base pay as now or hereafter fixed by law, upon the completion of 10 years' service; and an additional $100 per annum upon the completion of every 5-year period of service thereafter, provided that no credit shall be given for service after the thirtieth year of employment.

Several bills, all similar in nature, are pending in Congress, but I am advocating the passage of H. R. 1057, introduced by Congressman FLANNERY, of Pennsylvania.

The last general salary reclassification for postal employees became effective on January 1, 1925, or more than 16 years ago. At that time the entrance salary grade for post-office clerks was set at $1,700, with annual automatic promotions of $100 provided for until the maximum grade of $2,100 was reached. It does not, however, necessarily follow that since the enactment of this legislation all employees have thusly been promoted. In order to attain the grades frequently referred to as automatic, employees must maintain an exceptionally high degree of efficiency. If this is not done, the employee stands not only to be deprived of his so-called automatic promotion but may be reduced to a lower grade. Also, the Economy Act of 1932, in addition to carrying provisions for salary reductions and payless furloughs, provided for the discontinuance of automatic promotions, regardless of the degree of efficiency attained.

The proposal as contained in the longevity bill does not constitute any innovation in the Government service but merely proposes the extension of a just and equitable principle which has already proven its worth and justified its adoption over a period of years in its practical application to the personnel of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, Coast Guard, Public Health Service, immigration and naturalization examiners, and customs inspectors. Inasmuch as its successful operation in the branches of the Government service just referred to cannot, in my opinion, be challenged, I firmly believe that it could be made applicable to the Postal Service with equal or even a greater degree of success.

Mr. William I. Horner, legislative representative of the National Federation of Post Office Clerks, at a recent hearing on the longevity bill, advanced the following reasons why, in his opinion, this measure should be adopted. I quote: "(1) Such promotions as are thusly provided for seem to be reasonable, just, and equitable, and in harmony with logic and sound reasoning in that it would be a fair reward for long and faithful years of service and experience and would justly differentiate itself from the present system, which provides for no automatic salary promotions after the first 5 years of service, or the top automatic grade of $2,100, has been reached.

"(2) Post-office clerks are skilled workers requiring years of assiduous study in order to qualify themselves, from an efficiency standpoint, to meet the exacting demands of the service. It has been said, and I think rightly so, that the time necessarily required for a clerk to familiarize himself with the various services he is to render is equal to that required in acquiring a college education. After this, study and review must continue, which improves the efficiency of the employee, based on experience ripened by years of service with no commensurate monetary reward.

"This experience gained through many years of service is valuable to the Government, and we are not in the least reluctant to advance the contention that such experience gained over the years should be fairly and adequately compensated for. Especially is this true, since it is an experience that has value only to the Postal Service and cannot be commercialized by the employee in outside industry. The statement that the Postal Service is an efficient branch of the Government service cannot be successfully challenged or contradicted, and certainly that efficiency is attributable to experience gained by employees through years of constant application to duty.

"(3) It would tend toward a career service and the morale of the employee would be improved to an extent that the increased cost necessary to provide this legislation would probably be entirely offset by such improved morale and increased efficiency.

"(4) It is not an experiment. The principles involved, where they have been applied in modern, progressive industries, have proven to those most vitally concerned the value of the venture where it has been given a fair trial, based solely upon its merits.

"(5) The percentage of employees without families is small, and it is but natural to conclude that as the family grows the material needs likewise grow and the family budget must from time to time be increased to meet such needs. If this is impossible, as it is under present salary conditions, the result will be unfavorably reflected in the citizenship of tomorrow.

"(6) Mordecai Ezekiel, in his book entitled '$2,500 a Year' says: Abundant living means that each family would have an adequate supply of physical necessities and comforts and sufficient leisure in which to enjoy them. In another instance he states, as follows: 'To live in modest abundance, a family of four needs $2,500 a year.' The author defines the standard to which his dollar estimate applies as follows:

"Decent shelter, decent clothing, and adequate food for growth and health. Under American conditions, a family can hardly be said to be sharing in abundant living unless it can also enjoy the comforts of civilization which many Americans have come to regard as necessities. Those include running water and modern plumbing, adequate heat, the telephone and electric light, newspapers, magazines, dentists, an automobile, and some opportunity for travel, recreation, amusement, and higher education. For the average city family of four persons, an annual income of $2,500 is probably the minimum on which such comfortable living can be attained. In fact, such an income would probably not be high enough for most families to enjoy all the comforts listed. Rather than set our standards too high, though, we may regard such an income as being the minimum needed to enable a family to live a moderately full life under American conditions."

Additional reasons, in my opinion, are: (1) Taxes have already increased to an appreciable degree; the tax base broadened to include the salaries of many groups in the Postal Service and with further increases inevitable. (2) Commodity prices are rising and will continue to do so for the duration of the present emergency and probably for several years thereafter. (3) Labor turnover in the last war, or great emergency, seriously affected the Postal Service. In many cities throughout the country, with the low salaries paid postal employees, it was almost a matter of impossibility to maintain a working force, in competition with outside industry, sufficient to handle the ever-increasing volume of mail. This condition is regrettable when we take into consideration the fact that this agency is the greatest medium for the dissemination of human intelligence and of the most vital importance to the welfare of the Nation in times of great national stress.

This measure carries the support of a large number of leading Members of Congress. The bill is now pending before the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. I have urged this committee to report the bill to the House of Representatives, and I have every reason to believe that it will come before the House. When it does it will have my active support for adoption, as I feel that it is the only remedy for an inequality which had existed for many years in one of our most outstanding governmental departments.

Strikes Please Nazis

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE A. DONDERO

EDITORIAL FROM THE ROYAL OAK (MICH.) DAILY TRIBUNE

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, I offer for the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an editorial of June 10, 1941, from the Daily Tribune, of Royal Oak, Mich., my home city, written and published by my warm and able friends, Floyd J. Miller and Lynn Miller, its editors.

The cause of true Americanism and appreciation of the opportunities, privileges, and rights of the American citizen under our Government are ably served and nobly advanced through the editorials of this outstanding newspaper and its distinguished editors.

The editorial follows:

[From the Royal Oak (Mich.) Daily Tribune of June 10, 1941]

STRIKES PLEASE NAZIS

At last President Roosevelt has taken action to stop the strikes that were interfering with the defense of America. It has been difficult to understand the delay, for many of these strikes have injured the United States as much as though Nazi bombs had been dropped on airports or battleships. Naturally every German and Russian secret agent in this country has been doing his utmost to cause as many strikes as possible and to delay building of the war equipment we need so urgently.

During the last few weeks those who have been studying the battles of the present World War have come to realize how vastly the methods of fighting have changed. Even the most trained army of men, with ordinary rifles and machine guns, is helpless against tanks and a hard-hitting force that can be moved rapidly in automobiles and motorcycles. The whole world watched and learned this lesson when the Germans overran Holland, Belgium, and France.

Even in those fateful days of the spring of 1940, though, it was apparent that airplanes provided an indispensable part of the attack. In general, the Germans never succeeded in winning a victory with their tanks and mechanized forces unless they had command of the air.

It is the very fact that planes are so vital that makes any stoppage in their production dangerous.

We have now in training an Army of a million and a quarter men. Perhaps your son or brother is, or will be, in this force. If so, his chances of defending himself and you are lessened every time an airplane that might have been produced is destroyed by the refusal of somebody to turn it out.

Let the People Finance This Undertaking

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRED L. CRAWFORD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 6, 1941

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, from information I am able to obtain it does not appear to me that our people are at the present time performing more than 25 percent of what they will eventually be forced to participate in if the undertakings directly related to the present war and which we have certainly assumed are to be consummated in an American manner.

It is, in my opinion, within the realm of truth to assert that at this moment there is by far much greater financial material, spiritual, and human power within the United States and controlled by our people than in any other section of the world. When more than 150 years ago the free people of this country established our form of government, and proceeded with a program of permitting the individual to grow and expand and develop his own personal powers, we set in motion the forces which have brought to us those very instruments of communication and transportation which in this day and hour make it utterly impossible for the United States to maintain a high degree of isolation. As a matter of fact so long as these inventions which have been developed by our free pople are permitted to operate it will be impossible for any group of people who can use them to maintain a fair degree of isolation.

Today the Government of the United States and its people are becoming completely enveloped in those far-reaching and fundamental forces which involve the so-called Anglo-American undertakings. Following the close of the War of 1914–19, it appears that both England and France proceeded to establish a high degree of isolation insofar as paying close attention to the developments in Germany in particular, and certain other areas of non-Russian Europe were concerned. It appears that the leaders of England and France fell asleep and that insofar as those two countries were concerned little material attention was given to the activities of German leadership for the period from 1920 up to and including 1938. France was unprepared, and the French people and the French Government as we have known it for decades, ceased to function. It would appear that England, if she is to survive, will have to form alliances with other powers giving sufficient combined strength to enable this last-mentioned combination to materially control non-Russian Europe; or through an affiliation with the Scandinavian countries and perhaps France, make it impossible for any other non-Russian European power to dictate the political, economic, and financial policies of non-Russian Europe.

Mr. Speaker, the British people have engaged themselves to influence the people of the United States to join with them in the latest effort to permanently arrest the program of German leadership—and not stopping there to set up a control with a foundation so constructed that its objective will be to preserve in the hands of Anglo-American management, along with their Allies, a continuing control which will for generations prevent a recurrence of what happened in 1914–19, and what is now in progress.

Mr. Speaker, this program to which the American people have dedicated themselves will call for a degree of financial management, and a program of financial sacrifice to the American people such as we have never experienced. It is my firm opinion that what now lies ahead of us will far exceed the sacrifices and suffering of our people in those early days of the formation of our country, as well as that which was involved in that period leading up to and following the Civil War.

Mr. Speaker, it must be clear to all close students of the present contest that in due course the British leaders will call upon the United States for millions of men in the form of troops to render service on the European Continent and in Africa. It must be clear to all students that serious trouble will have to be faced by us throughout Latin America—consisting of Mexico, Central and South America. The forces of the hour are now operating in such a way that these responsibilities cannot in the least be evaded. It is clear to all students that the British and the Americans are now maneuvering for additional time. But if that time is granted and if the British and American people are wise enough to place themselves in an offensive position, it will then be necessary for us to strike and to strike with all our might, and the job will not be completed until there is an invasion. This, briefly, is my opinion of some of the broader aspects of the job which we have undertaken.

Mr. Speaker, Members of Congress in particular and many of our leaders throughout the country are well informed as to the amount of the present interest-bearing debt of the Federal Government. They are also well informed with reference to the recent commitments by the Congress in the form of appropriations and authorizations. As has been pointed out by Secretary of Commerce Jones, we can easily visualize an interest-bearing debt of $90,000,000,000. As we move further into the financing and equipping of the countries of the Western Hemisphere, and of our offshore allies—whoever they may be, it is not fantastic thinking to assume that our interest-bearing Federal debt could reach $125,000,000,000 and then go to $150,000,000,000 and move on to $200,000,000,000 before the present contest ends.

Having in mind our capitalistic system and method of Government financing, what segment of our people, or which of our financial institutions are to purchase the securities which this Government of the United States must market in order to raise the funds to be used for the financing of the purchase of equipment and the maintaining of that equipment, the supplies which it will consume, and our troops in the field wherever they may be located?

The gross public debt as published by the Treasury Department under date of June 7, 1941, amounted to $48,476,118,796.20.

In the committee report on H. R. 4965, approved by the House on June 9, this week, we find a schedule setting forth $30,115,000,000 for the Army, Navy, and other defense agencies for 1941 and 1942. Including lease-lend and the amount the Navy estimates will be needed for the completion of ships, the grand total would be $43,115,000,000.

In the May 1941 bulletin of the Treasury Department on page 1 we find a table which shows that 6,125 of our banks and 775 insurance companies hold $27,602,000,000 of the Federal marketable interest-bearing securities. This information was obtained by a recent survey conducted by the Treasury Department. It should be noted that only 6,125 banks out of a total of more than 13,425 banks are mentioned.

Therefore, when all of these 13,425 banks and institutions are considered one can appreciate that perhaps as much as $30,000,000,000 or more of the interest-bearing Federal obligation is now held by these lending institutions.

The bank credit situation today is one sufficient to create alarm in the minds of all students of fiscal policies of Government. The member banks of the Federal Reserve System located in 101 leading cities and comprising approximately two-thirds of the banking assets of the country, increased their loans to business during the calendar year 1940 to the extent of about $665,000,000, or an increase of approximately 15 percent. In the past 5 months of 1941 these institutions increased their loans $655,000,000, or almost the total of 1940. Furthermore, this same group of banks increased their holdings of Government obligations by $1,534,000,000—which brought their holdings to almost one-third of the total direct Government issues outstanding. And during the past 5 months of 1941 their increase in holdings of Government obligations was greater than the total increase in 1940. It is clear that by commercial loans and the purchase of Government obligations the banks have put to work more than $4,200,000,000 since the beginning of 1940, and this is no doubt largely due to the defense program. With the expansion of loans and investments by the banks their deposits have increased and it appears that while in previous months bank deposits moved upward largely as a result of gold imports, that investments and loans of the banks are now rapidly increasing deposits as gold imports decline. For instance, during 1940 gold stocks increased more than $4,200,000,000, while in the 5 months of 1941 the increase was slightly over $575,000,000—considerably below the 1940 figure. With the banks rapidly investing in Government securities and extending commercial loans, deposits continue to increase at a rapid rate and the reporting member banks had deposits of approximately $40,000,000,000 at the end of May—over $2,000,000,000 since last December.

Mr. Speaker, this rapid increase in bank deposits constituting the greater percentage of the means of payment holds, as has been repeatedly pointed out, a potential threat of inflation. The money supply increases more rapidly than the production of consumer goods and we witness a growing burden in the form of increased cost of living due to price advances.

The Treasury Department opened a selling campaign on savings bonds and certificates last May 1. During the last month our people purchased less than $450,000,000 worth of these new issues. If we are to avoid destructive inflation we should be purchasing the new issues of Government obligations at the rate of $2,000,000,000 per month, so that it would be absolutely unnecessary for the commercial banks to further expand the foundation of inflation and increased demand deposits as a result of additional purchases of Government issues. Sooner or later it will undoubtedly become necessary for every precinct, every township, every luncheon club, every unit of industry, and every organized group of our people, irrespective of the type or kind, to be definitely geared into the program of educating our people to the necessity of their individually purchasing out of their savings and their incomes the Government obligations which will have to be issued under our capitalistic system for the purpose of financing the war undertaking which our people have assumed.

It appears to me that our chief fiscal officer, the Secretary of the Treasury, should be given the full support of our people in this vast undertaking. Otherwise, he will no doubt be forced to place the securities in the portfolios of the commercial banks or resort to outright printing-press money. For the RECORD I submit the recent radio address of the Secretary, which deals with this highly important undertaking. Let the people finance this undertaking from their savings and earnings and thereby prevent additional inflation of demand bank deposits.

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. HENRY MORGENTHAU, JR., SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY

Good evening: Just over a month ago the President of the United States bought the first of the new Defense Savings Bonds and Stamps. On that occasion he spoke of the defense savings program as a privilege and an opportunity for every American—"an opportunity to share in the defense of all the things we cherish against the threat that is made against them."

Tonight, from my desk at the Treasury, I should like to report to the people of this country on the way they have answered the President's call.

I now have complete figures showing that in the month of May, the first month of what is to be a long and continuing effort, the American people bought $438,230,000 in defense savings bonds and $3,552,000 in defense savings stamps. This is a wonderful start. It is more than any of us in the Treasury had dared to expect. It is, to my mind, a great demonstration of the desire to serve America.

In this first month the people have bought enough stamps and bonds to pay for 4 of the giant battleships we are now building, or enough to pay for the building of 20 cruisers, or 100 destroyers to guard the ocean lanes. If this total could somehow take instant shape in new fighting planes, we should have more than 4,000 of them; and if it could be translated into long-range bombers it would buy 1,000 of them.

The sales of the series E bond, the new baby bond which is within reach of almost every pocketbook, were almost twice as much in May of this year as the sales of the old baby bonds a year ago. I find it very encouraging also that total sales have held up consistently around $100,000,000 a week. This makes me feel that there is a steady interest which will show itself in continuing sales, day by day, week by week, month by month, as the year rolls on.

I don't want to say too much tonight, however, about figures alone. We decided long ago that our success should be measured not only by the amount sold but also by the number of people who invest their savings in American freedom. We have found that more than a million individual bonds were bought in the first month. Almost 10,000,000 savings stamps were bought in the same period. Even allowing for repeated purchases by the same individuals, these figures show that great numbers of men and women and children became partners of their Government during the month of May. To those people I say tonight: "You have given direct help in the defense of your country. You have done something distinctly worth-while to safeguard your democracy."

But there is something else, quite irrespective of any figures, which makes me very happy as I look back over the first month's efforts. This is the spontaneous cooperation of Americans in all walks of life, through their voluntary organizations, in all parts of the country.

Labor, for example, has proved again what I always knew to be true—namely, that the patriotism of the American worker is as sound today as when the Minute Men left their farms and dropped their tools to fight for freedom at Lexington. You may remember that the heads of the three great labor organizations in this country came to see me several weeks ago. Mr. William Green, of the A. F. of L.; Mr. Philip Murray, of the C. I. O.; and Mr. J. A. Phillips, of the Railroad Brotherhoods, all promised me their unqualified support and help in the defense-savings effort. They could not possibly have been more cooperative or more understanding of the objects of our program.

These offers of cooperation have now begun to take tangible form. I read with great pleasure the other day that Mr. David Dubinsky, president of the great International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union, had telegraphed President Roosevelt that the union members are investing the union's funds in United States defense bonds. Last week I had word from Michigan that 30,000 members of the Teamsters' Union in that State had unanimously endorsed our program and had expressed their wish to set aside a part of their earnings, regularly and systematically, for defense bond purchases.

Employers in many States, in big industries and small, have reported to us that they are ready to establish systematic savings plans—in every case in cooperation with their employees. From all parts of the country we are getting reports of this kind of spirit among the men in our factories, the men whose toil and sweat are furnishing the materials that will make this country safe and strong.

The spirit of American labor and industry has been matched by that of American bankers. No praise of mine can be too high for the willing, helpful cooperation of bankers, great and small, East and West, in getting behind the Treasury's program. Ten thousand banking institutions, including commercial banks, mutual savings banks, and savings and loan associations, now act as our selling agents, without any commission or any inducement except patriotism; but they do much more than sell for us. They have helped to educate us all by spreading information about the new bonds and stamps. Every one of the leading bankers' associations that has met during May has, without exception, passed a public resolution pledging complete endorsement and cooperation in the defense-savings program. I should like to tell the bankers of America here and now that I appreciate what they have done. The first month's results could not possibly have been so successful if the bankers had not put their shoulders to the wheel.

The same is true of the Post Office Department, which has worked cheerfully and efficiently to make the defense-savings program a success. The Post Office has given truly indispensable help, from Postmaster General Frank Walker down to the clerk behind the window in every one of the 16,000 post offices that sell defense stamps and bonds.

The Treasury has also counted on existing community groups of all kinds to spread information about what these defense-savings bonds are, and what they do. The American Legion has called upon all its posts to give us every possible help. The Boy Scouts have distributed 1,200,000 posters for us; the women's clubs have made our program a part of theirs. The response from foreign-language groups has been especially encouraging. It proves again that whatever their origin, and whatever language they may speak, the overwhelming majority of them are true Americans, united behind their Government in defense of American freedom.

All sections, all creeds, all economic groups, all American parties have done their share and will continue to do their share. We have had during this first month a preview of that national unity which this country must have if it is to surmount the crisis that now faces it.

We could, of course, have conducted this campaign in a different way, and perhaps we could have sold more bonds. We could have compiled slacker lists, and we could have coerced or frightened people into buying, whether they could afford a bond or not. But democratic unity and morale are not built in that way. Our results prove that we do not need to employ such methods.

This, after all, is a continuing effort. There are no quotas for the country or for any community in it. There is no time limit. A major object of this program is to give the American people the habit of systematic saving for their country's sake and for their own. I believe that with our present methods we are on the right track.

Everything that we have had in the way of radio time and talent, or newspaper space, or motion-picture time and skill, has been contributed freely and generously by the industries concerned, or by other advertisers. No paid advertising of any kind has been used. At this time I should like to pay my tribute to those agencies which have given us such willing and patriotic service; to the radio chains and independent stations, to the newspapers and magazines, great and small, to the motion-picture industry, and to all who have helped to bring our message to the American people. They have enabled us to carry on our program more economically than any similar effort in the history of our country.

We started this program with only 6 States organized, because we preferred to start slowly and surely rather than make mistakes which we might later regret. We now have 22 States organized or beginning to organize with nonpartisan committees composed of outstanding citizens. This process of organizing the States and cities will continue until we have reached every community in the country.

What has been done in the first month is a fine beginning, but it is only a beginning. We must keep up the good work from now on.

Events across the seas cry out to us every day to speed up our effort in every direction. The threat from abroad has come so close to every American home that the President has proclaimed a state of unlimited national emergency.

So far, our defense-production program has only begun to rouse the giant industrial strength of this continent. In the same way our defense-savings program has barely begun to reach the immense earning capacity of the American people.

Now, as never before, I believe that all of us are ready to demonstrate, in a concrete form, our partnership with the Government—a partnership, as the President said, entered into to safeguard and perpetuate all those precious freedoms which the founders of our Republic gave us as our heritage.

Thank you all and good night.

It Can Happen Here

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANK C. OSMERS, JR.

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 12, 1941

ADDRESS BY HAROLD V. REILLY

Mr. OSMERS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include a Memorial Day address delivered at Hackensack, N. J., by the Honorable Harold V. Reilly, executive committee for Bergen County, N. J., of the American Legion, department of New Jersey, as follows:

We meet today on this historic green to honor, as we do every Memorial Day, the soldier dead of our wars. Down through the fleeting years we have come to realize what their last full measure of devotion to their country has meant We know now full well that the preservation of the Union in 1865 welded a great Nation, a Nation which had its precarious beginning when our colonial forefathers dared battle a powerful tyrant king for that freedom and independence which is our heritage.

We know, too, that the men who marched in '98 and again in 1917, never to return, bequeathed us an obligation to continue to hold high and unsullied the flag they followed unto death. We who remain to carry on pause this morning in sober retrospection, and again consecrate ourselves to those high ideals of Americanism which fired them to make the supreme sacrifice.

All honor to our fallen heroes. Their deeds on the field of battle will forever enrich the pages of our Nation's glorious history.

Today, however, we can regard the past but for a passing moment because all of those things for which our hero dead fought are imperiled by a madman whose great military machine has conquered and enslaved almost all of Europe. Hitler's dream is definitely that of world domination, and so it is to the future that we must look.

It is difficult for us, gathered peacefully here today, to believe that world events could conspire to deprive us of that peace—which we all so much want—and force us to go forth to the black hell of war in defense of our native land. Yet a brief review of the swift progress of the armed conflict on the other side of the Atlantic tells us that our peril is not imagined.

It can happen here!

The devices manufactured for the destruction of mankind have increased a hundredfold since the days of Chateau Thierry and the Argonne.

On annihilating wings they speed that destruction at a fearful rate, both in time and space. Amid the ashes of London and Coventry, men, women, and children, bleary-eyed from loss of sleep, shocked into insanity, their loved ones and their worldly goods blown to eternity, stand living testimony to the terror that is modern lightning war.

Yes; it can happen here.

I wish I possessed the ability to paint a word picture that could visualize for you the utter, desolate, chilling horror that settles over a people subject to air attack. It is far, far worse than anything the first World War produced, and I have personally experienced air attacks in that war.

I am not prophesying that fate for us. Nor am I courting sensation when I soberly remind you that it could happen here. The Atlantic Ocean, over which the American Expeditionary Force sailed 24 years ago, is no longer days from Europe's shores. It is hours away now, and we would be guilty of crass stupidity if we failed to take cognizance of that fact.

This Memorial Day finds the American people confronted by a real menace. It also finds us committed to a course of action which demands a national unity even greater than in the days of 1917.

I have persistently and consistently opposed the domestic economic policies of President Roosevelt and his administration. My opposition was honest and I was indulging in the priceless right of every American to speak his mind. Such is part of a democratic process we in America prize above all of our blessings.

Then our differences were domestic and I spoke both as a citizen and as a leader of the Republican Party. Our domestic situation has now faded into pale significance in the strong light of the common danger that beats upon us all, Republicans, Democrats, Independents, alike.

And so, when it comes to our country's foreign policy, the time would seem to be at hand when we must forsake our partisan political faiths for the only faith that can now matter. We must no longer say or think merely, "I am a Republican," or, "I am a Democrat." We must stand up and proclaim, "I am an American."

Being an American in the crisis that is upon us arrogates to each a responsibility and a duty. We must, without complaint and with fortitude, endure that which we have to endure. We must sacrifice if sacrifice is to be our lot, and it will be, though to what extent we cannot tell now.

We must rally behind the President of the United States, for, right or wrong, he is our leader in the cataclysm that impends. We must exhibit no sign of weakness in our common front. We must not be afraid, remembering our President's admonition that the only thing we have to fear is fear itself.

We must not permit ourselves to become confused on the issue before us, for to be confused is to be weak. To be weak is to be lost.

It has been aptly contended, "A nation plagued by doubts and torn by inner controversies cannot help others, cannot even save itself."

We must summon a full measure of courage, firm in the belief that we are in the right, that Almighty God will bless us in our struggle to preserve not only our homeland, but that which is equally precious, our American way of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

This very moment we are on our way. How far into the shadow of the valley of death no mortal man can foretell. Let us take each other by the hand and go on together, one great Nation, one great people, firmly united behind our democratically chosen leader, holding high above all else—high as hope's great throbbing star above the darkness of the dead—our love of country, our love of freedom, our love of right.

I know those who have gone before would have us do no less, because out of the impenetrable chambers in the silent halls of death I hear the voices of our hero dead of all wars wafted to me by the zephyrs that caress their last earthly resting places. They are saying: "Living Americans! For yourselves, for us the dead, for God's great humanity, unite—have courage, have faith. Carry on! So that we shall not have died in vain."

Should the United States Fight in This War?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSHUA L. JOHNS

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 12, 1941

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. JOSHUA L. JOHNS, OF WISCONSIN

Mr. JOHNS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address which I delivered yesterday over the radio:

To my radio audience: As I address you at this hour, there is still ringing in my ears the words of the President of the United States when he said in 1936:

"If war should break out again in another continent, let us not blink at the fact that we would find in this country thousands of Americans who, seeking immediate riches—fool's gold—would attempt to break down or evade our neutrality.

"They would tell you—and, unfortunately, their views would get wide publicity—that if they could produce and ship this and that and the other article to the belligerent nations the unemployed of America would all find work. They would tell you that if they could extend credit to warring nations that credit would be used in the United States to build homes and factories and pay our debts. They would tell you that America once more would capture the trade of the world.

"It would be hard to resist that clamor; it would be hard for many Americans, I fear, to look beyond; to realize the inevitable penalties, the inevitable day of reckoning that came from a false prosperity.

"To resist the clamor of that greed, if war should come, would require the unswerving support of all Americans who love peace.

"If we face the choice of profits or peace, the Nation will answer—must answer—'we choose peace.'"

The President's speeches today sound much different than they did at that time. Perhaps conditions have somewhat changed, but if we should go to war, what are we going to war for? The President tells us we are going to war to save the democracies. I am just wondering how long we would be able to save them. Would we be able to save them for another 23 years, like we did when we helped fight the first World War?

The democracies that the President presumably has in mind are England, China, Greece, and possibly Turkey. Turkey is a dictatorship; Greece is a dictatorship; China is a dictatorship, and as far as England is concerned, in 1928 Mr Anthony Eden, now Foreign Secretary, speaking in behalf of a bill extending the suffrage, felt it necessary to say to the House of Commons on that occasion:

"We have not got democratic government in this country today; we never have had it, and I venture to suggest to the honorable members opposite that we shall never have it. What we have done, in all the progress of reform and evolution of policies, is to broaden the basis of our oligarchy."

There is no doubt in the speaker's mind, or, I feel, in a very large majority of the minds of the people of this country, that they prefer the Government of Great Britain to the governments of her allies or her enemies. Britain is a constitutional state and has been the inspiration of many constitutional states. We of the United States prefer the governments of China, Greece, and Turkey to those of the Axis Powers, but let us not use the word "democracy" to describe every country that is or may be at war with the Axis. I am wondering, if Russia should happen to be attacked by Germany, whether we would immediately classify her as one of the democracies of the world.

What will be America's fate if we should enter the war and it proved to be a long, hard, and bloody one? During the past 10 years we have had on an average of about 10,000,000 people unemployed. As a result of our participation in another war that number would be increased materially. We have an enormous debt of approximately $48,000,000,000 at the present time, besides some $6,000,000,000 that the Government has guaranteed that is not included in this debt. Having exhausted our resources in a long war, what would we have left to take care of the social gains that we have made in the 150 years of our existence? We would have but very little left for food, housing, relief, social security, or education. When we were through we would have want and fear, and we would have the maintenance of order by a government scarcely distinguishable from those we fought against. In my own opinion, it is fairly certain that capitalism will not survive our participation in this war, and it is under the capitalistic system that our country has grown great.

Fear and ignorance wrote the last peace. It grew out of the fear of the French and the British of what the future would be, and the ignorance of all the other nations as to what was taking place. From this fear and ignorance there resulted a peace that has made this present war possible. Certainly there is no less fear and uncertainty and no less ignorance today of what the purposes of the present war and what its results will be.

There are two very good reasons why we should not enter this war. First, it is not our war. We did not start it, and so far as the speaker knows, no one connected with our Government was consulted as to whether we wanted war or not. And, secondly, we are not today adequately prepared to fight a successful war on European soil. I shall discuss briefly these two reasons.

A great deal has been said, in and out of Congress, about this being our war. Of course, such a statement is false and is made for the purpose of solidifying, in the minds of the people, a false idea. The present conflict in Europe broke out without our advice or consent, so far as the American people know. It was Great Britain and France who declared war upon the German Government after being clearly forewarned of Germany's military strength by one of our outstanding citizens, who has been discussed a great deal in the newspapers of late, Col. Charles Lindbergh. He not only told these countries, but he told the United States, that it would be utterly impossible for England and France to compete with the German air force, and every battle since the war began has indicated the truth of his statement. If the present war is our war, we should have been in it from the start and not be gradually talked into it.

We hear a great deal about Great Britain being our first line of defense. Neither Great Britain nor any other country should be our first line of defense, but our defense should be ourselves, and we should be prepared to assert it. When the war began in Europe, no one in the United States was willing to say that it was our war, nor did either Great Britain or France claim that it was our war. Only after months of insidious propaganda over the radio, on the screen, and through the press; and only after Congress had passed one law after another bringing us closer to actual involvement, all of which laws were passed in the name of peace, have people begun to say that this is our war. The catchphrase used to propagandize the people of this country is that the war is one for humanity and democracy, and to preserve civilization. These are very high-sounding terms, and to the World War veterans who participated in the first World War, they have a vividly familiar ring. They fought at that time to "make the world safe for democracy," and "to end all wars"—and the present world situation is a tragic evidence of the failure of their objectives. Although we were able to put 2,000,000 men in Europe to fight at that time who spilled their blood and spent our treasure, we came out of the conflict without a dollar of indemnity, or a square acre of territory, and it is evident to everybody that we did not achieve any of the objectives for which we fought in that World War. All we got out of it was 10 years of depression, 10,000,000 men unemployed, $13,000,000,000 of bad war debts which we have never collected from foreign countries, veterans' hospitals filled with the physical and mental wreckage of war, and four cemeteries in France.

This war, like all wars, is an economic conflict, the result of selfishness and greed and a battle to control the seven seas and to dominate the world's trade. It is just one more struggle in world history among the nations of the old world. We have been warned by both Washington and Jefferson against entangling alliances and against attempting to solve Europe's problems or to police the world. Both the Republican and Democratic political parties in the campaign last year pledged to the American people that American boys would never again be sent to Europe to fight, and that we would not fight any war unless we were attacked. No nation has yet attacked us. None of our American ships has been sunk, and no American life has been lost. That is some record after the war has been going on in Europe as long as it has. This record is especially impressive when we think of the provocations that some countries have had to help us get into this war. We have not been neutral. We have taken sides in this conflict and our attitude has been evident to everybody.

During the campaign last fall, both the President and Mr. Willkie pledged to the fathers and mothers of America that their sons would not be sent to fight in any foreign war. These pledges should be more than "campaign oratory" for no man is better than his word. Pledges should be kept and promises should be fulfilled.

Now for the second reason why we should not enter Europe's war. It is evident to Congress and your speaker this evening that all Americans are united in a program for national defense of our own country and while we are making some progress, in spite of many strikes that have delayed our program for defense, anyone who is actually acquainted with our present state of preparedness knows that we could not successfully fight a war on European soil.

When we entered the last war, our national debt was $1,225,000,000. Today, the interest on our obligations is more than this amount. Today, our national debt, including authorizations for the present defense program and certain contingent liabilities, is nearly $90,000,000,000. The first line of defense of any nation is its own financial solvency.

In the last war, the Allies had Japan, Russia, and Italy on their side and France and Belgium were countries where we could land troops. Today, Belgium and France are occupied by Germany and the other three powerful nations I have just mentioned are her allies instead of the allies of Great Britain. We are all willing to admit that the United States is a great and wealthy nation. We have vast natural resources, an enormous reservoir of skilled labor, and the greatest industrial plants in the world, and perhaps, in a long-drawn-out conflict, with the expenditure of billions more of dollars and the sacrifice of many millions of the best youth of our country, we might win. But certainly we could not fight a winning war in Europe at the present time, so far from our own base of supplies.

On the other hand, there is no nation in Europe, or combination of nations in Europe, that can successfully attack us on our home ground if we prepare proper national defense here. We cannot get over there and they cannot get over here, so why enter this war in Europe, exposing our west coast to an attack from Japan who would certainly attack us if she thought there was any chance of winning, and weakening us with our defense on our eastern shores. To me it seems the height of folly.

Regardless of our inherent or inherited prejudices and in spite of where our sympathies may lie in the present European struggle, our first allegiance and our first duty is to the United States and our own people. The wise thing for us to do at this hour is to center our thoughts, our attention, our prayers, and our energies upon our own country, and not upon some foreign country or countries. The moment we enter this European struggle, it is very questionable whether our economy would survive bankruptcy; if it did not, our democracy would die and our Republic would be supplanted by a totalitarian state. The civil liberties of the people would be destroyed and a military despotism established.

America should put forth all of her efforts to make herself impregnable and invincible to attack from abroad and remain in a position to exert a moral influence, by example, for peace and justice in the world.

The Germans may be highly unethical from our point of view, but this war is not a question of ethics. It is a question of mathematics. We cannot wish these Germans back inside their former borders, nor bring this about just by having high ideals. The real problem is: How can the 200,000,000 Anglo-Saxons apply the necessary armed force to the 70,000,000 to 80,000,000 Germans to beat them back to their own country and restore some kind of sovereignty to Poland, Denmark, Norway, Holland, Belgium, France, Yugoslavia, and Greece?

Hitler has from 6,000,000 to 8,000,000 men under arms and highly trained. To get at him in Europe, we, and all others participating in this war against Germany, would have to establish a bridgehead somewhere in Europe, preferably on the French coast. Judging from the recent highly carbonated conversations between Secretary of State Hull and French Ambassador Henry Haye, the French won't give us such a bridgehead "free for nothing." We would have to fight for it.

As things look at the present time, it would take 10,000,000 soldiers to do this. It could not possibly be done before the end of next year and it looks very much like it might take 10 years to do it. And there would be no sure guaranty that we would win in the end because we would be operating 3,000 miles from our bases while Germany would be operating at home.

The great trouble today is that too many of our own people do not understand the four freedoms that Secretary Hull has spoken about. If we stay out of the war, some day perhaps we may understand and practice freedom of speech, freedom of worship, freedom from want, and freedom from fear. But after 150 years, it seems that many people are just beginning to grasp the meaning of these words. Words like these have no significance unless they are put into actual practice. Just think, we talk about assuring the four freedoms to the world while here, in our own country, one-third of the people are underfed and ill-clothed. The sharecroppers, the Okies, and other similar classes have neither freedom from want nor freedom from fear. Many of them hardly know they are living in a moral order or in a democracy where justice and human rights are supreme. The latest figures of the National Resources Board show that almost 55 pecent of our people are living on family incomes of less than $1,250 a year. On this basis, more than half of our people are living below the minimum level of subsistence. More than half of the Army which will defend democracy will be drawn from those who have had this experience of the economic benefits of our American way of life.

We in America have hardly begun to understand and practice the ideals that we are asked to force on other nations. We all have hope that some day, somehow, we can achieve these ideals. We have the form of government under which we should be able to bring them to realization. We have energy, imagination, and brains. We have made great progress since the beginning of our Government and some day, with us all working together, we may see justice, freedom, and democracy working successfully in our Republic. If we should go to war, it probably would wipe out the gains we have made in the United States over a period of 150 years. It might take us 100 years to regain what we would lose in this war. It would affect education, and our development of local communities would suffer.

Instead of putting any effort at all toward getting into this war, we should put every effort into preparing a defense for the United States against all comers and do everything within our power to remain at peace. Aid others where we can, but always remember that self-preservation is the highest ideal of a free people. If we have a strong defense, a well-developed understanding of the ideals upon which our Government was organized, and a belief in our form of government and the principles for which it stands, we need fear nobody in the world.

W. P. A. Appropriations

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. F. EDWARD HÉBERT

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 12, 1941

Mr. HÉBERT. Mr. Speaker, on yesterday the members of the Louisiana delegation received a communication from the Honorable Sam Jones, Governor of Louisiana, relative to the proposed appropriation for the W. P. A. for the fiscal year beginning July 1. That letter was placed before the Members of this House by my distinguished colleague from north Louisiana, Mr. OVERTON BROOKS.

At this time I want to again bring to the attention of the Members of this House several important observations which Governor Jones made in that communication and to subscribe in full to his conclusions.

It is my understanding that several amendments will be offered on the floor of the House amending the present W. P. A. appropriation bill. It is my understanding that these amendments will include an increase in the amount of the appropriations, elimination of the clause providing for the automatic release of all workers who have been employed continuously for 18 months, and the elimination of the present clause which requires a sponsor's contribution of at least 25 percent of the total cost of the W. P. A. program. I shall vote for each of these amendments and support each wholeheartedly.

A reduction in the W. P. A. rolls by 44 percent at this time would affect some 12,000 heads of families in Louisiana which represents 48,000 individuals. The State of Louisiana, as Governor Jones has pointed out, does not have the money to carry this additional relief burden, and I recognize my responsibility as a Member of Congress from Louisiana to do everything in my power to see that adequate Federal funds are provided to meet any unemployment problem in my State.

According to my information there are over 63,000 needy unemployed heads of families in Louisiana, including those presently assigned to W. P. A. jobs, those on the W. P. A. awaiting-assignment roll, and an estimate of those who are not certified but who are in need of W. P. A. employment.

I further agree with the Governor of Louisiana that on the basis of these facts I feel that the relief expenditures recommended by the Appropriations Committee of the House are inadequate and furthermore that the President should be granted authority by the bill to expend the funds appropriated in less than the fiscal year, provided conditions justify.

We cannot, Mr. Speaker, blind our vision in the face of the facts as they exist in the national-defense program. The South has not received anything but a mere drop in the bucket of the great defense-program contracts. It cannot be logically concluded therefore that the need of continued W. P. A. assistance in the South will be eliminated as a result of the current national-defense program. On the contrary, there is as much need as ever that the W. P. A. program be continued in the Southern States and in those other centers in the Nation which have not benefited through the national-defense program.

It is all well and good, Mr. Speaker, for those from areas where a vast portion of the defense project money has been assigned to say that the unemployment slack has been taken up and W. P. A. appropriations should be cut, but what about those areas of this country where there has not been any appreciable allotment of defense projects? There is just as much need for continuation, and even expansion, of the W. P. A. in those areas as before.

How about those men who cannot be absorbed in the national-defense program, as was so ably pointed out on yesterday by the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CASEY]. I believe it is the Government's responsibility at this time, more than any other time, to give the opportunity to every citizen who wants to work that chance and that privilege.

I am well pleased with the results of the national-defense program in my own particular district, which includes the lower half of New Orleans and the parishes of Plaquemines and St. Bernard. In my own district is located a new shipyard which will employ six or seven thousand persons, and on the shores of Lake Pontchartrain are to be found a 1,000-bed hospital, an air-training school, a bombardment wing, and an observation squadron. I, therefore, am not selfish in urging additional appropriations for the entire State and in those States not affected by the national-defense program.

Louisianians, Mr. Speaker, are loyal citizens and are solidly behind the defense program and the President. Louisianians are ready and willing to contribute their time and their money and their lives, if need be, for the continuation of the American way, and I believe in all justice to them their needs and the needs of equally loyal citizens of other States should be given serious consideration by this Congress.

Let us, Mr. Speaker, adequately provide for our people, and we will have a happy people who make for good government and who will not be found wanting when the test comes to defend that Government.

Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Seaway

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE A. DONDERO

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 12, 1941

EDITORIAL FROM THE PONTIAC (MICH.) DAILY PRESS

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks I include an editorial from the Pontiac Daily Press on the St. Lawrence seaway:

[From the Pontiac (Mich.) Daily Press of June 7, 1941]

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

Completion of the St. Lawrence seaway can mean much to Michigan in many ways. It will cut transportation costs to eastern seaports of our own products and make Great Lakes ports entries for foreign goods needed from Central and South American countries. Its completion, which the President says can be accomplished in 4 years, should bring the advantage of cheap water transportation now enjoyed by coastal cities to our farms and industries. Its effect would be to bring this State a great new source of revenue. By eliminating the 14-foot bottleneck in the St. Lawrence river, it will permit Michigan shipyards and other Great Lake ports to play an important role in the ship-building program.

Some details of how this area would profit is furnished by the Detroit Great Lakes-St. Lawrence seaway committee which points out that Michigan farmers could move dairy and poultry products to the eastern markets at 20 cents a pound below current transportation levels. Fruit and agricultural growers would enjoy comparable benefits. The automobile industry could ship finished cars to customers along the Atlantic, Gulf, and Pacific coasts $10 cheaper than at present, and could supply Europe at $40 less a car.

The three hundred different commodities imported from foreign lands by the automotive industry could be on the Michigan assembly lines at a cost one-third below present levels. This means lower car prices, wider markets, larger pay rolls, and better business for the automotive cities such as Pontiac. Coffee from Brazil and citrus fruits from Florida would reach the Michigan markets at a third of present transportation costs. Endless benefits might be listed. This saving would be passed on to the consumers. The profit would be mutual. Completion of the seaway could have a stimulating effect upon Michigan's economic life.

The project of the St. Lawrence seaway has been before the public of Canada and the United States for many years. It has been endorsed by several Presidents and Canadian leaders. But at last the time seems ripe to bring about this great project. President Roosevelt has recommended legislation by Congress authorizing immediate construction. He sees in the water power to be developed a great aid to national defense of both the United States and Canada, as well as the trade benefits which we visualize. He believes that under the emergency we can complete this long-delayed project in far less than the normal estimated time of 4 years. "I know no single project of this nature more important to this country's future in peace or war," says he.

Michigan is back of his efforts to start this great undertaking.

Major de Seversky Endorses Mundt Resolution Asking for Inquiry on Need for Unified Air Control

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 12, 1941

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Speaker, a steadily increasing number of letters and newspaper comments are reaching me daily in support of my resolution, House Resolution 228, now before the Rules Committee, which would authorize the Speaker to appoint a nine-man committee to examine the relative merits of our present set-up for utilizing the rapidly growing air power of the United States compared with the possible establishment of a separate air branch or the consolidation of all defense activities in a Department of National Defense with separate heads of Air, Army, and Navy having coordinate rank under the unified direction of the Department of National Defense.

The following letter from Maj. Alexander P. de Seversky has special significance in view of the fact that administration forces selected him to reply to the analysis made by Col. Charles Lindbergh of the air power of the major countries of the world:

NEW YORK, N. Y., June 10, 1941.

The Honorable KARL E. MUNDT,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have recently read of your resolution to create a special committee to investigate the advisability of establishing a separate air force, and I wish to congratulate you on your foresight and understanding of the problems which our country faces.

It is my belief that our national security depends on an independent and hard-hitting air force, with a personnel completely divorced from Army and Navy supervision, trained upon the new principles and conditioned to the new strategy, tactics, and psychology of aerial warfare. It must be done at once, before we commit ourselves to a program of error which can only result in our ultimate defeat and humiliation at the hands of the enemies of democracy.

Whatever knowledge and experience I may possess in aviation matters is at your disposal in your endeavor to create such an air department. I am enclosing herewith a few articles which I have written on this subject. If any of the material contained therein can be of service to you, you are at liberty to use it in any way you see fit.

With my best wishes for your success, I am,

Sincerely yours,

ALEXANDER P. DE SEVERSKY.

With his letter to me, Major de Seversky enclosed articles which he has recently had published in the American Mercury, Reader's Digest, Look magazine, and the Daily Mirror, all stressing the advisability of unifying the air forces of the United States so that the most modern methods may be utilized in utilizing this most modern of all forms of national defense.

Mr. Speaker, I have also just received a letter from Col. Roscoe Turner, America's No. 1 speed pilot, endorsing my resolution, offering his assistance in presenting evidence before Congress, and enclosing some statements by him to demonstrate the importance of a unified air control in the United States.

The defense of America and of the Western Hemisphere is the No. 1 job of this country today, Mr. Speaker. To this paramount task this country is devoting its united effort and dedicating its collective purse. We all join in insisting that American soldiers, sailors, and airmen have the most modern and effective equipment in the world. To that end, we have this week appropriated an additional $10,000,000,000 to the vast sums heretofore appropriated. More appropriations for more modern defense machines are to come and the most exacting methods are used to test and inspect all this modern equipment before it is turned out in mass production or accepted to protect the lives and toughen the effectiveness of America's defense personnel. This is as it should be, for the defense of our way of life in our sphere of influence is not to be entrusted to antiquated machinery of defense or untried and untested innovations in the field of invention.

BUT OUR METHODS SHOULD BE TESTED AS CAREFULLY AS OUR MATERIALS

By the same token, Mr. Speaker, America should examine and investigate the effectiveness of its methods of defense in the same dispassionate and unprejudiced manner as we examine and investigate the materials of our defense establishments. Only the best answer to the fundamental question, "What is best for America?" should be the standard for determining which materials to accept or reject and which methods for utilizing these modern materials to perpetuate or discard. It is in this spirit that I introduced House Resolution 228 which would empower a congressional committee of highly qualified Members to examine and investigate, without prejudice and without preconceived conclusions, the best method for utilizing the vast new air power which the United States is rapidly creating. If a complete and careful inquiry reveals our present method of utilizing air power as an adjunct to our Army and Navy best answers the question, "What is best for America?" so let it be. And following such a finding from such an investigation, let there then be an end to the constantly growing wave of criticism from military sources as well as editorial sanctuaries.

If, on the other hand, such a candid analysis and inquiry reveals that a separate air force can best train our pilots, develop the full effectiveness of war planes, gliders, parachutists, and so forth, and provide protection for the Western Hemisphere, let the change be made without regard to sacred traditions and established usage. Finally, if, as many people believe, including your speaker, the time has come in America for the creation of an over-all Department of National Defense to consolidate all defense establishments under one head, with separate chiefs of coordinate rank in charge of air, Army, and Navy, and such a congressional inquiry demonstrates this to be the most effective method to organize and operate the defense of the Western Hemisphere, let this change be made. America can afford the best defense establishments in the world, and we can create the best organization in history to get the best results from these establishments.

It is not a healthful condition to have so many authoritative commentators and critics advocating drastic changes in our defense set-up without having any board of inquiry to examine the merit of our existing arrangement or to test the value of the proposed innovations. Such a congressional inquiry as I propose will provide a proving ground in which to demonstrate and evaluate the respective merits of all systems—past, present, and proposed. Once such an authentic and all-out inquiry has been completed and its conclusions made, America will enlist with renewed determination and confidence in the support and development of whatever arrangement is pronounced to be best fitted to finally and fully answer the question, What is best for America?

What the Seaway Means to New York and the United States

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALFRED F. BEITER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 12, 1941

ARTICLE FROM THE APRIL-JUNE ISSUE OF THE WESTSIDER

Mr. BEITER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following copy of a reprinted article from the April-June (1941) issue of the Westsider. The article, entitled "What the Seaway Means to New York and the United States," was written by Lee S. Buckingham, president of the Clinton Trust Co., of New York City.

As president of this large banking institution, Mr. Buckingham has been seriously concerned over the effect the proposed St. Lawrence seaway would have upon the present commerce and transportation facilities of the country. Of course, he is particularly interested in the losses to the port of New York. Some of the results of his studies along this line are contained in the article which I feel sure will be interesting to my colleagues who are now seriously considering the St. Lawrence seaway project.

Any port which handles one-half of the value of all the salt-water tonnage of the United States must certainly play a prominent part in the country's commerce. It follows that the entire Nation owes it to itself to protect and promote that port if confusion and turmoil are to be avoided. Bringing this basic truth down to a specific case, the so-called selfish argument of New York's port against the proposed St. Lawrence seaway is an argument which has national significance.

One might go further and add that the same arguments apply with equal emphasis, though in lesser degree, to the great ports of Boston, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Norfolk, or New Orleans, since the seaway would adversely affect all of them. Let us confine ourselves, however, to the New York area in our efforts to show that the losses to this port would affect the entire country if the seaway were approved.

Figures of the United States Army Engineer Corps show that in 1937 approximately 386,000 tons of Great Lakes freight were exported from or imported to Europe by means of the New York State Barge Canal, and that an additional 647,000 tons of coastwise freight were handled in the same waterway. The total value of this freight, all of which had to be transshipped through some New York port channel, amounted to $66,000,000. These figures do not, of course, include the millions of dollars' worth of freight brought from the Great Lakes ports to New York by railroads and trucks. This is an important consideration, since there are 4 or 5 months during the year when the barge canal boats and Great Lakes steamers are not in operation. Such figures are not readily available. We do know, however, that the exports from the Hudson River channel alone in 1937 of four commodities which come principally from the Great Lakes region—wheat, automobiles, copper ore, and iron and steel—had a value of $210,000,000. This amounted approximately to one-quarter of the export business of that particular channel. We do not know the value of similar cargo in the other channels of the port, but in weight it totaled 1,544,000 short tons, as contrasted with 1,677,000 tons shipped from the Hudson River channel.

It would seem reasonable, therefore, to estimate the total value of the business done in these four commodities as being in the neighborhood of $400,000,000. If the seaway were built, and the claims of its promoters were realized, practically all of this business would be diverted from New York. If it were transshipped from Boston, Baltimore, or New Orleans, the national phase of our argument would be considerably weakened, but such is not the case. It would go directly without transshipment to Liverpool, Southampton, Cherbourg, or Bremen.

Would the saving in the elimination of the transshipping cost be reflected in higher prices to American producers or manufacturers? Certainly not. In a comparable case in 1929 the American railroads, at the request of the Government, reduced the export rates on grain in order to stimulate exports and increase farmers' prices. Almost immediately the market collapsed and prices hit a new low level. The net result was that the farmers received less for growing the grain; the railroads received less for hauling it; while the foreign traders and consumers reaped a harvest. There is no economic reason to expect a different result in this instance.

Now with these facts at hand, let us go back to the basic statement that the entire country is, or should be, interested in preserving the prosperity of this port area. In the first place, 10 percent of the population of the country resides therein. It possesses 17 percent of the country's buying power, 27 percent of its marginal buying power, 14 percent of its retail sales, 17 percent of its grocery sales, 11 percent of its drug sales, 20 percent of its wearing-apparel sales, 15 percent of its household sales, 20 percent of its new-building contracts, and 15 percent of its department-store sales. Its total retail sales volume aggregates more than $4,500,000,000 yearly.

Is there a single section of the country which would not be affected in the matter of distribution of its produced or manufactured goods if New York were to lose an annual business which in value amounts to $400,000,000? Certainly no one can gainsay the fact that if income is reduced, which it obviously would be, purchasing power will be reduced in the same ratio.

Suppose we consider the single item of fruits and vegetables, for which figures on New York's consumption are readily available. In 1939 the New York area purchased fruits and vegetables to the number of 2,626 carlots from Arizona; 40,724 from California; 40,004 from Florida; 2,051 from Idaho; 583 from Louisiana; 6,181 from Maine; 3,174 from Maryland; 779 from Michigan; 240 from Mississippi; 4,602 from North Carolina; 2,012 from Oregon; 6,698 from Texas; 247 from Utah; and 3,287 from Washington. Out of a domestic total of 199,000 carlots of fruits and vegetables consumed that year, only 46,000 carlots were produced in New York State. The remainder came from 46 other States of the Union. Rhode Island alone was missing in the matter of fruits and vegetables.

In the matter of meats, New York in 1939 consumed 502,625,000 pounds of western dressed carcasses, 115,696,000 pounds of western dressed cured meats, and 166,818,000 pounds of western dressed fresh and frozen cuts. Added together, these supplies from the Mississippi Valley and the western plains totaled exactly 50 percent of New York's domestic consumption for that year.

"One might go on indefinitely and consider household supplies, furniture, wearing apparel, other food products, cosmetics, lumber, metals, iron and steel, aluminum, soaps, glassware, textiles, and hundreds of other commodities. In every instance the results would show that the prosperity of some part of the country is dependent upon New York's purchases. There have been times in the past when much sectional jealousy existed concerning New York, but the dissemination of statistics, such as those just quoted, has made it evident in recent years that New York must be prosperous if the rest of the country is to enjoy economic success."

Of course, outside of its limited number of supporters, nobody seriously believes that the St. Lawrence seaway could provide sufficient economic inducements to justify the diversion of all this business. In that case the seaway would probably reach the highest pinnacle of man's folly—but it would still have to be paid for by American taxpayers.

Boiled down to logical conclusions, we are faced with a proposal which, if successful, would ruin the commerce of the Atlantic seaboard and the Gulf of Mexico for the benefit of foreign purchasers and which, if not successful, would still cost the United States and Canada something like $1,000,000,000. It seems almost unnecessary to add that the entire country should demand that this uneconomic proposal be permanently shelved.

United States Trade in Latin America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. C. WAYLAND BROOKS

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, June 12 (legislative day of Tuesday, June 10), 1941

ADDRESS BY C. V. WHITNEY

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. President, I submit an address by Mr. C. V. Whitney, chairman of the Pan American Airways System, entitled "The Challenge to United States Trade in Latin America," and request that it be included in the Appendix of the RECORD.

This address was delivered before the National Association of Credit Men at New Orleans on May 13, and is of such importance that I wish, in addition, to call it to the attention of the Members of the Senate.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE CHALLENGE TO UNITED STATES TRADE IN LATIN AMERICA

First, let me say that this talk about Latin America may be a mixture of the pleasant—with the grim. Only by considering both can we fully realize the conditions which we, as businessmen and Americans, face today. I hope the combination of the two will leave you and the citizens of this city with an impression that I am urging you to face facts. At no time in our history have we so needed to be realistic.

To New Orleans and to the State of Louisiana I have a message to be spoken as chairman of the board of directors of Pan American Airways. And to those of you at this convention, I believe I have a message of particular importance because my subject affects the trade, the unity, and the defense of all the Americas.

For years New Orleans has been a great center of our Nation's commerce. Today this city and this port have become of vital importance in our national program for the unity and defense of the hemisphere. For the task that lies ahead, New Orleans has at its command splendid rail, river, and sea transportation. To these will soon be added the airplane—the swiftest trade vehicle used by man—which will make New Orleans a base for speeding its cargoes of trade and democratic good will between the Americas.

Pan American Airways, which pioneered America's international air trade routes, today awaits only our Government's go-ahead signal to make New Orleans our country's newest springboard for greatly increased expansion of trade and commerce between the Americas. We hope to build—within the shortest possible time—a bridge of planes across the Mexican Gulf to connect New Orleans with the Pan American network of airways to every Latin American capital and commercial center. Given these new facilities for modern commerce, the day is not far off when New Orleans will flourish on the air routes, as it has on the river and sea routes, as an aerial terminus for inter-American trade moving from the center of the United States through this port, by the shortest possible route, into the heart of South America.

Geographically speaking, your meeting here in New Orleans expresses a hope welling out of the heart of the United States. That hope is symbolized by the majestic force of the Mississippi, which collects its waters from smaller arteries that tap the largest developed industrial and agricultural area in the world. The flow of the Mississippi is southward. Here in New Orleans it forms a natural arrowhead pointing toward Latin America.

This is the direction in which a large section of American business is now headed. In the variety of your interests as credit men, you tap the daily values of local and national production, and you, therefore, represent the power of business on the march toward the unification of the Americas.

Ahead of you lies an important task. But to succeed we must all realize beforehand that there are powerful opposing forces at work, forces which are seeking to curb the aims of free trade—even of democracy, and liberty—in the Americas.

As one of the men who brought Pan American Airways into being 14 years ago, I remember well the constant struggles, the little victories and the defeats of the last decade. Nevertheless, we have seen a little air line start from a perilous 90-mile flight between Key West and Habana in 1927, then progress and grow until it now speeds American commerce and good will across half the earth.

This task was not accomplished by men with philosophies of defeatism. Nor can the job ahead of you be accomplished if you say, "It cannot be done," or if you believe that it is too late, any more than we can safeguard our own security here at home if we follow those who say that democracy in Europe cannot survive the present conflict. Believe me, it is not too late to help England in her present struggle to preserve freedom and democracy. Nor it is too late to consolidate the Americas into a strong and prosperous community of nations that will stand for all times.

The war has focused our attention upon the other side of the Atlantic. Our country is concerned with delivering great quantities of materials, and particularly aviation equipment, to the battlefields of Europe, Asia, and Africa. But today the peace of South America is being broken by undeclared political and economic warfare in which the airplane is also playing a strong role. There are few today who will not agree that the most significant political fact of our time, and for the future, is the certainty that the air is the new road to power and trade. The Axis Powers, especially, are conscious of this in South America.

Contrary to popular supposition, the demands of the war in Europe have not weakened the force of the Axis Powers in their drive to control the air over South America. The outbreak of the war caused suspension of Great Britain's plans to establish a network of air lines on the southern continent. The Dutch are tenaciously clinging to one small line on the north coast of South America. The aircraft of air France have been grounded. But into this same field the Axis forces in the air continue to move deliberately and aggressively.

It may surprise some of you to hear that the Axis air powers in South America are stronger than ever before. Over the trans-Atlantic route which the French were forced to abandon, Fascist Italy has set up a new air line which links Rome and Berlin with the great capitals of eastern South America. On the South American Continent itself air lines owned or in large measure dominated by Germany, parallel or oppose America's air services along nearly 22,000 miles of strategic trade ways.

The very existence of these foreign elements in the Americas has been described as a "time bomb laid at the most vulnerable part of the United States—its economy." These Axis planes, we know, spread the Nazi gospel in our neighboring republics. They are penetrating the most remote sections of the continent—where no commercial air line can be justified by the existing need for transport and communication. Commercially, these are unprofitable enterprises. Yet unending subsidies flow across the seas and continue to make up for their steady commercial losses.

I need not tell you that these foreign air services in Latin America are not aimed toward commercial goals alone. In many ways they serve other purposes. For instance, planes of the German-controlled Condor Syndicate make mysterious flights out over the South Atlantic for no reasons which can be justified by the commercial character of their legally chartered operations. The Brazilian Government learned that, as late as March 27, an Italian trans-Atlantic plane, ostensibly on a flight to test engines, disappeared off the coast of Recife, Brazil, and was gone 8 hours before returning to its base.

It could, of course, be pure coincidence that after this "test flight" two Italian steamers heavily laden with war supplies slipped from the Brazilian port—and through the British patrol—on their way to Europe.

In Argentina, the Government recently authorized a new air line to establish a local service out of Buenos Aires. An American manufacturer offered to supply the necessary equipment, if it could be spared from our defense production. The terms were attractive, but cash. The American's German competitor, dealing through the Nazi Condor Syndicate, was ready with a counter-proposal—to loan the Argentine air line two modern transports of German manufacture, complete with operating crews, for 6 months. By that time, they assured the Argentine operator, new planes for replacement would arrive from Germany. And these new planes they were prepared to deliver without deposit and to accept payment in installments spread over the next 5 years.

Gentlemen, I am no alarmist. I am not the first to report these and many similar instances. But I can assure you that they bear constant repeating. What we are witnessing in some South American countries now is simply a variation of a process of economic aggression which Axis Powers have worked successfully in Europe over and over again. The method calls first for the softening of the intended victim through this type of economic malpractice. Later the country itself which, through its commerce, has become obligated, suddenly is faced with the threat of military aggression. We have seen how the small nations, particularly, have had to give up with scarcely more than a diplomatic struggle.

Our Government at Washington has for many months been working on a program to solidify democratic interests in the American republics and to find ways and means of expanding our mutual trade as an offset to foreign economic aggression.

This program can succeed only if it has the absolute loyalty and up-to-the-hilt cooperation of every businessman in America. It represents a goal which requires long-range planning and constant, consistent effort. It may even demand the sacrifice of initial profits in order to enable you to withstand the political and economic thrusts of foreign competitors. But I know you will stand ready to make such temporary sacrifices without reservation if and when they confront you, because you know that they will be important for our national welfare. Large dividends are certain to come later.

Inter-American unity and defense can be built only upon a broad economic base aimed at the permanent establishment of commercial relationships. I do not mean to boast in pointing to the dynamic activity of Pan American Airways on this score. Nor do I wish to infer that what we have been able to accomplish, in raising American air transport to unquestioned leadership in Latin America, is possible of duplication, to the same extent, in all other commercial enterprises.

Pan American Airways started out 14 years ago with a realistic program and with the determination that, despite set-backs and discouragement, we would continue to build toward a permanent place in the life of the Americas. True, we constantly had to adapt our development to changing conditions both at home and abroad. True we modified plans or made entirely new ones to meet the changing strain of unorthodox methods wherever necessary. But we were never forced to deviate from our primary course. And—I believe this is significant—we have never had to abandon the cardinal principles of American business morality.

For the task ahead you businessmen of America have at your command today not only greatly improved transport and communication but many specialized aids as well.

For example, only a few weeks ago, I visited the offices of an import-export magazine publishing house in New York City. Toward the rear of a huge room there was a large round object which at first I thought was a table of unwieldly proportions, the kind around which perhaps 50 men could sit comfortably at the same time. I asked my friend, the publisher, about the table. He brought me closer to it. I then saw that this was no table at all. Its sides were fitted with compartments containing telephone directories from virtually every foreign city in the world. My friend pressed a button by his side and the whole object, telephone books and all, began turning like the base of a merry-go-round. Through this ingenious device any member of his staff could in a moment find the name, address, and telephone number of every business house in every major country of the world. The device also made it possible to check credit ratings within a few minutes.

In a similar manner you credit men have at your fingertips intimate information about the lives and businesses of millions of men and women throughout the United States. South American businessmen are not basically different from us, and information regarding the state of their trade and commerce is almost as easily available. If this information is not within quick reach, the airplane has brought it closer than ever before.

All of this is by way of bringing home to you the fact that a credit risk in a foreign country at peace should not be any greater than many right in your own home city.

Of course, there are bad credit risks in foreign countries—just as there are bad risks here at home. But I am sure that those of you who are members of the Foreign Credit Interchange Bureau will support me in criticizing the blindness of those who are unwilling to move beyond the borders of our own country because of an allegedly increased credit risk. We have found, through analysis, that credit is temporarily disturbed by political or social factors. But real credit, which is based upon the integrity of the individual himself, is not so disturbed.

Credit men everywhere know this to be true. And it is of the first importance that all American businessmen understand that foreign credit, just as domestic credit within our own United States is, in the last analysis, based upon the individual. You will find, as we have, that business in Latin America, just as business here at home, is negotiated and administered by individuals who share the same qualities of integrity which we so highly respect within our own business community.

You may say that I feel this way because I am interested in a company that chose South America for development and that, naturally, we must have adapted ourselves to the requirements of such a project. That is true. Yet it is only because Pan American Airways has succeeded in their American trade that I presume to speak to you with any authority at all. We have met in the past, and continue to face today, the same problems which confront all businessmen who are active or seek to be active in Latin America.

As credit men, you have a grave responsibility for maintaining the best principles of American trade and business practices in our inter-American relationships. Your help is needed if we are eventually to eliminate the unsound economic relationships which exist in this important field. If you will but use your resources and your business contacts to encourage a freer flow of trade, in both directions between the Americas—and with an equal opportunity for profits for both South and North America—you will help to remove a major obstruction from the road to true hemisphere unity.

In citing this point, I do not want to miss this opportunity of recalling the wholehearted way in which you and other members of your profession have been employing arbitration to help inter-American trade. From my own activities with the American Arbitration Association, I have come to know and have enjoyed working with several of you. The National Association of Credit Men holds a service membership in the Arbitration Group, and I know that many of you contribute financially to the support and development of arbitration. Many of you, too, have taken an important lead in this work. I need only name one—the manager of the Foreign Credit Interchange Bureau, Mr. Campbell, who is also chairman of the Inter-American Committee on Trade Relations which was organized by the American Arbitration Association .

But in other fields, too, I have come to know the value of your cooperation. I know that you hold the trust of the American business community. I ask you to offer similar cooperation and to employ that trust in the cause of the defense and unity of the Americas. I cannot emphasize this need too strongly. Just as the Mississippi, on whose banks we stand, is the main artery for the wealth and commerce of such a large section of our Nation so is credit the lifeblood of business. Since you and other members of your organization administer this lifeblood, the task ahead of you is a clear one. I trust that, through your expert guidance, a "Mississippi" of new credit may flow across the Gulf.

You, the credit men of America, can do more than any other single group to help the peoples of both Americas to reach a common economic understanding.

I urge you. Teach the American businessman everywhere to disregard the bugaboo of social and political intrigue. I urge you to lead the way—to reach out across such temporary barriers to the business spirit of the individual beyond our frontiers. It is you—and he—who have within your hands the molding of the economic future of the American republics.

Address of Hon. James A. Farley, Former Postmaster General, Delivered at the Graduating Exercises of the New York Military Academy, Cornwall-on-Hudson, N. Y.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH A. GAVAGAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 13, 1941

ADDRESS BY HON. JAMES A. FARLEY, AND INTRODUCTION BY HON. CHARLES HARDY, OF NEW YORK

Mr. GAVAGAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address of Hon. James A. Farley and introduction by Hon. Charles J. Hardy, Sr., of New York City:

INTRODUCTION BY HON. CHARLES J. HARDY, SR.

Ladies and gentlemen and young men of the graduating class, it is my very pleasant duty to present to you the distinguished gentleman who puts aside for the moment the cares of a busy life and honors us by his presence today.

He needs no introduction from me, so I shall attempt none. His name is a household word throughout the length and breadth of our land, spoken always with admiration and with a depth of affection that testifies most eloquently to the place he holds in the minds and the hearts of our people. He typifies the highest ideal of American citizenship, which is the embodiment of all that our academy stands for—loyalty to the principles upon which our Republic is founded; steadfastness in right doing; square and fair dealing toward all men, the Honorable James A. Farley:

ADDRESS BY THE HONORABLE JAMES A. FARLEY

Mr. Hardy, Colonel Pattillo, honored guests, and members of the graduating class of 1941, it gives me great pleasure to address the graduating class of 1941. I sincerely hope and trust I will have the pleasure of being present on a similar occasion 5 years from now, when I hope my son, Jimmy, who is one of the younger students here, will take his place among the many fine citizens who have been trained for life's work in this famous academy.

I have been personally acquainted with the high standing of the New York Military Academy ever since my boyhood days. It was because I knew intimately about your ideals that I was happy to have one of my own come under the influence of your distinguished faculty and historic traditions. I trust that my remarks today to the class being graduated will contain a few nuggets of worthwhile observation to be helpful to them in the pursuit of their careers.

The most grevious loss to mankind in my time has been a decline in respect for the pledged word, for promises, either our own or the other fellow's, and in mutual good faith. In saying this I am preaching from no dogmatic motto card. I think that what I have to say on this subject is the most realistic doctrine in the world.

The whole structure of civilization was built upon respect for truth and upon honor in keeping promises and discharging obligations. For example, there was no supergovernment in international law, no final force, no force at all except that of good conscience. The peace of the whole world rested on one single concept—reliance on promises in treaties and Christian principles of mutual respect for the smaller and the weaker peoples. When it was demonstrated, by the "scrap of paper" incident in 1914 that a brutal and sinister influence had crept back on humanity from the prehistoric cave man era the principal prop of international peace and security began to fail. There was no reliance left except threat and force counterbalancing force and threat. By that decline of peace through honor and honesty the whole world courts chaos and destruction. There is no peace. The nations are armed camps. Mutual respect has given way to mutual suspicion if not hatred. Spiritually the world has returned to the moral gloom of the Dark Ages—and all this because of the easy error of regarding truth and honor as little more than words in a schoolboy's copybook.

I do not need to labor this point. You can see it today wherever you look from pole to pole. "Macbeth hath murdered sleep" and international trickery hath murdered the peace of the world without which civilization cannot survive. Christ is crucified again more brutally, more terribly than ever happened at Calvary.

You do not need to look beyond your own daily experience to see another aspect of my point. It is not alone in international relations that civilization rests on truth, honor, good faith and reliance on mutual promises. Our family relations are the basis of our domestic security and peace. They are all that distinguish civilization from savagery. In them there is little eventual effective legal compulsion. They rest on the high moral determination of decent men to fulfill their obligations to their dependents.

Yet I need not ask you to imagine the destruction of everything that is sweet and enjoyable in this life, if those reliances should fail and the sacred institution of family and community life among us should become such a mockery of honor and good faith as has perverted so many international relations that depended on the same kind of truth, good faith, and honor.

To bring this argument into an even more realistic area, does it ever occur to you, that our whole economic life—commercial and industrial—rests absolutely on faith in the promises in contracts, express or implied? Not a wheel could turn in industry or transportation, not an individual would be secure in his employment for a single day, not a breadwinner for a family, rich or poor, could put his head on his pillow peacefully without some assurance that the engagements of promises, taken and given by him, would be faithfully fulfilled.

Laws can support but they cannot insure this tranquillity. It rests almost wholly in the confidence of each of us in the good faith of all of us. For that reason, every time one of us suffers even a momentary lapse in these vital obligations of truth and fair dealing he, by so much, strikes a little blow—slight perhaps, but of the same nature—as the terrible volcanic blastings that are being struck abroad today at every pillar of human happiness and security.

We are standing here almost within sight of the scene of the treason of Benedict Arnold—a brave soldier, a competent general, but a little man, a petulant man, a selfish man—which may all be compressed in two words—a "disloyal man." The immediate object of his military conspiracy failed, but the effect of his transgression on the minds and spirits and strength of the sorely beset defenders of this Nation and the architects of our future could have been disastrous.

What I am trying to say to you is that the homely, ancient virtues—truth, honor, and loyalty—are never to be taken lightly. They are not merely the basis of civilization in general but of our free American system in particular and of the highest hopes of mankind.

There is abroad in the world a substitute doctrine. It is not new. It is as old as tyranny and oppression. It recognizes that no nation is stronger than the sum of the strength of all its citizens. But it says also that the individual is too weak and untrustworthy to be depended upon to discharge the obligations of which I have spoken and upon which culture and civilization rests. For the moral and mutual responsibility of each of us separately and all of us together as the bulwark of national strength it substitutes the will of a dictator. For the compulsion of conscience and good faith it offers the compulsion of bondage, imprisonment, and the firing squad. For the leaven of good faith in human hearts it offers the whiplash of overwhelming force on human backs.

In other words, it is not only your own peace and security that depends on your faithful adherence to all that has been considered best among us, it is also your freedom. If our beliefs in our ancient virtues do not make us strong enough to resist and overcome this primitive dark and bestial doctrine, it will overcome the world, and civilization will go back to the nothing it set out from.

In this tragic conflict of ideas, perhaps tyranny has one great advantage. It speaks with a single mouth and relies on a single performance. Its millions of minions are puppets. Our system relies solely on the spontaneous and unfailing devotion to our ideals of millions of free men. The duty of keeping us true to them and so preserving our national strength and happiness is on no superior. It is on each of us separately. In that sense each of you is a sentinel on duty over a key point in the defense of humanity against an ever-present vicious and deadly dangerous enemy. Your military training tells you what that means. Yours is a trusteeship for us all—a responsibility high, direct, and acutely personal, and so is mine, and so is that of every one of us. The general and special orders are simple, but in this crumbling of all old values throughout the world, I cannot overestimate to you the value of their very triteness. "Be honest, truthful, faithful, and loyal and our country will have little to fear, no matter what happens elsewhere on this earth."

There is one more quality as precious as the others I have named. It also may be abstract in statement or sound like another Sunday school maxim, but in the sense of which I speak it is as concrete, practical and necessary as a well-formed brick. Let me say here a word about courage. I don't now refer to any parade of physical fearlessness. I am talking to you about the silent intestinal fortitude that is yours alone in the still watches of the night—4-o'clock-in-the-morning courage—confidence in yourself and in the future of our country that never fails or even wavers.

There has been too much sentimentality recently about the handicap of our present youth, their "gloomy outlook," and the "lost generation." There is no doubt also that you start out under dark skies—that you are born to sacrifice and hardship. But these are precisely the things that forge the metal of men. Especially are they the things that have hammered out the character of America.

Let's skip a generation or two. There is nothing glowering over your skies today that begins to equal the danger and the challenges that met the pioneers in the conquest of this continent and the making and preservation of this Nation.

Tyrannical powers threatening from abroad? Why, in those days they were not even abroad. They were entrenched here in the Western Hemisphere surrounding us—north, south, and west of our beginnings.

Lack of equipment and preparation and dismay at threatening dangers? Why we started out on the edge of a howling wilderness. Savage men, savage coasts, unknown country frowned upon those generations from every side. With little more than their bare hands, the silent courage of their souls, their undoubting confidence in themselves, and the future of their country, they were willing to tackle anything. They did tackle everything and they peopled a continent in the shortest time, with the richest and most powerful civilization ever known in human history. You are confronted with no such task and menace as that. In comparison your lot is easy and your future high.

Dark days alternated with bright ones. Nothing that comforts you remotely resembles the dangers and dismay that threatened this country much later. For months the flag of an enemy floated within sight of the Capitol at Washington, and those were years when the dissolution of our country seemed inevitable. Then there was the Civil War, and recently the depth of the dreadful depression in 1933.

And let me say this to you also. No generation that has been produced in this country ever faced a desperate crisis as well prepared as you. In our earlier days only a few of the young could be given by their parents and their country even the rudiments of education. Also little was formerly known of proper principles of child health, diet, and culture. With each forward step this condition has been improved. You are the heirs of all the ages in the foremost files of time.

I was pleased and astonished recently to read that the great national cross-section of the draft, last taken in 1917 and 1918, and being repeated again today, revealed that young men selected so short a time as 23 years ago were, on the average, between 1 and 2 inches less tall and about 15 pounds lighter than the present crop. This is in the nature of a scientific miracle.

It is only necessary to sit for a short time and talk to this generation to realize how far they are ahead of the youth of my day in knowledge and education. There is no yardstick to measure this and there may be exceptions. But my contemporaries are unanimous in telling me that the advance in mental equipment is as great as that in physical equipment.

In all that you can take great pride. But never forget this, your elders can take an even greater pride. This didn't just happen. It came because those who went before you and begot you, never lost sight of those spontaneous obligations of family and other relations of which I have told you—the very foundation of American institutions. There is nothing in this regard that you enjoy or shall in the future enjoy that was not handed down to you through the sacrifice and self-denial of elders who loved you from childhood, watched over you from the cradle in a determination that whatever was denied them in youth should not be withheld from you.

I know an old lady who sometimes and truly says: "There was never a pair of clean white hands that came to majority without one or more pairs of hard and sometimes grimy hands behind them to make it so." Never let that thought escape your minds.

You go forth in the pride and the confidence of country and of all American generations that have gone before you. That may and should be a sense of great gratification to you. But it should put in your hearts an even greater sense of duty and responsibility. You are their heirs and the product of their sacrifice. You must be grateful and show your gratitude by works and not mere words. You cannot let your country or your elders down. It is not enough for you to repeat their records and their triumphs. You shall have fallen short if you do not greatly better them. I know you will.

Emergency Relief Appropriation, Fiscal Year 1942

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES DOMENGEAUX

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 13, 1941

Mr. DOMENGEAUX. Mr. Speaker, much has been said on this floor, both pro and con, on the emergency relief appropriation bill for the fiscal year of 1941. For the present fiscal year there was $1,350,650,000 available for the purpose of this Government agency. In view of the present national-defense program, many beneficiaries of the W. P. A. have been absorbed in defense industry, and in his original budget, the President requested $984,000,000 for this department. This figure was revised on May 20 to $875,000,000, the idea being advanced by the bill's proponents that this additional slash should also be made in the name of the absorption of workers in the defense program, and that the original amount is now not needed. In addition to this, there is an amendment which will make a further reduction of $50,000,000 by transfer to the food-stamp plan which will naturally further reduce the amount of people that can be gainfully employed by the W. P. A.

I am not intimately familiar with conditions in the other States which have received a lion's share of the defense contracts and industrial production, but I can definitely speak for Louisiana and most of the other States in the deep South, where national-defense contracts and industrial activity is the exception rather than the rule. If this bill is allowed to go through in its present state, with its 44 percent reduction, more than 12,000 heads of families, representing approximately 48,000 individuals, will be released from employment by the W. P. A. in Louisiana commencing next month. Louisiana is in no financial condition to carry this additional relief burden, so I ask you gentlemen of the House what shall be done with these people who are unable to find employment elsewhere after they have been dropped from the relief rolls? Our relief rolls have not been lessened by the national-defense program. As a matter of fact, we still have many applicants for relief who have waited in vain for many months for the assistance our Congress has pledged to give, and who will now face utter starvation should this slash materialize.

According to my information, the average age of W. P. A. workers is 43 years, and it is a known fact that industry almost invariably will refuse to give employment to a person over 40 years of age. Should these people be treated as castoffs and, with their families, allowed to suffer starvation and need, as indicated in the following poem:

In savage tribes where skulls are thick,
And primal passions rage,
They have a system, sure and quick,
To cure the blight of age.
For when a native's youth has fled
And years have sapped his vim
They simply knock him on the head
And put an end to him.

But we in this enlightened age,
Are built of nobler stuff,
And so we look with righteous rage
On deeds so harsh and rough.
For when a man grows old and gray
And weak and short of breath,
We simply take his job away
And let him starve to death.

In addition to helping those unfortunate people who are unable to get employment elsewhere, the W. P. A. program has done our country an immeasurable amount of good. You may recall only a few years ago, before this program started, we had utter chaos, fear, insecurity, and near revolution. Through this agency we have helped the unfortunate and at the same time have generally benefited by the construction of public buildings and schools, highways, streets, airports, improved drainage, hospitals, recreational facilities, and every other type of public improvement imaginable. It has also furnished direct medical and health services and lunches for school children. It has definitely proved that we can be our brother's keeper, which has been the ultimate aim of governments for years. Upon this system the greatest country on earth has been built. This philosophy has now spread from our brother to our neighbors, and at the present time we are spending billions of dollars all for the alleviation of suffering to our neighboring nations and for the protection of our democratic ideals, yet there are those here who would continue dishing these billions to neighboring countries and at the same time take away from their own people not only a few small luxuries they now enjoy but also the bare necessities of life. At a time such as this, when we should stand out as an example to the lesser nations of this earth, we destroy our own souls. Is this Americanism? Is this democracy? I say, "No." I say charity should begin at home. I am 100 percent for helping our neighbors in distress. I am 100 percent for sacrifices we may have to make for the cause of democracy. But in aiding our neighbors and in helping our democratic cause let us not forget our own back yard. Let us not forget that we are leaders in better citizenship. Let us not reduce this appropriation to a point where our own people will suffer. Instead, let us increase this amount so that our own unfortunate people may not only help themselves but may continue the wonderful work they have done for the past few years in various public improvements.

Additional Appropriation for T. V. A. Should Be Passed

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ESTES KEFAUVER

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 13, 1941

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. Speaker, I am heartily in favor of the passage of House Joint Resolution 194, appropriating $40,000,000 to the T. V. A. for the construction of four additional dams.

From time to time on the floor of the House, the T. V. A. has been severely criticized, but today I am sure its most vigorous critics will agree that we would be in a desperate plight for power and our national-defense program would be severely jeopardized if we did not have the T. V. A.

The vision of those who have advocated the T. V. A. through the years is now generally approved as sound. In my opinion, it is the best investment the Government has made since the acquisition of the Panama Canal.

The T. V. A. is in a position to fulfill all of its contracts for power in spite of the unprecedented drought throughout the southeastern section. The difficulty is that the Aluminum Co. of America, which has large plants at Baden, N. C., and Alcoa, Tenn., would only contract for 30,000 kilowatts of primary power. These plants have now been extended. It is necessary that they have almost 200,000 kilowatts of prime power, and the Tennessee Valley Authority is called upon to supply them with this amount. We realize that these plants must be kept in full operation. The T. V. A. officials have been supplying them on a day-to-day basis. They have secured all the power available throughout the section. There is no available power to meet the increased demand. The building of these 4 dams would furnish an additional 116,000 kilowatts. They can be constructed quickly. The record shows that this would be the cheapest power that could be provided. In addition, the dams will have some flood-control value. I feel that it is absolutely necessary that they be constructed.

It should be pointed out that in addition to the electricity being furnished the Aluminum Co., the T. V. A. is furnishing more than 250,000 kilowatts to other industries which have resulted from the Government's defense program. The Reynolds Metals Co. requires 10,000 kilowatts; the Monsanto Chemical Co., 50,000 kilowatts; and the Victor Chemical Co., Southern Ferro Alloys Co., Firestone Rubber Co., and the Electrometallurgical Co. also require a tremendous amount of electricity. These companies are all making vital defense materials. Thus it is apparent that the T. V. A. is serving a most necessary purpose in our defense program, and this enlargement of its electrical capacity should be provided for.

Strikes Against the National Defense

OF

HON. E. E. COX

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 13, 1941

ADDRESS OF HON. E. E. COX, OF GEORGIA

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by me before the Cotton Manufacturing Association of Georgia, May 29, 1941:

Mr. President, 11 months ago America began its program of defense. Authorizations and appropriations for the Army for the fiscal year 1941–42 total almost $17,000,000,000; for the Navy more than $7,000,000,000; for other agencies more than $2,000,000,000; and for the lease-lend measure $7,000,000,000—a grand total of more than $33,000,000,000 for national defense.

Industry was called upon to perform the greatest task ever undertaken by the Nation—a production job requiring 28,000,000,000 man-hours of work to be performed in 27 months.

The youth of the Nation—500,000 of them—were called into active selective service in order that they might be trained to use the equipment produced by industry or to aid in its final delivery overseas. All the Nation entered upon the greatest preparation for defense in the history of the Republic. Then labor struck. Not against industry, not against management; not against ownership; but against national defense: against the safety and security of 500,000 American youth waiting for the weapons of defense; against the safety and security of American homes; against the civilization of America; against the very existence of America.

During this year alone 1,700,000 man-days have been lost through strikes in plants producing for the Army. What does this loss mean? It means that during these lost man-days there could have been produced 40,000 Garand rifles, 1,000 completely armed light tanks, 200 Curtiss-Wright pursuit planes, 100 training planes, 3,000 50-caliber machine guns, 500 75-millimeter gun carriages, and 30,000 antiaircraft shells. It means that the April coal strike reduced steel production by an estimated 370,000 tons of ingots—enough to build 12 battleships or 8,000 medium tanks.

The strike of 1940 against the Vultee Aircraft Co. tied up $43,000,000 worth of national-defense contracts for more than 12 days. This strike, together with others which occurred in 1940, compelled the defense industries of the Nation to lose the services of the 547,000 strikers, involving a loss of 6,500,000 man-days.

During 1939, 1,170,062 striking workers caused the Nation's industries to lose 17,812,219 man-days. In 1937 the Nation witnessed the beginning of the sit-down strike, and, more recently, strikes have grown constantly worse as the national emergency has grown more serious. The strike at the River Rouge plant of the Ford Motor Co. affected 85,000 workers, with an additional 35,000 workers in Ford Co. plants throughout the Nation. Ford defense contracts aggregating $150,000,000 were tied up.

For more than 2 weeks a machinists' strike has tied up 11 shipyards in the area of San Francisco Bay, involving more than $500,000,000 worth of Navy and maritime construction and threatens now to extend to a twelfth. And the end is not yet. Labor, in its conspiracy with bureaucrats—aided, supported, indulged, and championed by bureaucrats—defies the Congress, frustrates the efforts of industry, flaunts the wishes of the people, and jeopardizes the safety of the Republic.

On Wednesday, May 28, the Office of Production Management, the key agency of the Nation's defense program, was 1 year old. It reports at the end of this first year that it is not satisfied with the progress of defense to date, but that "production should increase with every month from now on." William S. Knudsen, Director General of the Office of Production Management, says we have "made a start" and that we needed the help of "every manufacturer, engineer, and production worker to get this industrial machine speeded up to its highest efficiency." Yet labor struck; labor continues to strike; and labor gives no indication that it plans to cease to strike, despite the emergency, despite the progress of the aggressor, despite the threat to the safety and security of all the people.

We have made no real progress in solving the disputes engendered by labor in this period of national crisis; we have effected no permanent settlement of recurrent strikes; we have not abated labor's threat to the safety of the Nation; we have not effected an industrial peace necessary to the progress of defense.

We have not done so because we have permitted, and still permit, labor to carry on a national conflict within its own ranks involving industrial, agricultural, professional, and maritime workers while the Nation waits for equipment for defense.

We have not done so because we have no effective machinery armed with adequate authority for the settlement of the disputes raging within the ranks of labor itself or which labor now wages against the industry of defense.

We have not done so because of our bureaucratic encouragement of collective bargaining—a form of collectivism—through the labor provisions of the National Industrial Recovery Act, declared unconstitutional by a Supreme Court constituted at the time so as to perform its functions as intended under the Constitution. We have not done so because of the enactment of the Wagner Act, the National Labor Relations Act of 1935; and we have witnessed the results of the Wagner Act in the unionization of an additional 5,000,000 men and women since 1935, as well as in the changed status of employers in their relation to their employees.

We have not done so because we have no effective governmental machinery to cope with the collectivist threats of labor. True, the Office of Production Management has a mediation staff, but what can the people hope from a staff under the guidance, direction, and instruction of its present head. A Maritime Labor Board mediates disputes in the marine industry—with what results you all are familiar. And the United States Conciliation Service has an army of alleged conciliators wandering about the Nation at the expense of the taxpayers.

We have not done so because collectivist unionism almost has grown out of hand. It has become a huge, almost uncontrollable power that defies Federal and State government alike, that threatens all the citizens of the Republic with its power to blockade any State, to starve out any community, its leaders unopposed by government and apparently protected from punishment under existing law by the decisions of the Supreme Court.

I have urged repeatedly that the continued strikes in defense industries, causing delay in the production of equipment for national defense, should be met by the only effective machinery available to the people—mandatory no-strike legislation enacted by the people's representatives in Congress and made the law of the land. In his historic and momentous address of last Tuesday the President took cognizance of these conditions that imperil the progress of national defense, and it is to be hoped that he will exercise a part of the tremendous power now at his disposal to bring to an end the obstructive practices of unionist collectivism.

It is unionist collectivism that hampers, retards, and hinders production for defense today—that defiantly ignores the public interest, threatens the public welfare, and cripples industrial operations by striking at a time of national emergency. It is unionist collectivism that threatens to destroy private ownership and individual initiative—that places a premium upon indolence, indifference, disaffections, and violence. It is unionist collectivism that has given rise to the labor agitator who fattens upon increased fees and increased power at the expense of the national safety.

Unionist collectivism needs to be reminded that, after all, in America, it is still the security and safety of all the people that is the supreme law of the land, and that it must act within reason under that law. Unionist collectivism must be made to understand that the real cause of labor suffers most when it makes unfair and excessive demands and seeks to accomplish its ends through disloyal conduct.

Union collectivists have demonstrated unmistakably that they are more loyal to their union than they are to their Nation—that they regard the national peril merely as an opportunity to enforce demands that could and would not be granted under any other circumstances. Union collectivist leaders hold millions of honest, loyal, and patriotic American workers captive in unionist groups through the weapons of fear and force, while they seek to exploit the national emergency to add millions more to their ranks by intimidation and coercion.

If collectivist leaders continue to promote the interests of their unions at the expense of their Nation we might as well surrender to the aggressor now, accept the terms he may offer us, and give up the struggle before our cities and homes and churches and schools have been destroyed; for collectivist agitators are already at work in their efforts to destroy our civilization.

America cannot, and I believe it will not, tolerate a power that seeks to place itself above and beyond the law—the safety and the security of all the people.

Some of the magazine writers recently have designated me as the self-appointed watchdog of industry, but the designation is not altogether characteristic. If I am a watchdog of or for anything it is for the American people, whose country I do not want to see succumb to the philosophy of the greasy Muscovites who honeycomb every department of the Government and who have taken over the control of thought in many of our great universities and lesser educational institutions. My interest in American industry is only incidental to my interest in keeping America American. The effort to socialize the country and federalize all of the activities of the people I have resisted because I know that it means the surrender of all our liberties. I have wanted to stop somewhere short of the end of the road that leads to Moscow.

The record of the Government as concerns the labor situation constitutes, in my opinion, the blackest page in all its history. I sometimes wonder if a Government that has not the spirit to defend itself against the vandals and racketeers at home is a Government that is worth defending against the vandals and racketeers abroad. There has been no serious effort on the part of the Government to deal effectively with the gangsterism of labor. The Federal Government has refused consistently to consider any proposal to curb either the powers or the activities of unionist leaders and agitators. Federal authorities, Federal bureaucrats, Federal courts shade all decisions in favor of unionist collectivism. The Mediation Boards that have been set up are but additional weapons put in the hands of labor to further browbeat and terrorize industry. The whole scheme is to let conditions become so bad as to afford an excuse for the Government to take over industry—the very thing which the leftists are seeking and have been working to bring about. The collectivism of labor constitutes a greater danger to the Republic at this very hour than does Hitler and all his kind.

I believe in the capitalistic system—that is, work for pay and pay for work; and I decry the effort to hurry us into some form of labor despotism or collectivism.

If the racketeering policies and practices of unionist labor leaders and agitators are not stopped, America will go the way of France. The extortion of exorbitant fees from workers on defense projects is outrageous. It can neither be excused nor condoned by any fair-minded person. It is dangerous to the welfare of national defense. It is inimical to the security of the Nation. It is downright gangsterism. For labor leaders to take advantage of the stress of the Nation, for them to use national defense for further organization purposes, to demand holidays with pay, shorter hours, and increased wages is a public disgrace.

What about the boys who have been taken from the bosom of their families and the security of their jobs and drafted into the Army? They get no double pay for night work, no time and a half for overtime. Industry has been given no holiday during the building of national defense, and there is none for the taxpayer. The boys who have been drafted into the Army do not have the privilege of striking or of picketing the camps if they do not like the colonel's orders. They may not like the hours or the conditions or the pay for which they soldier, but they cannot strike about it. They cannot quit; and, better than that, they do not want to quit.

If the conditions which confront us are half as desperate as we are assured they are, then there is no time for a single strike. There is no time for a single hour's stoppage of work on defense. If conditions are as desperate as we are told they are, then this is not a question of carrying on business as usual—union business—it is a question of striving desperately, frantically, to get our national defense built in time. If this attitude on the part of organized labor continues, public opinion, the most powerful force in America, will compel President Roosevelt and the military officials to regiment labor out of the sheer necessity for national defense. I should prefer to see all labor on its own motion initiate a movement for voluntary mediation and arbitration. But if labor will not do that, then we must have compulsory arbitration. It has been said that efforts for mediation and arbitration have failed to halt strikes. I readily concede that the history of both mediation and arbitration shows that these efforts have failed. But if mediation and arbitration have not worked, it has been because labor did not want them to work and Government has not had the spirit to make them work.

The contention of labor leaders that they are striving to better the condition of the worker is true only in part. Their main purpose is to gain for themselves more and more economic and political power. The politician quails before them and does their bidding. The officeholder becomes their pliant tool and conspires to turn the Government over to them. It is un-American and dangerous to our liberties for labor to refuse to mediate or arbitrate its disputes and to continue to insist on stopping work on defense projects.

I am convinced that there are thousands of individual workers in the ranks of labor who, if they had their choice, would not strike against the national defense, who would not walk in a picket line, who would not jeopardize the defense of the Republic. But loyal Americans in the ranks of union collectivists are cowed by the abuse of power exercised by leaders who never should have been given that power in the first place and who should not now be supported by Government bureaucrats in the continued exercise of that power.

I hope that if there be any wise leaders remaining in the ranks of organized labor they will see the danger signal in time and will come forward with proposals for voluntary mediation and arbitration. But they have no time to lose. Our national defense must be built. It must be built as economically, as efficiently, and as quickly as it is humanly possible for us to build it. In the creation of the national defense, no section of the people has a more important function than the workers. If they do not rise to ideals of patriotism sufficient to motivate them in preventing these stoppages in work through strikes and walk-outs, then Congress must provide for compulsory arbitration in order that the whole Nation may not be endangered because of the selfishness and blindness and stupidity of a few labor leaders.

This is our common country. And this is a common cause, a common national defense. It is the common good, the common welfare, the common safety and security, and the common prosperity and liberty that are involved, and any labor leader who persuades his followers to insist upon their demands regardless of the effect upon the national defense is a traitor to his country and to this common cause.

Unfortunately, we have come to witness the day when private ownership is challenged by a collectivist philosophy, when private management is challenged by organized groups led by self-seeking agitators, when private operators, owners, and management have been made dependent upon the will of unionist agitators and the dictatorship of bureaucratic agents as to the manner in which they may conduct private industry, even for national defense. Private ownership stands at the mercy of both Government bureaucrats and unionist dictators.

The history of America, the success of America, has been in part the freedom of industrial enterprise. Ours has been a system of individual effort, individual activity, independent industry, in which each citizen has been free to choose for himself, free to follow his own desires, free to do that for which he regarded himself as best qualified. America's free industrial enterprise has given us more and better things, it has contributed to our advance and to our happiness. It has fostered, championed, and encouraged the progress that has been reflected in the comforts and conveniences that surround us and are a part of our daily lives.

They who would destroy our private industry, either directly or indirectly through bureaucratic regimentation, class hatred, intolerance, or sinister or subversive economic weapons, fail to recognize that private industry as we know it in America provides us with food, clothing, and shelter; that it has made the machine a slave in the service of humanity; that it has multiplied our powers and created new opportunities; that it has placed the resources of the world at our command; that it has surrounded us with comforts and provides us with abundant leisure for our self-development.

They who would destroy America's industry through unionist collectivism fail to realize that when industry loses we all lose; that when industry is prevented from completing its contracts for national defense, industry alone does not lose, but that all the Nation loses—labor included.

CONCLUSION

In conclusion let me say that I believe the great rank and file of our laboring men and women are just as patriotic, just as eager to help build our national defense as any of the men and women in any class in any section of the United States. I believe that only a very small percentage of labor leaders are so blind and greedy and stupid as to want to take advantage of the necessities of the national defense in order to make unreasonable demands. Those labor leaders will have to be weeded out, and if they cannot be weeded out by the unions themselves, then the Government must step in and do the job. These greedy racketeers must not be permitted to endanger the entire Nation.

Bellwood, Pa., Develops Novel Cure For Juvenile Delinquency

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 13, 1941

ARTICLE FROM THE ALTOONA (PA.) MIRROR

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, waywardness in young people has for years been the cause of deep study by educators, parents, and law-enforcement agencies.

Efforts are being constantly made to remove many of the pitfalls that beset the path of every youth, confident that there is truth in the saying, "as the twig is bent, the tree inclines."

Bellwood, Pa., located in my congressional district, has developed a novel plan to combat youthful waywardness through the Bellwood Junior Safety Council, an idea conceived by Burgess Edgar McKinney. That the plan is successful is attested to by the widespread approval given to the junior safety council.

The following article appearing in the June 11 issue of the Altoona Mirror published at Altoona, Pa., indicates the scope of the idea and its practical application:

[From the Altoona (Pa.) Mirror of June 11, 1941]

YOUTH SAFETY SET-UP FIGHTS DELINQUENCY—BELLWOOD BURGESS AND MINISTER FIND NOVEL CURE FOR WAYWARDNESS IN YOUNG PEOPLE

Down in Bellwood—population 2,774—a veteran Blair County peace officer and a young Presbyterian minister are showing America how to solve its child-delinquency problem, by letting the children solve it themselves.

Rev. Eugene G. Slep, pastor of the Logan Valley Presbyterian Church, says the credit for the idea behind Bellwood's new child self-government program goes to Edgar McKinney, Bellwood's burgess, justice of the peace, and, incidentally, veteran former captain of Tyrone's famed Sheridan troop of the Pennsylvania National Guard.

At any rate, the Bellwood minister and the burgess, for many years a Pennsylvania Railroad policeman, are at present merely supervising an astute Bellwood junior safety council, police department, detective force, and bicycle club, composed of boys and girls from 10 to 17 years of age. They don't have to do more than supervise; the children, proud of their new responsibility, do all the rest.

HOW THE PLAN WORKS

Before describing how this little Blair County town became child-delinquency-conscious enough to do something about it, a few instances of how the plan works might be cited:

Recently, a bicycle was stolen. Within 4 hours child detectives discovered who stole the bicycle and who purchased it. Junior policemen returned triumphant with the bicycle, the money paid for it, and the culprit. And children tried him and set the penalty. Not long after the formation of the junior self-government organization, which includes a stern set of regulations for bicycle riders, one of the juvenile policewomen merrily zigzagged her bicycle down a main thoroughfare. Out from behind a tree came one of her comrades on the new child police force.

"You ought to be ashamed," he said (or words to that effect). "You're sworn to uphold the law. Don't you know what you're doing is dangerous?"

Reverend Slep tells how Burgess McKinney evolved the child self-government idea some months ago, how the two of them patiently ironed out difficulties in its organization, how children were first interested in it, and how it was finally formed when the new juvenile mayor, Carl Trego, signed the roster of its mayor, council, and police department last May 3. Results were soon felt, he claims:

"Already Bellwood businessmen comment on the decrease in juvenile delinquency. We think we have a real solution for the problem."

CREATES BETTER CITIZENS

The purposes of the new plan, according to Reverend Slep, are: First, to teach better citizenship; second, to build better character; third, to teach better cooperation with legal authorities. All three are accomplished by permitting junior officers to arrest their own offending playmates, to fine them, to hold trials where the seriousness of the crime warrants.

"The only trouble with allowing the children to fix the penalties," Reverend Slep smiled, "is that they are apt to be more severe than adults would be. So Burgess McKinney and I supervise. And we try to teach the young jurors to 'make the punishment fit the crime.'"

The next step planned by the two supervisors is a mass meeting of Bellwood children and their parents when Judge George G. Patterson and Miss Mary G. Davis, Blair County probation officer, will be asked to attend. "We want their suggestions to build our organization even further," say the sponsors. "And we want to offer it as a suggestion to towns plagued with juvenile delinquency. Already we're keeping a lot of cases out of the county courts with our method."

RULES GOVERN GROUP

Just to show that the children of Bellwood mean business, here are the rules regularly submitted and adopted at the first meeting of the Bellwood Junior Safety Council:

"Rules, regulations, and ordinances

"Bellwood Borough Junior Safety Council

"1. The riding of two persons on one bicycle is prohibited.

"2. Bicyclists will ride to the extreme right of the highway at all times.

"3. A white light at the front must be shown after dark, a reflector (red) on the rear after night.

"4. Positively no hitching on the side or rear of any vehicle.

"5. Bicyclists must stop at all stop signs and observe all safety rules when making turns at street intersections; positively no weaving in and out of traffic.

"6. Pedestrians must be given the right of way. Watch for cars pulling out of driveways and parking places and watch for opened doors on automobiles.

"7. Keep bicycle, especially brakes, in good condition at all times.

"8. Bicyclists must have a device to warn pedestrians of their approach.

"Penalties: First offense, a warning; second offense, riding privilege restricted for 10 days; third offense, riding privilege suspended 30 days.

"These rules and regulations and ordinances read by me and approved this 3d day of May A. D. 1941.

"Attest:

"JANET WALKER,
"Secretary of Council.
"BETTY CHERRY,

"Approved this 3d day of May A. D. 1941.
"CARL TREGO, Mayor."

PERSONNEL OF OFFICIALS

The personnel of Bellwood's Council includes, in addition to the foregoing:

Council members: Raymond Strunk, William Summers, John Campbell, Shirley Ort, and Junior Campbell.

Chief of police, James Campbell; assistant chief of police, Robert Ehrisman; lieutenant of police, Nancy Jane Slep; patrolmen, Robert Rumbaugh, Roberta Stone, Hermie Espigh, Mollie McGraw, Harold Laird, Eugene Turbaugh, Eugene Endress, Oliver Tennis, William Smith, and Jack Burns.

Detective chief, Merrill (Sonny) Dorn; assistant chief, Kenneth Woodhall; lieutenant of detectives, Lucille Treece; detectives, Tom Isenberg, Gerald Treece, Peggy White, Ronald Raugh, Kenneth Woodhall, and Paul Garahan.

Youthful offenders in Bellwood are apt to look at a formidable array like that and ponder, "What's the use? Crime can't pay with a junior cop behind each telephone pole on Main Street."

And it doesn't any more. But it might pay other communities to study why.

Arguments for a Speedy Completion of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Seaway

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE A. DONDERO

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 13, 1941

ARTICLE BY ERNEST K. LINDLEY

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an article appearing in the Washington Post of Friday, June 13, 1941, this morning, by Mr. Ernest K. Lindley:

[From the Washington Post of June 13, 1941]

ST. LAWRENCE PROJECT

(By Ernest K. Lindley)

ARGUMENTS FOR ITS SPEEDY COMPLETION

A stout blow—perhaps the stoutest—has been struck for the St. Lawrence waterway and hydroelectric project by William S.

Knudsen, on behalf of O. P. M. In endorsing both phases of the St. Lawrence development as part of the defense effort, Knudsen spoke not only for himself but for his O. P. M. associates: Sidney Hillman, Secretary of War Stimson, and Secretary of the Navy Knox. Stimson and Knox are scheduled to back up their approval in personal appearances before congressional committees.

The O. P. M. verdict is a deadly reply to the contention that instead of furthering national defense, the St. Lawrence project would divert men, materials, and machines which could be put to better use. Knudsen, Knox, and Stimson, all Republicans, are not new dealers who would take a stand out of loyalty to the President. They came in the Government to help defend the country and win the war. And both Knox and Stimson belong to the forward group in the administration who, in appraising the war situation, have been alert consistently to immediate needs. It is not conceivable that either would favor the St. Lawrence project if it would interfere with maximum aid to Great Britain and China during the next few critical months, and the most rapid mustering of our own national defense.

The St. Lawrence can be useful to our defense only if the war is prolonged. That is admitted on all sides. It will be from 3 to 5 years before the seaway and hydroelectric installations can be completed. The President, in ordering a resurvey, has expressed the hope that the seaway would be made available for emergency use in 2 years. This may be a trifle optimistic, although there is little doubt that under emergency conditions the project could be rushed to completion in less time than the original schedule called for.

If the President's present war strategy succeeds, the war may be over before the St. Lawrence development can be finished. Before then the Germans will have been bombed out and the Nazi regime broken up. But no forward-looking and cautious person can rely on the success of this strategy. We are building a two-ocean navy on the supposition that the British, with our aid, may not be able to hold. We are building and planning battleships and aircraft carriers and cruisers which will not be launched until 1945 or 1946.

If we are justified in building a two-ocean navy which cannot be completed for another 4 or 5 years—and by then may have to be increased still more if it is to protect us in both oceans—it would not seem lacking in foresight to build a seaway and hydroelectric project which will require no longer time for completion. The argument for going ahead becomes all the stronger when it is realized that the seaway will make possible the shift of some major naval construction from the coasts to the Great Lakes.

In the Great Lakes, on the American side, are 30 yards with building berths at least 500 feet long. On the Canadian side are 15. Not all of these can be used for building, for example, cruisers. But some can be, and others can be made available with relatively simple refitting. A cruiser rests on the ways for about 18 months, and requires up to 3 years for completion. A freighter of the ugly duckling type rests on the ways only 3½ to 4 months. By the time cruisers begun next spring could be completed, the St. Lawrence waterway probably would be ready to provide their exit to the sea. And for every cruiser shifted to a Great Lakes yard, at least four or five desperately needed freighters could be launched on the coast.

The defense arguments, pro and con, do not conceal, of course, the other interests and motives involved in the St. Lawrence project. It is an old dream of the President's. The first treaty looking toward joint development of the waterway was signed almost 2 years before his public career began in the New York State Senate. The first surveys were made in the Wilson administration. Every President since that time has advocated that the waterway be built.

As Governor of New York, Roosevelt was especially interested in the hydroelectric phase—as Al Smith had been before him. The St. Lawrence is the missing member of the four great publicly owned power yardsticks which he advocated as a Presidential candidate in 1932. The others are Boulder Dam, T. V. A., and the Columbia River development centering on Bonneville and Grand Coulee.

The basic alinement of forces for and against the development has changed little in recent years. And until our national-defense program got under way no new argument had been heard on either side.

Naturally, both sides are attempting to harness to their own uses every argument bearing on our national security. Nobody can deny that the additional electric power and the seaway to the Great Lakes would now be extremely valuable. If Roosevelt's advice had been heeded years ago, the Nation would now be more secure and more powerful.

No one can say flatly that the St. Lawrence project does or does not require immediate attention, as against competing claims for men, materials, and machines. But the united and emphatic stand taken by the members of O. P. M., charged with the heavy responsibility of developing the defenses of the Nation, is a heavy blow to the opposition.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JARED Y. SANDERS, JR.

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 12, 1941

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, in considering House Joint Resolution 193, being appropriation bill for work relief for this year, I think it is essential that certain facts should be borne in mind. Various proposals for cutting this appropriation bill as recommended by the President are before the committee. In considering these proposals, it is consistently urged that the national-defense program is taking up unemployment.

This may be true in the localities that are getting defense contracts, but I would call your attention to the fact that 70 percent and more of the contracts to date have been given to four States. It is also apparent that at least $10 of defense money will go into the Northeast area, already overindustrialized, to $1 of the defense program that is spent in the section from which I come.

I would ask that you bear in mind these facts relating to the concentration of defense expenditures when you examine table 3 of the hearings before the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations, found on pages 120 and 121 of the hearings. Table 3 is as follows:

[5] Data shown represent cases in process of assignment in New York exclusive of New York City. No file of certified persons is maintained by Work Projects Administration.

Mr. Speaker, the above table shows that in the continental United States there are eligible, but not employed, 1,263,924 workers. Of this total number, in regions III and VI, comprising the 13 Southern States, are found 684,192 of these workers, showing that more than 50 percent of the people eligible for employment on W. P. A., but unemployed, are located in that section of the country that is receiving less than 10 percent of defense expenditures.

The district I represent is largely an agricultural district. These people have been especially hard hit during the past season. The strawberry farmers in the central part of my district had one of the most disastrous seasons in their history. The Irish-potato crop has proven equally unprofitable. Both of these crop failures were due to inclement weather, and the failure of these crops will undoubtedly mean that more people will be forced on relief in that section. These will be in addition to the number estimated as of April 30, 1941, in the above table.

I submit herewith another table showing the potential relief needs of the Sixth Congressional District of Louisiana, by parishes, as of April 30, 1941. This table was prepared by the State Administrator of the Work Projects Administration, and is as follows:

Potential relief needs as of Apr. 30, 1941

Anthony Wayne Military Highway

OF

HON. GEORGE W. GILLIE

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 13, 1941

LETTER OF HON. GEORGE W. GILLIE, OF INDIANA, TO THE PRESIDENT

Mr. GILLIE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a copy of a letter which I have just addressed to the President of the United States:

JUNE 13, 1941.

Hon. FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT,
The White House, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I wish to respectfully call to your attention what I consider to be the importance, from both defense-time and peacetime standpoints, of a military highway which would extend from Indianapolis to the Canadian border, through Fort Wayne, Ind., and Toledo, Ohio.

I have in mind a highway following in part the military route of Gen. Anthony Wayne, during his campaign against the Indians in the Northwest Territory, along the Maumee River between Fort Wayne and Toledo. Its purpose would be, of course, to provide a strategic outlet to the north which could easily connect with important Canadian highway arteries at Detroit.

The usefulness of a military highway which would facilitate the rapid movement of troops and munitions from industrial and military centers of Kentucky, Indiana, and northern Ohio, to the Canadian border, would seem to present advantages which are readily apparent. From the viewpoint of United States-Canadian defenses, a highway of this nature and in this location would possess great strategic value.

Consideration should be given to the new and expanding military camps, ordnance plants and industrial units located in this section. I am thinking particularly of such Indiana establishments as Fort Benjamin Harrison, at Indianapolis; the new Army Air Corps base, at Fort Wayne; the Indiana Ordnance Works and the Hoosier Ordnance Plant, near Charlestown; the Jefferson Proving Ground, at Madison; and the Kingsbury Loading Plant, at La Porte. Each of these establishments could be served, directly or indirectly, by a defense highway from Indianapolis to Canada.

It would probably be possible to construct an Anthony Wayne military highway under the provisions of the proposed new Federal-aid defense highway program, or it could be undertaken in a separate measure as a tactical military road. I presume that provision would be made for aircraft landing strips at suitable points along the route and that other devices necessary to meet military requirements would be included.

In the future, this route could be developed into a memorial parkway which would serve to honor the memory of General Wayne, who in 1794 led his Federal troops up the Maumee River in the final phase of the Revolutionary War, breaking the resistance of the Indians and saving for the United States a territory embracing most of the present States of Ohio, Indiana, Michigan, Illinois, and Wisconsin.

Such a project would accomplish, in part, the purposes set forth in House Joint Resolution No. 406, passed by the Seventy-fifth Congress, creating an Anthony Wayne Memorial Commission, and in subsequent legislation providing for a survey of the proposed Anthony Wayne Memorial Highway.

It would bring a step nearer to realization the vision of a great scenic artery, connecting such historic sites at Fort Wayne, Fort Defiance, Fort Deposit, Fort Miami, the Battlefield of Fallen Timbers, encampments and burial places of Wayne's soldiers, as well as Blue Jacket Town, Pontiac's birthplace, Girty's Island, and other sites of historic interest.

I make this suggestion as being in harmony with the urgent defense needs of today and in harmony with the previously expressed desire of Congress to provide a suitable memorial to General Wayne and his conquest of the Northwest.

Perhaps you will wish to refer this suggestion to the War Department and to the Public Roads Administration for consideration. It might also prove of interest to the National Resources Planning Board, which is now carrying on a commendable program of postemergency planning.

Respectfully yours,

GEORGE W. GILLIE,
Member of Congress.

ARTICLE BY GEORGE SOKOLSKY

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by George E. Sokolsky, from the New York Sun of June 7, 1941:

[From the New York Sun, of June 7, 1941]

THESE DAYS

(By George E. Sokolsky)

TOTALITARIAN AMERICA

If we omit the words "fascism" and "communism," which no longer are specific, and employ the word "totalitarian," which is clear-cut and beyond cavil, the pattern of the new life in America becomes perfectly bold and unmistakable. Since the days of the N. R. A. that pattern has been amaking.

No one man has done that job. This is a plastic that is the result of powerful pressures; it is a product of the interplay of huge forces—overwhelming forces which could have been withstood and which might have been resisted by daring and courageous men. Instead, Mr. Roosevelt and his associates enjoyed the play; they succumbed to pressures; they flattered themselves into believing that they were manipulators of historic events. They are now being tossed about in a billowy sea without pilot or compass. Their confusions add to the tragedy of our age.

As brutal as such a statement must be, it is, nevertheless, a historical truth that the main characteristics of any civilization are determined by the nature of the ownership of wealth. When wealth is privately owned there is likely to be a large measure of human freedom; when wealth is publicly owned forms of slavery develop—and there is no use playing on that word "slavery." The so-called wage slave, to whom the Communists like to refer, has always been a freeman—and he has been free because he earned a wage in a capitalistic economy. The wage earner in Russia has never been in any respect a freeman because he has been a slave to the state, which concentrated within itself the total ownership of the means of production and distribution and all tangible and intangible wealth. The principal evil of the present war is that it is forcing upon the whole of mankind the total ownership of wealth by the state. Every country is adopting that pattern.

Paul Einzig, in his study, The Economic Foundations of Fascism, makes the point:

"In the corporate state private property is respected just as in any capitalist country. There is no expropriation without compensation. The state reserves the right, however, to limit and guide the employment of the means of production, and to intervene in the process of distribution, in accordance with public interest."

Although this book was published in 1933, this definition specifically descibes the basic philosophy of the New Deal as it has been developed by acts of Congress and decisions of the Supreme Court. The New Deal, for all its billingsgate against the Fascists, has pursued the underlying principles developed in the totalitarian states concerning the relationship of government and property. Henry A. Wallace produced an excellent book, Whose Constitution? in which he played upon the theme of "general welfare" much as Einzig explains the "public interest." The words are different; the ideas are identical.

Resistance to the totalitarianism of the New Deal appeared in two irreconcilable quarters. Organized capital, even in the later N. R. A. days, fought and delayed the movement in the direction of this type of totalitarianism. Unfortunately, they rarely were able to focus their minds on the essential fact that it was capitalism they were defending. They wallowed all over the field in weak and often evil compromises, and they were constantly being betrayed by their own kind, who discovered early that lots of money could be made out of this new arrangement. Their lawyers usually advised them to commit suicide slowly, as representing superior common sense.

The other groups, curiously, were the Communists and the C. I. O. The Communists, from 1933 to 1935, believed that the New Deal was an agency to save capitalism in America, but in 1935, under direct orders from the Comintern, they supported every New Deal effort and measure and joined New Deal activities and got jobs for themselves and their fellow travelers in the agencies of government. This continued up to the Hitler-Stalin alliance, when the Communists and the New Deal split over foreign policy. The Communists have always believed that the New Deal would produce their type of totalitarianism. They believe now that they have to destroy Mr. Roosevelt's totalitarianism to produce their own. They seek to achieve this through capture of the C. I. O. and the eventual destruction of Mr. Roosevelt's policy and administration by constant and costly strikes. They may succeed, in various combinations of opposition to the New Deal, unless Mr. Roosevelt displays more courage than he yet has.

Organized capital is today powerless. The organization of national defense, the Russell-Overton amendments, and the amorphous O. P. M. have left them without the powers of articulation. And now comes the proposal of the Army virtually to nationalize private wealth. That proposal never originated in the Army; it is just an additional rung on the New Deal's totalitarian ladder. It is but a clarification of the totalitarian pattern. The fact that it originated in a gang of Wall Street lawyers does not make it less sinister.

POEM BY HORACE C. CARLISLE

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following poem written by Horace C. Carlisle, of Alabama:

My soul longeth for the courts of the Lord; my heart crieth out for the living God (Psalms lxxxiv:2).

CHIEF JUSTICE HUGHES

Just a brief time before the great Chief Justice Hughes
Had attained his threescore years and ten,
On account of the soundness of his legal views,
And the straightforward course that he always pursues
In his dealings with measures and men—
And because he was never known once to resort
To injustice to meet some great end—
And was never swayed by good or evil report—
He was placed on the bench of our own Supreme Court—
For all men could upon him depend.

In the highest positions of honor and trust,
In the State of New York, has he served,
With a modest distinction, revolting at lust
For unmerited phrases, which he declared must Not be sought, from which he never swerved.
He declared that the office should seek for the man
Best prepared for the duties therein,
And that on this malpractice should be put a ban,
For but few acts could be less American than
The commission of this selfish sin.

Recognized as a great jurist, learned in the law,
With an insight to see things afar,
He expressed no opinion of his till he saw,
Or at least thought he saw, in it no obscure flaw,
To be wrongly construed by the bar;
So, when Chief Justice Taft passed to God's Great Beyond,
And the vacancy sought Justice Hughes,
Since his stately robe must by another be donned,
Justice Hughes in his heart felt restrained to respond
To the call—and he dared not refuse.

As Chief Justice, he wisely conducted affairs
Of our great Court of Final Resort—
For his weightier questions and problems and cares,
From his knees, he lifts ever aloft thru his prayers
To the Great Judge of High Heaven's Court—
And from this Perfect Judge, superhumanly wise,
Came the wisdom to write his decrees
In accord with His will, for on Him he relies—
And will ever continue to do, till he dies—
Whom he seeks, above all else, to please.

The great Chief Justice Hughes knew, if his court decrees
Pleased the Great Judge of heaven and earth,
That there'd be no just cause why they should fail to please
All who seek truth and justice, thru prayer, on their knees,
Irrespective of station or worth.
Without faith, hope, and charity within his heart,
No man ever stood high in God's sight;
But in Chief Justice Hughes these played nobly their part,
Down the years—from his noble career's early start—
Making his life a great shining light.

California Assembly Backs Anti-Poll-Tax Legislation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LEE E. GEYER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 13, 1941

RESOLUTION OF THE CALIFORNIA STATE ASSEMBLY

Mr. GEYER of California. Mr. Speaker, I am happy to learn that the Assembly of the State of California, by a vote of 60 to 1, has joined with the General Court of Massachusetts in memorializing the Congress to enact legislation to abolish the poll tax in Federal elections. The joint resolution follows:

Assembly Joint Resolution 51

Joint resolution relative to poll taxes

Whereas many States of the United States require a poll tax to be paid by its citizens as a prerequisite for voting; and

Whereas this requirement is contrary to the fundamental principles and concepts of the American form of government and democracy, and results in pernicious political activities in that such taxes are frequently paid by persons other than the voters as an inducement for voting for certain candidates; and

Whereas it is necessary in order to insure honesty in Federal elections that the Congress of the United States forbid the requirement that poll taxes be paid as a prerequisite for voting at such elections: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Assembly and Senate of the State of California (jointly), That the President and the Congress are hereby respectfully urged and requested to enact legislation declaring it unlawful for any person, whether or not acting under the authority of the laws of a State or subdivision thereof, to require the payment of a poll tax as a prerequisite for voting or registering to vote, at any election for a President or Vice President or Presidential elector or Senator or Member of the House of Representatives of the United States; and be it further

Resolved, That the chief clerk of the assembly is hereby directed to send copies of this resolution to the President of the United States, the Vice President of the United States, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each Senator and Representative from California in Congress.

Peonage in the United States of America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. VITO MARCANTONIO

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 13, 1941

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include herein the text of the announcement by J. Albert Woll, United States district attorney in Chicago, Ill., May 29, 1941, of the indictment of William Toliver Cunningham and Hamilton McWhorter, both of Lexington, Ga., on a charge of conspiracy to retain and hold Negroes in a condition of peonage and slavery on the cotton plantations of Cunningham at Lexington.

It was more than 20 months between the time that the crimes related in the indictment were committed in Chicago and the date of the indictment. The history of that period is interesting and illuminating.

It was on September 8, 1939, that four men who had at previous times escaped from the peonage plantation of Cunningham, were arrested in Chicago. One of them, Ed. Raines, was arrested and placed in custody without legal process of any kind. The other three, Solomon McCannon, Doc Woods, and Otis Woods, were held on extradition warrants from the Governor of Georgia. The charges of theft of 2 bushels of corn in December 1935, were placed by Cunningham and McWhorter, who were in Chicago at the time of the arrest, seeking to force return of these and three other men to the Cunningham plantation.

At the extradition hearings ordered by the late Governor Henry Horner, of Chicago, the burglary charges were proved to be baseless and the extradition refused, largely on the basis of evidence produced by Attorney William Henry Huff, representing the four men, to show the conditions of slavery existent on the Cunningham plantations. All this information was formally presented to the office of the Federal Bureau of Investigation in Chicago. Numerous escaped slaves from the Cunningham plantations were brought to the F. B. I. office in Chicago, and there made statements regarding the conditions of servitude under which they had been held. Incredible as it may seem, there appear to have been literally scores of such escaped slaves living in Chicago and other Middle Western cities, having come up from Georgia by a modern version of the "underground railway" of pre-Civil War days. All lived in constant fear that Cunningham would by fair means or foul force them to return.

Attorney Huff was informed that all this information had been forwarded to the F. B. I. in Atlanta. He later sent additional information to the Atlanta agents.

In answer, Attorney Huff received a letter from R. G. Danner, special agent in charge, F. B. I., Atlanta, dated December 27, 1939, which stated:

> You are advised that investigation in incident case was completed on October 24, 1939, following which the facts were presented to the United States attorney at Macon, Ga., who declined prosecution of the same, stating that it did not constitute a violation of the peonage statutes.

The International Labor Defense in Chicago then set up the Abolish Peonage Committee of the International Labor Defense, which began a campaign against the un-American institution of peonage, concentrating on seeking prosecution in the Cunningham case. These cases were flagrant. They involved numerous slaves and ex-slaves. The facts were easily available to the Department of Justice.

On February 10, 1940, over the signature of J. Edgar Hoover, Director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, Attorney Huff received the following letter:

> I wish to advise the matter concerning which you wrote has been presented to Assistant Attorney General Rogge and he has advised that no further investigation should be made in the matter. The case, therefore, is being carried as closed in our files.

Attorney Huff obtained additional evidence of peonage in the form of affidavits and sent it to W. S. Devereaux, special agent in charge, Chicago. Devereaux replied that he had filed the affidavits but on advice of Rogge had dropped the investigation.

> The case, therefore—

> is being carried as closed in our files.

The International Labor Defense, however, did not take this "no," for an answer. On February 23, 1940, Solomon McCannon, Otis Woods, and Will Fleming, escaped peons from the Cunningham plantation, were brought to Washington. There they went to the office of Mr. Rogge, accompanied by a group which included Mr. John P. Davis, secretary of the National Negro Congress; J. Finley Wilson, grand exalted ruler of the Negro Elks; Attorney Huff, Judge William H. Hastie, and Dean Charles Houston, of the National Association for Advancement of Colored People; William L. Patterson and Louis Colman, of the International Labor Defense. In an interview with Mr. Rogge this group obtained a promise that the case would be reopened for investigation, and an admission that there seemed to be definite basis for presentation to the grand jury of the information already in the hands of the Department.

The International Labor Defense did not rest on this promise. Further information was secured and forwarded to the Department of Justice. The facts were made widely public, to secure the support of the public for the attempt to secure prosecution of this flagrant violation of civil rights.

Perhaps without this pressure the Department might have acted eventually, but it is significant that more than a year passed before any steps were taken even to present the case to a grand jury, which did return an indictment on May 29, 1941.

It is to be hoped, Mr. Speaker, that prosecution of this case will not be dilly-dallied with as the obtaining of an indictment has. It took the Department 20 months to act on the basis of facts in their possession. Now they have acted, and I submit that the indictment of Cunningham and McWhorter is an important victory for the antislavery forces in this country, the action should continue, speedily.

Nor should it stop with this one case. There are many more of cases of peonage, in half a dozen Southern States. The white Georgia Baptist convention, in 1939, noted that there are more people affected by peonage—debt slavery—in the United States today than were held as slaves before the War Between the States. Yet it has taken 20 months of intensive effort to persuade the Department of Justice, so eager to prosecute labor leaders like Harry Bridges, to make a presentment to a grand jury in a single case. It is noteworthy that the indictment was brought in Chicago, on a conspiracy charge in connection with events there. No indication is forthcoming that direct charges of holding persons in slavery will be made in Georgia itself, though the evidence in the one case would sustain such action in the other, and could, in fact, be multiplied a hundred times in a Georgia procedure. Is it possible that there is one line of procedure for the representatives of the Department of Justice in one part of the country, and a contrary line of procedure in another—both directed from Washington, where the right hand knoweth not what the left hand doeth?

The statement released by the office of J. Albert Woll, United States district attorney, Chicago, Ill., on May 29, 1941, follows:

> United States Attorney J. Albert Woll announced today that the Federal grand jury sitting in Chicago had returned an indictment against William Toliver Cunningham and Hamilton McWhorter, both of Lexington, Ga., charging them with conspiracy to retain and hold Negroes in a condition of peonage and slavery on the cotton plantations of Cunningham at Lexington, Ga.
> The indictment charges that for many years Cunningham has enslaved Negroes on his plantations, inducing them to come to work by promises of wages and by getting them out of jail or off of the chain gang. Once on the plantations, the indictment recites, the Negroes were no longer free. They received no wages and Cunningham instilled in them the fear of running away by lashing them with straps and by causing them to be imprisoned on a Georgia chain gang if they attempted to run away.
> Assistant United States Attorney Paul M. Plunkett was in charge of the presentation of this case to the grand jury. He was assisted by Mr. Joseph Lyman, a special assistant assigned to United States Attorney Woll.
> The defendant Cunningham is a Georgia planter, aged about 50. He owns two plantations in the vicinity of Lexington, one of which is known as the Sandy Cross Plantation. He is married and has a daughter and one son, William Toliver Cunningham, Jr., and a brother George, a former road commissioner of Oglethorpe County, Ga.

Hamilton McWhorter is an attorney at law and maintains a law office at Lexington, Ga., with his son, Hamilton McWhorter, Jr. He is a former president of the Georgia Senate and prominent Georgia political figure.

Woll stated that the Federal court in this district has jurisdiction of this case because overt acts in furtherance of the conspiracy were performed in Chicago. The indictment charges that in furtherance of the conspiracy Cunningham and McWhorter came to this city in September 1939 with extradition warrants and attempted to arrest three Negroes who had escaped from the plantations. The Negroes were charged with burglary, but the indictment alleges that the sole purpose of the defendants was to return the Negroes to peonage and slavery on Cunningham's plantations.

The Negroes who were arrested in Chicago at Cunningham's instigation are Otis Woods and Doc Woods, 2958 South State Street, and Solomon McCannon, 2959 South LaSalle Street. It is understood that the crime they were charged with was the theft of 2 bushels of corn from Cunningham's barn in December of 1935. The Negroes remained on Cunningham's plantation for a year after the alleged theft and Cunningham did not cause their indictment until after they had fled. Governor Horner removed the extradition hearing to Springfield, where, after a showing of the conditions on Cunningham's plantations, the extradition was denied.

Edward Raines, now a private in the United States Army, Clyde Smith, and Ella Smith are also named as fugitive Negroes, and apparently Cunningham sought to cause them to be arrested also while in Chicago, although he had no warrants for them.

The case of Cunningham's plantations has been under investigation by the Department of Justice for some time and numerous complaints have been received from various parts of the country of his brutality toward his Negro help. Working hours on the plantations are from dawn until dark with an hour for a noon meal. The Negroes receive no salaries but are fed from Cunningham's commissary rations of fat-back and meal. "Fat-back," as the name implies, is the fat portion of the hog, containing no lean meat, and retailing for approximately 6 cents a pound.

The Cloakroom

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM P. LAMBERTSON

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 13, 1941

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, these strikes in defense are only the bread on the water returning, earlier cast by Madam Perkins.

There is a general opinion on Capitol Hill that there is a "cooling-off" on jumping into the foreign war.

Any grant of additional Executive powers or unchallenged usurpation will increase the peril of this Republic.

"Roosevelt to Visit Harvard, to Talk on British Unity," is a headline this week in the Christian Science Monitor.

Isn't it funny the sinking of our ship creates no hysteria, after all were forecasting that it was the spark the warmakers wanted?

My last talk with the late Phil Campbell was to offer him my ticket for the inaugural. Thanking me, he said he didn't want to go either.

"Us 'reds' are delighted! Hewitt is back on Equity Council for another 5 years."—Horace Casselberry, of Actors Equity Association. Walter Winchell seems to be just as happy over it, too.

A little sincerity on the part of the Government would have picked out the known agitators responsible for the plainly unreasonable strikes and placed them where they could do no harm.

The appointment of Harlan Fiske Stone as Chief Justice was logical and the best possible—don't let anybody say I never spoke well of the President. Also, Byrnes and Jackson are not the worst.

We wonder if Harry Woodring drove over with his horse and buggy from Lecompton to Kansas University to hear Harold Smith intervent. Harry knows best of all that if Harold didn't do his stuff he wouldn't continue to be the Budget Director.

Mass Army or Mechanized?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PAUL W. SHAFER

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 13, 1941

EDITORIAL FROM NEW YORK SUN

Mr. SHAFER of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include an editorial from the New York Sun:

[From the New York Sun]

MASS ARMY OR MECHANIZED?

Anything that Representative Ross A. COLLINS, of Mississippi, has to say about the kind of Army that the United States ought to have merits respectful attention, for Representative COLLINS was a pioneer among American legislators as an advocate of mechanization and motorization of the Army. In the current issue of the Reader's Digest he puts and answers the question, "Do we want a mass Army?" His answer is an emphatic negative. He insists that the United States should stop drafting men by the million and should concentrate on developing a smaller mechanized and armored Army. His description of the Army of today is that of "young men in cantonments learning to fight yesterday's war" under the tutelage of officers, many of whom do not think in terms of modern war and most of whom are too old for their jobs.

One thing that Representative COLLINS says deserves particular attention. It is that no democracy can afford both a powerful mechanized army and a mass army. It must choose between them. Our choice seems to be a little of both, with more than 1,300,000 men in the Army, but with scarcely a single division ready for combat in the modern sense. Secretary Stimson's recent hint that he may ask for an appropriation of $4,000,000,000 over and above what the present program calls for tells of the astronomical cost of a mass mechanized army. Almost everything that an army needs and uses costs more than it did a generation ago. Representative COLLINS, who for a decade has been advocating a compact, hard-hitting, fast, well-trained army, does not believe that the United States needs a mass army for its defense. The important point is whether Representative COLLINS' colleagues will listen to his arguments.

Lighthouse in the Storm

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES P. McGRANERY

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 13, 1941

EDITORIAL FROM THE PHILADELPHIA RECORD

Mr. McGRANERY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Philadelphia Record of May 15, 1941:

[From the Philadelphia Record of May 15, 1941]

LIGHTHOUSE IN THE STORM

The material progress made by man in the nineteenth century constituted the most rapid advancement ever accomplished in any 100-year span.

Yet as that century of technological invention, organizational genius, and widening natural horizons drew to a close, prescient men foresaw the present chaos in society.

The overture to the tragic drama of the twentieth century was marked by warnings, analyses, and solutions.

Of these, the one that has best withstood the test of time is the social philosophy expounded by Pope Leo XIII in a series of letters, the first of which, Rerum Novarum, was published just 50 years ago today.

It was hailed (or denounced, depending on the viewpoint of the critic) as a defense of private property and, on the other hand, as a charter of workingmen's rights and of social justice. It was both. Rerum Novarum was the first clear-cut, succinct, practical contradiction of the two dominant and growing philosophies of the nineteenth century—the anarchy of unrestrained capitalism and its antithesis, the slavery of socialism.

The "classic" economics and sociology of the nineteenth century, largely a businessman's philosophy of society, emphasized "free" contract, extending it to the most improbable spheres.

They favored unlimited freedom of trade and unlimited freedom in the fixing of wages and hours in contracts between employees and employers.

This philosophy sank another taproot into the biological discoveries of Charles Darwin. With the assistance of Herbert Spencer, a new "school" proclaimed a genteelly phrased jungle law of human society opposing any "interference" to alleviate the lot of those who were going under by the millions in the sharpening social struggle.

As to the "survival of the fittest," it was only 5 years ago that a distinguished justice of the Pennsylvania Supreme Court attacked governmental relief by pointing that a herd of elk on a Government reservation had grown soft and become a prey to its natural enemies and to disease because it had been fed by the Government keepers.

On grounds of human dignity, moral law, and practical social stability, Leo XIII rejected the principle that the workman was worth only what he could obtain in a "free" market. And in one of the most memorable passages of modern thought he exposed the fallacy of the "free" wage contract between an individual employee and an employer:

"Let it be taken for granted that workman and employer should, as a rule, make free agreements, and in particular should agree freely as to wages; nevertheless, there is a dictate of natural justice more imperious and ancient than any bargain between man and man, that remuneration should be sufficient to maintain the wage earner in reasonable and frugal comfort.

"If through necessity or fear of a worse evil the workman accept harder conditions because an employer or contractor will afford him no better, he is made the victim of force and injustice."

To reestablish the balance of what we today would call the bargaining power of the worker, the Pope supported development and extension of labor unions, the encouragement of unions by the state, the passage of social legislation, and of restrictions upon the growing power of capital.

But he left no doubt that he held capitalism to be rooted in private property, and that the right of private property should not be violated by the state. He asserted that the worker toiled so that he could acquire private property of his own, and that any attempt to array the worker against property as such merely enlisted the worker in a struggle against his own material goal.

At this point Leo marshaled his intellectual and moral strength against another growing menace—that of socialism. The doctrine of absolute control by the state over economic life had grown naturally from the ghastly failure of "classic" economics to solve the problem of misery and degradation of the masses of the people.

Not only did Leo warn against the control of all economic life by the state; he even mentioned such specific dangers as the control of labor unions by the state, a control that was to destroy the labor unions a few decades later in Russia, Italy, and Germany.

It would be absurd and an insult to the intellectual dignity of Leo XIII to say, as some have, that he sought a middle way between the extremes of capitalist anarchy and socialism. The social philosophy of Leo was not a compromise but an application to modern life of principles considerably older than either socialism or capitalism.

The 50 years since Rerum Novarum have not, unfortunately, seen the fruition of the thought contained therein.

The storm has grown in intensity, but the lighthouse of reason built by Leo XIII still burns steadily.

Petitions for Labor

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. VITO MARCANTONIO

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 13, 1941

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, this morning I filed a petition with 14,805 signatures.

Fourteen thousand eight hundred and five petitioners have signed the following petition urging that Congress uphold the right of labor to bargain collectively, strike, and picket:

PETITION TO THE CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES

Abraham Lincoln said: "Thank God we have a system of labor where there can be a strike" (Hartford, Conn., March 5, 1860). The right to form and join organizations of the peoples' own choosing, the right to bargain collectively, to strike, and to picket are established American rights. The right to strike is essential to the preservation of democracy. If the right to strike is destroyed, trade-unions will be destroyed and American democracy will be destroyed. We, the undersigned, petition that the Congress shall adopt no legislation and shall repeal existing laws which directly or indirectly curtail or endanger any of these rights.

These signers are musicians, teachers, artists, social workers, farmers, actors, lawyers, industrial workers, Government workers, housewives, young people, newspaper writers, Negroes, clergymen, and members of patriotic and civic groups—a cross section of the American people. They live and vote in thousands of communities in 36 States and Alaska: Alabama, Arizona, California, Colorado, Connecticut, Delaware, District of Columbia, Florida, Georgia, Idaho, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maryland, Massachusetts, Michigan, Minnesota, Missouri, Montana, Nevada, New Jersey, New Mexico, New York, Ohio, Oklahoma, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, Tennessee, Texas, Utah, Virginia, Washington, Wisconsin, and Wyoming.

This petition was prepared and is presented by the National Federation for Constitutional Liberties, an organization devoted to the task of preserving those civil liberties which are the basis of our traditional American democracy.

The following is a list of the organizations represented in the signatures:

Industrial Union Council, San Diego, Calif.
American Federation of Musicians, No. 400, Hartford, Conn.
Cigar Makers Union, Hartford, Conn.
Connecticut Conference on Social and Labor Legislation, New Haven, Conn.

The Government at Washington Still Lives—And Acts

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. W. F. NORRELL
OF ARKANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 13, 1941

EDITORIAL FROM THE ARKANSAS GAZETTE

Mr. NORRELL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Arkansas Gazette of June 11, 1941:

[From the Arkansas Gazette of June 11, 1941]

THE GOVERNMENT AT WASHINGTON STILL LIVES—AND ACTS

For the great body of American people who are the living flesh of the Nation, President Roosevelt's action to end the production tie-up in the North American Aviation plant meant more than resumption of work in one strike-bound defense industry. It showed the American people that they have a government—a government that can and will govern, not a spineless jellylike mass incapable of unifying and leading and serving the country at a time of the gravest emergency.

The plant which the Army has taken over in California has facilities for turning out 10 war planes a day, 300 a month, 3,600 a year. The Nation needs every one of those planes for strengthening its own defense and aiding Britain. But the Nation has needed the psychological—no; the spiritual—reinforcement which swept over the country when the firm hand of government reached out to protect the defense effort from virtual sabotage.

During recent months certain local or regional labor leaders have been betraying labor's own cause by calling strikes not authorized, and sometimes actively opposed, by leaders of their national organizations. By their obstruction of defense progress, such leaders and their followers have been imposing on the most prolabor President who ever lived in the White House. The public has waited anxiously to see how far a friendly President would let them go. Now that question has been answered, not by words, but by action.

These self-willed and less-responsible labor elements have hurt all organized labor, but God be thanked they are not representatives of the great mass of Americans who work for wages. Those millions are represented by the men who left their jobs for military-training camps; by those who have only to be called if the country should have more need for their service as soldiers than for their service as producers; and by all the millions, organized and unorganized, who are patriotic, loyal, and devoted in the emergency that confronts America.

Sales of Oil and Gasoline to Japan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RAYMOND S. SPRINGER
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 13, 1941

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, the "gasless Sundays" plan, proposed by Secretary Ickes for the people of our country, would be a rank injustice in the face of the existing facts. We have been exporting oil and gasoline to Japan, and that country has been storing it, for her own use, and she has also been exporting quantities of this same commodity to Germany, for her use. The great increase of our exports of oil and gasoline to Japan, within the present year, has been outstanding. It appears that we are aiding both the Axis Powers and the Allies in this conflict, because we are aiding Britain, and the democracies by giving them guns, tanks, and planes and "all-out aid," and now we are selling oil and gasoline to Japan, in great quantities, and she is storing this much-needed commodity for her own use against China, and the democracies, and she is also selling a part of her supply to Germany, and perhaps Italy.

This is a most inconsistent position for our country to occupy. We furnished scrap iron to Japan in large quantities over a long period of time, and the Congress submitted a resolution more than 1 year ago to prohibit the further sale of our scrap iron to her, yet the sales continued until it was finally stopped a very few months ago. That scrap iron which we sold to Japan will, no doubt, aid her materially in her preparations for war. She might, in the end, use that scrap iron against our country in case of our involvement in this war.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we are confronted with this same policy of selling oil and gasoline to Japan in great quantities, and at the same time we find that the people in our own country are to be limited in their use of both gasoline and oil by Secretary Ickes, who has been named to administer those commodities during this so-called emergency. If the Secretary would issue an order that the sale of oil and gasoline to Japan should be stopped, then he will have terminated that aid we are now extending to the Axis Powers, which includes Germany. If he should issue such an order, the people of our own country will have ample gasoline and oil for our own consumption and for all purposes required by our armed forces, including the Army and the Navy. If there is danger of our involvement in this war, it is very essential that we begin to prepare to defend our own country and to cease in aiding the preparation of those who would ultimately become our enemies.

Mr. Speaker, a very enlightening editorial appeared in the South Bend Tribune, of South Bend, Ind., of date June 8, 1941, on this same subject, which I ask unanimous consent to include as a part of my remarks on this highly important matter, which editorial follows:

[From the South Bend (Ind.) Tribune of June 8, 1941]

"UNCLE SAP" AGAIN?

The United States is shipping oil and oil products to Great Britain on the assumption that they are indispensable to survival of the British in this war. The British are sending some oil and oil products to Japan. The United States is selling some oil and oil products directly to Japan. The Japanese are sending some oil and oil products to Nazi Germany. The Russians, whose transportation facilities are being used for this movement of supplies from Japan to Germany, have increased the freight levies by as much as 300 percent. That means a tidy profit in any language, including the Russian.

If it were only a matter of ordinary foreign trade, the American people might think little of it. If it were only a military matter, as among Japan, Germany, and Great Britain, it would not be reassuring to Americans but they might be disposed to grin and bear it. But the United States has just acquired a national-defense oil dictator in the person of Honest Harold Ickes, and he is talking of gasolineless Sundays and setting oil-heater thermostats 5 degrees lower as a mere starter.

The United States has sufficient oil and oil products to furnish enough to Great Britain to enable the British to continue sending some to Japan. The United States also has enough to ship directly to Japan. The Japanese, in turn, have enough to supply Nazi Germany, that "menace to civilization," as well as themselves. But there is not enough oil and gasoline in the United States, or at least the oil-transportation facilities are not sufficient to enable the American people to drive and to heat their homes in the manner to which they are accustomed. Is Uncle Sam growing another set of goat horns?

Thirty-Day Payless Vacation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LUCIEN J. MACIORA
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 13, 1941

Mr. MACIORA. Mr. Speaker, this House has long pursued a practice—and it is a wise one—of ascertaining the attitude of the affected department of Government before acting on pending legislation. Except where there are especially good reasons for doing otherwise, the departmental recommendation is respected and followed.

In this instance, W. P. A. is on record as approving striking out the requirement for an enforced 30-day vacation for W. P. A. workers. That recommendation is based upon years of administering and observing the W. P. A. program. Records have been kept and reports made on facts concerning workers under this program. The recommendation is studied; not haphazard or sentimental. There is no sound reason for rejecting it.

To begin with, the net cost to the taxpayer will be no more if the 30-day payless vacation is stricken out than it will if that unwise regulation is continued in force and effect.

The argument advanced in favor of retaining this provision is that private employment, arising out of the defense program, has lessened the need for year-around employment for W. P. A. workers. It seems to me that such an argument falls of its own weight. Certainly no one who gives even passing thought to the comparative wage paid in private industry, and that paid to W. P. A. workers, will regard these fields of endeavor as competitive in any sense. Surely there is no attraction in the physical labor demanded in almost every W. P. A. program that would prompt any person to cling to a W. P. A. job and spurn the more remunerative and less arduous private employment. Does anyone suppose W. P. A. employment is work which any man or woman would really want to follow as a career?

The fact of the matter is that persons now on W. P. A. are men and women who cannot obtain private employment. I think you could search with a fine-toothed comb for a W. P. A. worker who, on the very limited earnings fixed by the law, can afford to take a payless 1-month vacation. They are on W. P. A. because they are in need—dire need. They need more—not less—income. In most cases they cannot afford the bare necessities of life on their present earnings, to say nothing of the luxury of a 30-day vacation.

Surveys have shown that only a small fraction of the number of persons dropped by W. P. A. by reason of appropriation cuts have been able to find employment in 3 or more months after their separation. There are many reasons for this: The average age of a W. P. A. worker is 43 years, an age at which men find an almost insurmountable barrier against private employment. One out of every five W. P. A. workers is a woman, and it is common knowledge that the defense program has created precious little employment for women.

We are appropriating billions for defense, and it is right that we should. I have voted for every defense appropriation that has been submitted. We are spending, or soon will, millions of dollars to promote morale, to encourage national unity. That is fine; I am all for it. But is it consistent to vote these billions and spend these millions if we are to short-circuit the drive for national unity by throwing men and women out of the lowest-paid employment the Government of the United States has ever offered a civilian?

That strikes me as a glaring inconsistency; a fundamental weakness in our thinking and planning. I hope this amendment will prevail.

Justice James F. Byrnes

OF
HON. JOHN E. RANKIN
OF MISSISSIPPI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 13, 1941

Mr. RANKIN of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, it is with pleasure that I rise to congratulate the President of the United States and the country upon the appointment to the Supreme Court of the United States of one of the ablest men who ever served in this House, Hon. JAMES F. BYRNES, of South Carolina.

Mr. BYRNES served with distinction in this body for many years. He is not only an able and experienced lawyer, but he is energetic, conscientious, and courageous. He is well grounded in the fundamental principles of our American institutions. He is an ardent supporter of and believer in the Constitution of the United States. He is a lover of the American way of life. His appointment is a God-send to the American people at this time.

Thomas Jefferson warned us that if our institutions were ever destroyed, they would be destroyed by the courts.

We do not want our Constitution changed by construction, or misconstruction. Such a method is but a manifestation of the wormwood of governmental decay.

The people of this country want the Constitution applied and construed and not changed or destroyed. If changes are to be made, let them be made in the manner provided by the Constitution itself. Changing it by construction shakes the very foundation of our free institutions and destroys the faith of our people in the stability of the greatest Government the world has ever known.

These innovations may at first adversely affect only the Southern States, or the industrialists, or the small businessmen or the farmers of the Nation, but their evil influences will spread and grow until our free institutions and our American way of life may disappear and be replaced by some form of totalitarianism.

There is ample power within the framework of the Constitution to do evrything that needs to be done to promote the safety and well-being of our people. They do not want any foreign ideologies written or construed into that sacred document.

Therefore, I say again that the people of this Nation are to be congratulated on the appointment to that august tribunal of such a man as the Honorable JAMES F. BYRNES, of South Carolina.

RADIO ADDRESS OF HON. VITO MARCANTONIO, OF NEW YORK

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address delivered by me over the Mutual Broadcasting System June 12, 1941, entitled "There Shall Be No Gestapo in America":

Four million so-called aliens fingerprinted and registered; 500 noncitizens rounded up and imprisoned without bail; strike broken by troops using bayonets against workers; concentration camps being prepared; work-or-fight order is given to workers, minister of justice urges concentration camps and wholesale deportations. These were the news flashes which were coming from Nazi Germany in 1936. Take out the words "minister of justice" and substitute "United States Attorney General" and we have the news headlines of May and June 1941 in these United States.

These headlines are not unrelated. They are the newspaper reports of integrated incidents in the gigantic conspiracy against the peace and liberties of the American people.

Never before in the history of any country has there been as much resistance to participation in war as there is on the part of the American people. It is precisely because of this resistance that suppression, persecution, and hysteria have been employed in order to smash the opposition of the overwhelming majority who have consistently refused to allow themselves to be dragged further into this imperialist war.

The pattern which is being followed is no different from that adopted by Hitler in the employ of his Gestapo against the people of Germany. On May 18, under the direction of the Attorney General, more than 500 were arrested in the so-called round-up of people who had entered into the United States illegally. These round-ups were widespread and reminiscent of the raids of Attorney General Palmer, under the supervision of Mr. J. Edgar Hoover, in 1919 and 1920. The generalship of the offensive against the liberties of the American people then is the same generalship of the offensive against the peace and liberties of the people today. The purpose of this activity was provocative and intended solely to work up that hysteria which would condition the American people to become easy victims of the war conspiracy and to lure them into any easy surrender of their liberties.

The statements of the Attorney General and of newspaper reports, to the contrary notwithstanding, not a single person arrested in those raids up to today, has been disclosed to be even remotely an agent or a spy or a saboteur. They are men, many of whom have American wives and children, who some years ago had entered the United States without passports or who had overstayed their permits in the United States. I doubt if any of these men had even failed to register under the Alien Registration Act. And yet the impression has been created that this spectacular dragnet had brought in enemies of our Republic.

I challenge the Attorney General, the Federal Bureau of Investigation, and all others connected with these raids to establish that these innocent, hard-working, law-abiding men, so-called aliens, who are now lingering in the immigration detention stations without bail, many of whom were arrested even without a properly sworn-out warrant, are spies or saboteurs or have in any manner endangered the interest of our Nation. Now that the American people have witnessed these Gestapo raids, they ask for an accounting. They want a bill of particulars from you, Mr. Attorney General, and from you, Mr. Hoover.

The foreign-born, besides having contributed their sweat and blood to the building of America, have also become an important part of the progressive movement. They are members of trade-unions and other organizations, joining with their native-born fellow workers in the fight to make democracy live in America. They are part of the great movement against war and dictatorship in the United States. Hence they have been made the object of persecution.

These super-detective and Gestapo-imitating raids were conducted in such an indiscriminate manner as to terrorize the people. The raids were made by the F. B. I. and immigration inspectors, accompanied by local police, in sections where workers live. It is in these sections where the opposition to war is greatest. It is significant that clubs and restaurants where workers meet were the places at which these raids and arrests were made. It is also significant that many of those arrested were union members. Thus terror was spread where peace sentiment is strong and where union men congregate.

This attempt at intimidating people who are engaged in a struggle for peace and trade unionism becomes further obvious, in that these raids took place at a time which marked the beginning of the big drive to put over the Hobbs concentration camp bill, H. R. 3, in the Congress of the United States. This bill, among many other infamous things, provides for the detention in prison without bail and without trial of noncitizens ordered deported, but whose deportation cannot be effected. Nondeportable aliens can be detained in prison for 5 months, or a year and 3 months. Those subject to deportation because of political or economic beliefs can be imprisoned for life without bail and without trial.

This bill has the approval of the Attorney General. It is a concentration camp bill in that it sets up a system whereby men and women, noncitizens, may be detained and placed in jail for 5 months in some instances, for 1 year and 3 months or for life in other instances without trial, without even the slightest semblance of due process of law. I make that statement on my responsibility as a Member of Congress. I quote no one else for authority than the Solicitor General of the United States himself, the Honorable Francis Biddle. On June 2, 1941, before the National Conference of Social Workers, at Atlantic City, N. J., in referring to the Hobbs concentration-camp bill, he stated (1) that the bill had the backing of the Department of Justice, and (2) "the bill is in a sense revolutionary because it permits detention without trial by jury, but where aliens cannot be deported some such control is necessary.

It is a very serious curb on civil rights made essential by the circumstances of war. So that in the name of a war which, we are told, will be waged for the overthrow of Hitlerism—a war incidentally to which the American people are overwhelmingly opposed—we are establishing detention without trial by jury, which is admitted to be a very serious curb of civil rights. So that in the name of fighting Hitlerism over there, the Hitlerism which has become repugnant to the American people precisely because of the concentration camp, or detention without trial by jury, we are asked by the Attorney General and the proponents of the bill to establish Hitlerism over here—yes; the concentration camp—detention without trial by jury.

In this period of stress and tension we thus find the Department of Justice engaged in activity in support of its advocacy of legislation which will establish in America everything that we despise in Hitler Germany. The Attorney General, in an address at the annual meeting of the American Judicature Society, stated, "Every period of our national history which has felt great stress and tension from abroad has left a trail in the administration of justice that we do not retrace with pride." With just how much pride will our children be able to retrace the administration of justice under the present Department of Justice and under the present Attorney General?

The concentration-camp bill, the Alien Registration Act, the mass raids by the Department of Justice, and this entire offensive against the noncitizen has brought about a condition of discrimination which is repugnant to every concept of decency and Americanism. I quote for my authority for this statement the Social Security Board, which, in its report on labor shortages of January 30, 1941, stated as follows:

"From virtually every industrial State come reports that employers are refusing to hire noncitizens, and that employers are going far beyond the legal requirements fixed by the Government.

"By act of Congress, the employment of aliens in private industry working on Government contracts is not prohibited but restricted.

"Employers' specifications extend far beyond the requirements of citizenship. In some instances it does not suffice that the worker himself be born in the United States, but both parents must be American-born. There are even instances where the grandparents as well must be American-born."

The order of the day is not only discrimination against the noncitizen but against his native-born children and even his native-born grandchildren. It carries out the accusation that I have repeatedly made that the attack on the noncitizen becomes, after the first charge, an assault on the citizen as well. No defense of democracy can be successful if we close our eyes to the attack on the foreign-born. The defense of the rights of the foreign-born, of the Negro, and of political, racial, and religious minorities is a defense of democracy at the bridgehead.

Once we permit a break through at these bridgeheads of democracy, then our last line of defense becomes subjected to the fire of those who under the guise of so-called national defense and in the interests of the prosecution of an imperialist war seek to destroy the democratic rights of every single American. We cannot defend democracy anywhere else in the world unless we first make it safe in the United States of America.

This is not the first time in the history of our country that we have witnessed legislation and activity against the foreign-born. In the very beginning of our Republic the forerunners of those who advocate concentration camps today and the persecution of the foreign-born, legislated against the interests of the American people, and enacted the alien and sedition laws of 1798. Then, too, the apprehension of spies and saboteurs was used as the smoke screen behind which the enemies of American liberty sought to destroy it. Then, too, there was a war in Europe. Then, too, Thomas Jefferson, great founder of our American democracy, was called a foreign agent. Then, too, Thomas Jefferson exposed the conspiracy against the peace and liberties of the American people when he said:

"One of the war party, in a fit of unguarded passion declared some time ago they would pass an alien bill, and a sedition bill. * * * I consider these laws as merely an experiment on the American mind, to see how far it will bear an avowed violation of the Constitution. * * * The alien bill is a most detestable thing."

Then, too, the American people rallied, repealed the Alien and Sedition Acts, and destroyed the prowar forces that were responsible for them. Now, too, there is a war in Europe. Now, too, the enemies of the peace and liberties of the American people are driving against them behind a smoke screen of spy and saboteur hysteria. Now, too, those who stand up and fight for the peace and freedom of the American people are called spies, foreign agents, and aliens. Now, too, the attack is made on the foreign born, the Negro, political, racial, and religious minorities. Now, too, the warmakers are imposing alien and sedition laws on the American people in order to destroy our peace and freedom. Now, too, the American people recognize that these attacks are attacks on all of the people. Now, too, the American people will rally and with historic firmness say to the President, to the Attorney General, and to the Congressmen and Senators, "There shall be no Gestapo in America."

LETTER FROM CONSTITUENT

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I desire to include a letter that I have received from a constituent. This letter is typical of a number of other letters that I have received. Mr. Anderson is one of the substantial farmers in his community.

BURDICK, KANS., May 4, 1941.

Congressman EDWARD H. REES,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. REESE: I am and have been actively engaged in farming and stock feeding for the past 32 years. I was born and have lived in the same community all my life. I was 16 years old when I started farming, rented a 160-acre farm, and went in debt for all my farm equipment. When 19 years, I bought the 160-acre farm that I was renting for which I paid $10,000, paid down $1,500, and went in debt for the balance. Since then I have bought other land until today my wife and I, and daughter, 21, graduating from college this spring, and son, 17, finishing high school this spring, own 312 acres of fertile land on which we have built $20,000 of improvements, including a modern home. While we still have a Government loan on this property we do not have any back interest or taxes due.

So much for that. What I am interested in now is the future. I am wondering how we farmers and stockmen are going to continue in the future with the Government setup of farm programs and marketing quotas telling us, the farmers, what we can plant, what we can sell, and what we can feed to our livestock.

I am wondering about the future for the American farmer. By the American farmer I mean the real farmer—the family that is really trying to make an honest living and trying to pay their honest debts by honest labor and efforts. And I don't mean the farm family that is always some place in their car and is always trying to figure out some way that they can crook the Government out of a larger farm payment or some individual out of his honest earnings by dishonesty. There are too many of this type and the number is increasing every year. And I believe that the farm program has done much to increase this condition.

I believe in, and I am in favor of, the Government giving to the American farmer the American market for his products instead of buying beef and other products from other countries. I believe that this way the American farmer will come nearer making an honest, comfortable living than he can with the conditions as they are today. Today there are millions of dollars spent through the farm programs which dictate to us farmers how we are to run our farms, and this is done in many, if not in most cases, through men that know very little about farming and in many cases have made failures themselves.

I know this to be a fact, for in my own township we have seven men at the head of the program, including the county chairman. Out of the seven, six have lost their farms through foreclosure or by deeding their land to the loan company prior to foreclosure, and the seventh has been on work relief. Today these seven men are telling the rest of us how to run our farms. This is the class of farmers who are in favor of the farm program and who undoubtedly will vote on the marketing quota on wheat, if given a chance.

Now, if this marketing quota is voted in and we farmers are compelled to pay a penalty before we can even feed our excess wheat to livestock on our own farms, then I say our liberty is gone, and I think there will be more trouble right here at home in every community than there is in Europe today.

We have not been able to raise corn in this community for some time. In fact, I feel certain that there have been more bushels of seed corn planted in this township the last 9 years, or since 1932, than there have been bushels harvested and cribbed. But we have raised good wheat and I, as well as many of my neighbors, have fed lots of wheat to hogs, cattle, and poultry with good results. I consider a bushel of wheat worth more than a bushel of corn for hogs. Why not let us raise and feed the crops that we are equipped to raise and can raise instead of forcing us to ship or truck in grain that we cannot raise for a long distance at great expense?

I hope that you will agree with me that the farmer, as a whole, in the past, has been considered an honest, hard-working class of people, but I believe that if this farm program is continued that this will not be true in the future. I believe this to be true because I think if he can get a larger payment by giving in false yields or figures it is going to tempt him to do so because it comes from the Government, and too many people don't know who the Government is or where the money comes from.

I urge you to vote so as to retain the farmer's liberty, and I feel sure that the farmer will do a better job of operating his own farm than anyone can do from Washington, D. C., or even at our own county seat.

Thanks, and hoping for our liberty I am,
Respectfully yours,

W. J. ANDERSON.

New York State Council, Knights of Columbus, Pledges Support of National-Defense Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES M. FITZPATRICK
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 13, 1941

RESOLUTION OF NEW YORK STATE COUNCIL, KNIGHTS OF COLUMBUS

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a copy of the resolution adopted at the forty-sixth annual meeting of the New York State Council, Knights of Columbus, held at Saratoga Springs, N. Y., on May 30 and 31, 1941:

Whereas the war now raging in the Eastern Hemisphere continues to bring ever-increasing destruction of life, leaving in its wake starvation, ruin, and chaos; and

Whereas the United States of America is in a position to use the weight of its tremendous influence to contribute to a cessation of hostilities and to bring to a halt this wanton destruction and restore a just peace based on charity and justice for the rights of all; and

Whereas the American people are bitterly opposed to the anti-Christian philosophy of government of the totalitarian state, and are deeply concerned with the concentration of all our powers, spiritual and physical, on the protection of our country against this serious threat to our traditional principles; are likewise fully conscious of the fact that the responsibility of the President and the Congress is especially heavy at this time when all are so anxious to provide for our country's adequate defense and to avoid involvement in the war, in keeping with the desires of the vast majority of our citizens; and

Whereas our Holy Father Pius XII has pointed out that "nothing is gained by war that cannot be achieved by peace," and that "in war, all is lost"; and

Whereas the archbishops and bishops of the United States, in an official statement made through the administrative board of the National Catholic Welfare Council, have declared that "the will of America today is set on peace, not war, as the aim of our defense program"; and

Whereas in a statement signed by Catholic and Anglican bishops of England it was said: "The present evils of the world are due to the failure of nations and peoples to carry out the laws of God," which statement urged that the Government of England give serious consideration to the five-point program of Pius XII for peace: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That New York State Council, Knights of Columbus, in convention assembled, representing 51,000 members of the State of New York, while prayerfully hoping that the President and Congress will use their good offices as an effective means of keeping America out of war and in assisting the world to come to a just and lasting peace based on principles of Christian charity and justice, hereby pledge our fullest support for the defense program; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be forwarded to the Honorable Franklin D. Roosevelt, President of the United States, and to each Member of Congress of the United States from the State of New York.

This is to certify that the foregoing resolution was unanimously adopted at a session of the annual meeting of the New York State Council held in the city of Saratoga Springs, N. Y., on May 31, 1941.

HUGH A. DOYLE,
State Deputy.

Attest:

FRANCIS J. NILAN,
State Secretary.

The Sore Thumb in the Draft

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THAD F. WASIELEWSKI
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 13, 1941

EDITORIAL FROM THE MILWAUKEE JOURNAL

Mr. WASIELEWSKI. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Milwaukee Journal of June 11, 1941:

[From the Milwaukee Journal of June 11, 1941]

THE SORE THUMB IN THE DRAFT

The shortcomings and absurdities of the present draft law and its national administration stick out like a sore thumb in the case of John D. Rigney, Chicago White Sox pitcher, who was deferred by his local board on the ground that he would lose too much salary if he answered the call. Rigney pulls down from $12,000 to $15,000 a year, paid in five installments during the summer months. He wants to wait until he has collected it, plus a bonus, before he reports.

The primary trouble does not lie in his claims for deferment. There might be a basis, due to the plan on which he is paid, if others got the same treatment. But the Detroit Tigers gave up Hank Greenberg, star outfielder, and he gave up $50,000 a year—without a squawk. He did not ask a day. And Bobby Feller, of Cleveland, has announced that he will ask no deferment. Feller stands to lose $45,000 a year, almost as much as the $48,000 now being lost by the drafted former head of the New York Stock Exchange.

But to leave ball players, this wide variation in treatment runs all through the draft administration, due to the fact that there are no rules and that local boards can decide as they please. One board takes away the partial support of a widowed mother, and another board defers a man who earns $1,350 a year because he has a wife, who also earns $1,350 a year. These are from the records. There are many such cockeyed instances.

In the case of Rigney, the Illinois director of selective service did right in appealing the decision of the River Forest board. You cannot let such things stand and have any morale in selective service. It becomes too selective. We hope President Roosevelt will see the seriousness of such discriminations when the appeal against the Rigney deferment reaches him.

And let it be hoped that Congress will shake off its shell shock and get around to the draft question soon, enacting some rules for the present draft law and also a permanent law under which all future registrants will be placed—a law that will put responsibility for a year of service, either in the Army or in defense industry, on the young men rather than on the draft boards.

They would know when they registered at 18 that they had a year to serve. They would be given opportunity to complete their schooling and also a considerable latitude of choice in other ways. But there would be no dodging over marriage, dependency, or loss of fat salaries.

LETTERS IN REFERENCE TO APPOINTMENT TO SUPREME COURT

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letters:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., May 17, 1941.

President FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT,
The White House, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: No man in the United States has watched with deeper and keener interest your effort to appoint worthy men to office than I. I wired you from Chicago in 1937 highly commending your judgment and courage in the appointment of Associate Justice Black to the Supreme Court bench. I am writing now to endorse Senator JAMES F. BYRNES to fill the vacancy on the Supreme Court bench created by the resignation of Justice McReynolds.

I have known Senator BYRNES for about 30 years. Aside from being an outstanding lawyer and statesman, he is a genuine new dealer, courageous and honest, and just to his fellow man. It has been a source of great satisfaction and pleasure to me to confer with Senator BYRNES since I have been a Member of Congress, and to note his broad vision and his determination to be fair and just to all Americans, regardless of race or color. It is my opinion that Senator BYRNES is without doubt one of the best, if not the best, qualified men in this country to fill the vacancy.

I sincerely hope that in your wise judgment you will see fit to appoint him to this place on the bench where I am sure he will continue to render that superlative degree of service which has characterized his career over a long period of years. Thousands of well-thinking people of my race join me in making this request of you. We hope and pray that you can grant it. I am,

Very sincerely and gratefully years,
ARTHUR W. MITCHELL.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, May 20, 1941.

Hon. ARTHUR W. MITCHELL,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. MITCHELL: Please accept the President's thanks for your letter of May 17. He wants you to know that he appreciates your courtesy in telling him of your high estimate of the qualifications of Hon. JAMES F. BYRNES for appointment as Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Very sincerely yours,
M. H. MCINTYRE,
Secretary to the President.

UNITED STATES SENATE, COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS,
May 20, 1941.

Hon. ARTHUR W. MITCHELL,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MITCHELL: I am in receipt of copy of a letter addressed to the President by you with reference to the appointment to the Supreme Court. Because this expression of your good will is unsolicited, it is all the more appreciated.

When Justice McReynolds retired, some of my colleagues suggested that since it was a southern vacancy I should be appointed. Naturally I was flattered. Like most lawyers, I regard the appointment to the Court as a great honor. As time has passed, I confess that I have doubt as to whether, after my active life in the legislative branch of the Government, I would be happy in the work of the Court. Consequently I have urged my friends not to do anything to influence my appointment. However, there will be time enough for me to decide whether I want to leave the Senate, should the President see fit to offer me the appointment. I am telling you now of my views only because I appreciate your friendly interest.

You have proved a sound and constructive leader. I am not indulging in flattery when I say you have rendered to your people a service excelled only by your preceptor, Booker T. Washington, whose life undoubtedly has influenced your thinking. When you express the opinion that I have been fair and just to all people, regardless of race, it is a real compliment.

With best wishes, I am,
Sincerely yours,
JAMES F. BYRNES.

Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Seaway

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE A. DONDERO
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 13, 1941

RESOLUTION OF THE MANISTIQUE (MICH.) CITY COUNCIL

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a resolution adopted by the City Council of Manistique, Mich., urging the construction of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence seaway at the earliest possible date due to the immeasurable benefits it would bring to this county:

Whereas the President of the United States did, on June 5, 1941, send a special message to Congress urging the Congress to authorize the construction of the St. Lawrence seaway and power project; and

Whereas this city council suggests that the construction of this project at the earliest possible date would be of immeasurable benefit to this country in its defense program; and

Whereas the present rate of ship tonnage being sunk by the dictator nations is far in excess of our ability to replace the same unless shipyards on the Great Lakes are enabled to participate in this building program; and

Whereas shipyards located on the Great Lakes are so far removed from either the Atlantic or Pacific seaboards as to make them less vulnerable to attack in the event of war; and

Whereas there now appears to be an enormous shortage of oil and oil commodities along the Atlantic seaboard due to lack of tankers available to transport oil and oil products, which, if the seaway project were now a reality, would come by pipe line to the Great Lakes and then be transported to the seaboard; and

Whereas the projected Great Lakes-St. Lawrence seaway and power project would not only provide the facilities for getting large oceangoing ships and their cargoes from the ports and shipyards on the Great Lakes to the Atlantic Ocean, but would also provide an enormous amount of cheap electrical energy sorely needed at this very moment in our defense program: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we unanimously endorse the President's action in urging the construction of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence seaway and power project at the earliest date possible; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to the Honorable ARTHUR H. VANDENBERG, Hon. PRENTISS M. BROWN, Hon. FRED BRADLEY, and to all of the remaining Michigan Representatives in Congress.

I hereby certify that the foregoing is a true copy of a resolution made and unanimously adopted at a regular meeting of the Manistique City Council held on Monday evening at 7:30 p. m., June 9 A. D. 1941.

Independent Air Force Proponents Are Active

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JENNINGS RANDOLPH
OF WEST VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 13, 1941

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, earlier this week I placed in the Appendix of the RECORD certain editorial and news comment indicating the growing strength of proposals for an independent air force. Today I have learned that the gentleman from New York, Representative BARRY, has introduced a measure on the subject. This bill has been referred, as has legislation by the gentleman from New York, Representative BEITER, and the gentleman from New Jersey, Representative OSMERS, to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments. I have two measures, H. R. 3795 and H. R. 4532, before that committee. The first would establish a Department of National Defense, and would set up the establishment of a separate air force as a branch equal to the status of the Army and Navy. The second proposal would bring about the establishment of a Department of Air Defense which would be administered by a Secretary of Air Defense who would take over the present functions of the Secretary of War relating to military aeronautics.

The gentleman from South Dakota, Representative MUNDT, has pending a resolution which would call on the Rules Committee to create a special group of House Members to thoroughly investigate the subject of a unified air force. There are also many of our colleagues who are deeply interested in seeing action at this time. I am hopeful that hearings can be arranged in the near future.

In connection with this matter I include at this point an article from the Evening Sun, Baltimore, Md., under date of May 31:

[From the Baltimore Sun of May 31, 1941]

WILL AIR POWER REALLY SUPERSEDE SEA POWER?

"Today we are witnessing the twilight of sea power. Tomorrow the whole epoch of modern history conditioned by that weapon will be ended." The statement is that of Maj. Alexander P. de Seversky, who, in the June issue of the American Mercury, warns that air power is taking its place.

Our two-ocean Navy will not be completed for 5 or 6 years. By that time Major de Seversky contends that such advances will have been made in aviation that the Navy will be useless, ready for the scrap heap. The Douglas B-19 bomber now has a range of nearly 8,000 miles, and a Martin flying boat is being designed for far greater distances. In the major's opinion, there will be, within 5 years, a plane with around-the-world range of 25,000 miles. "When that is achieved," he says, "there will remain no major tactical task heretofore entrusted to navies which has not been swallowed up by aviation."

Already, Major de Seversky asserts, the airplane has robbed the navy of its offensive power. Experience in the present war, he says, confirms the following axioms:

1. That surface forces, including naval units, cannot operate if the sky above is in enemy control.

2. That aviation carried along by the fleet itself is ineffectual against hostile land-based aircraft.

3. That only air power can effectively fight air power.

He calls attention to the futility of the British Fleet in its effort to prevent the Nazi invasion of Norway in the face of the Nazi control of the air, how it had to keep out of harm's way while Nazi transports, protected by planes, went back and forth across the Skagerrak. He reminds that it was the temporary British mastery of the air over Dunkirk, rather than the British Navy, which made possible the evacuation of the British Expeditionary Force, and that it is the R. A. F. and not the Navy which has thwarted and still thwarts the attempts at invasion of the British Isles. Nazi positions along the English Channel are within range of the Navy's guns, but it is the airplanes that are counted upon to attack and destroy them. No longer, he says, is it possible for the fleet to lay siege to the coast. It can only launch a sudden attack, trusting to surprise and weather conditions unfavorable to airplanes.

Major de Seversky admits that the British Fleet has operated successfully in the Mediterranean during the past year, but he argues that that was because Italy's air force is antiquated. The picture changed as soon as the Nazi Luftwaffe appeared on the scene and, he declares, the continued operation of the British Fleet in that corner will depend upon whether or not Great Britain eventually will control the air.

Had he written his article after the events of the last few weeks Major de Seversky might have added to his list of air-power achievements the destruction of many units of the British Fleet by dive bombers in the narrow waters around Crete and the important part which airplanes played in the shadowing and crippling of the Bismarck that preceded her sinking.

Major de Seversky charges that the exponents of naval power base their arguments upon the present status of airplanes without taking into account the progress which will continue to be made. "Now imagine the range of air power expanded three to five times—as it inevitably will be in the next few years," he says. "The Atlantic then becomes another Skagerrak, every bit as vulnerable as the North Sea. Unless they have land-based aviation better than the foe's, navies must then escape from the Atlantic—even if that foe were entirely without a navy. America will then be in precisely the same strategic position as the British Isles today, with the Atlantic Ocean equivalent to the English Channel, and its control, like control of the channel today, depending on relative aviation strengths."

The author touches upon the comparative costs of battleships and planes. He figures the cost of a capital ship at $100,000,000. For the same amount of money it would be possible to construct 250 bombers capable of flying to a European target, dropping their explosive loads, and returning. He estimates that each of them could carry 20 tons of explosives, making their striking power equal to 10,000 Stukas.

Unquestionably Major de Seversky makes out a strong case for air power. If our two-ocean navy will have to be scrapped as soon as it is built, why should it be built at all? Would it not be better to drop all plans and devote entire attention to the air force? As impressive as the arguments for air power are, there still remain objections to putting complete trust in it.

In the first place, in discussing relative costs, the major does not allow for the fact that while 250 bomber planes would be obsolete in a few years, a $100,000,000 battleship might be expected to have a life of from 15 to 20 years.

Furthermore, as impressive as air power has been in the present war, it has not been the complete answer. In spite of the devastating raids on British cities, the cities still survive. There is considerable doubt as to whether air power alone can bring about a decision. There are few people who believe, for example, that if Great Britain gains mastery of the air, she will be able to conquer Germany without the assistance of an expeditionary force which would certainly call for the services of a navy.

The progress of aviation which the major assumes may be too optimistic. Besides, he does not allow for improvements which may be made in the protection of ships against planes during the same period. Indeed, while air power has accomplished wonders, on the other hand, it has been handicapped where it has not had the assistance of other branches of military power. The answer would seem to lie, not in the supremacy of air power to the exclusion of naval power, but rather in a combination of the two. In fact, Major de Seversky, in spite of his enthusiasm for air power, seems to arrive at the same conclusion, for, at the end of his article he remarks: "I am not arguing for the immediate scrapping or limitation of naval strength. While naval utility has been seriously restricted it has not yet been entirely wiped out. What I am arguing for is a broader, more modern approach to the whole problem of America's national security; one that recognizes the changes in the science of war-making enforced by the growth of military aviation." Nobody is likely to differ with him on that.

Mr. Speaker, one of the well-known aviation writers, Joseph S. Edgerton, recently wrote the following article in the Washington (D. C.) Star:

[From the Washington Star]

SEPARATE AIR FORCE BACKERS MAY FORCE CONGRESS SHOW-DOWN—RANDOLPH WILL PRESS FOR PUBLIC HEARINGS ON HIS PROPOSAL

(By Joseph S. Edgerton)

Efforts to bring about a show-down on the long-standing controversy over creation of a separate air force before the end of the present Congress were forecast today.

Since the fight for a separate air force virtually ruptured the high command of the Army Air Service and resulted in the resignation from the Army of the late Gen. William Mitchell in 1926 there has been no more controversial problem in connection with American air defense.

Author of a bill to establish a Department of Air Defense ranking equally with the War and Navy Departments, Representative RANDOLPH, Democrat, of West Virginia, said today he would seek a public hearing on the measure and, if necessary, would undertake the circulation among Members of Congress of a petition to force consideration of the matter. There is, he said, increasing support for such legislation in Congress, which long has fought shy of the separate air force problem.

TRANSITION STEP PERILOUS

"If we are going to have a separate air force at all," Mr. RANDOLPH said, "it should be established, trained, and in working order before the emergency facing this country becomes acute. The transition to a separate air force is too major a step to be undertaken during the course of a military campaign."

Successes of the German Luftwaffe, which ranks equally with the German Army and Navy, and of the British Royal Air Force point to the need for creation of a separate aerial striking force capable of independent action or of cooperation with either the Army or Navy, or both, in the opinion of those who are supporting the Randolph bill.

The Randolph bill avoids one of the most serious aspects of the separate-air-force problem. This is the role of naval aviation. Under the Randolph bill, naval aviation is not disturbed, remaining, as now, a part of the Navy, subject wholly to naval control.

More extreme plans have provided for transfer to the proposed separate air force not only of all Army aviation but also of Navy, Marine Corps, and Coast Guard aviation. In the face of bitter opposition to anything which would disturb the present highly efficient functioning of naval aviation, however, all of these plans have died aborning. Even the British, who sought to set up an independent air force during World War days, soon found that it did not work insofar as the Navy was concerned, and have freed the naval air arm from the Royal Air Force.

AXIS PROBLEMS DIFFERENT

The Germans, lacking a navy, which requires integral aviation, have not had to face this problem. There are no German aircraft carriers. Italy also has neglected naval aviation—a neglect for which she paid heavily in recent Mediterranean actions.

Another serious problem to be considered in connection with a separate air force is that of Army cooperative aviation. Observation aviation has become an integral part of the ground Army. Each Army division has its own observation squadron, organically a part of the division. These are integral corps and Army aviation units. Observation balloons, as well as airplanes, are organically a part of the ground forces under the present set-up.

Leaving out naval aviation and such Army aviation as is now organically part of the ground forces, there is little to incorporate in a separate air force, but the remainder of the Army Air Corps and the General Headquarters Air Force. These are the units which would be affected by the Randolph bill.

The bill would transfer to the Department of Air Defense all the functions and duties of the Secretary of War relating to military aeronautics. All officers and employees of the War Department whose duties relate to military aeronautics would be transferred without change of classification or compensation.

FUNCTIONS EXPLAINED

The plan proposes the creation in the Department of Air Defense of a general staff with functions, concerning the air force, similar to those of the War Department General Staff today. The chief of staff of air defense and assistant chiefs of staff would be selected by the President from officers of the present Air Corps.

Under such a set-up military operations requiring cooperation between the air and ground forces, air and naval forces, or all three, would be carried out by task forces composed of the necessary units of any two or three of the services. This would be similar to the present German plan of action and, to some extent, similar to the British method of operating.

Command of the task force would be vested in the commanding officer of the service predominantly represented. In other words, a military mission primarily naval, but conducted with support of units of the air force and the Army, would be comanded by the senior naval officer. If the Army were making the main effort, with support of minor units of the air force and the Navy, the joint effort would be under command of the senior Army commander.

Roosevelt's Frankenstein

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BARTEL J. JONKMAN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 13, 1941

EDITORIAL FROM THE GRAND RAPIDS HERALD

Mr. JONKMAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Grand Rapids (Mich.) Herald of June 12, 1941:

[From the Grand Rapids (Mich.) Herald of June 12, 1941]

ROOSEVELT'S FRANKENSTEIN

For 8 years Franklin D. Roosevelt devoted most of his time to building up and putting into positions of power the radicals who have found a haven in the United States. For 8 years he nursed them along and they repaid him with two reelections, one for the unprecedented third term, and with tremendous contributions of money as well as votes in his campaigns.

For 8 years he has kept in his Cabinet a woman entirely incompetent for her position and one whose principles of Americanism are, to say the least, decidedly warped.

For 8 years Mr. Roosevelt has played with the Communists and others who were willing either to destroy our form of government by violence or were seeking to bring about a new social order by peaceful methods, but which nevertheless mean revolution.

For more than a year Mr. Roosevelt has known that this country was facing perhaps the greatest crisis in its existence. He has sought to build up a defense against the menace, a defense which requires the labor and the sacrifice of everybody who lives within the United States. For 8 years Mr. Roosevelt has sought to harass and to destroy all great corporations, has baited without cessation all public utilities, and has squandered the wealth of the people in the process of rearing up to fullest strength the new order based upon the superiority of the radical element. What now does he find?

He finds that despite his pleading, despite all he has done toward making that element powerful, despite his leniency toward unworthy radicals, despite his seeming popularity with that kind, they refuse to heed his summons, refuse to obey his wishes and the country's needs, that they will not produce the defense material we must have, that at last he must make use of the Army to keep the radicals from destroying not only our efforts to produce but that which already has been produced or is in process of production.

He finds that in the emergency he must call upon and depend upon the efforts of the great corporations he has previously sought to destroy, that the utilities which he has so consistently harassed cannot now produce the power needed, that the money that has been wasted is sadly needed today, and that the force which, with that extravagant spending, he built up has no love nor respect for him, except so long as he is willing to accept payment only in votes but not in labor for defense.

He has found that it was not his real popularity which they supported, but the billions of other people's money he was willing to pour into their coffers.

He has found now, and perhaps too late, that he has built up a Frankenstein which lives only to destroy him and our country with him.

Revenue Revision of 1941

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. W. R. POAGE

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 13, 1941

STATEMENT OF HON. W. R. POAGE, OF TEXAS

Mr. POAGE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement made by me before the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives on revenue revision of 1941, May 1941:

Mr. Chairman, gentlemen of the committee, I full well appreciate the heavy obligation resting on this committee to formulate a tax bill that will produce a tremendous increase in the income of the National Treasury. I realize that this great amount of money cannot be collected without placing heavy burdens on business and industry. I realize that any levies on which you decide will be burdensome to some and will be distasteful to those who have to pay the bill. While you cannot levy painless taxes, and while you cannot avoid some burden on industry which in many instances will appear somewhat discriminatory, I know that you will at all times endeavor, and I believe that you will in large measure succeed in avoiding any substantial injustice to any one product or industry as compared with other subjects of taxation.

It is to the discriminatory nature of the proposed increase in the Federal tax on gasoline that I desire to direct my remarks. I understand that it is proposed to increase the Federal tax on gasoline from 1.5 cents per gallon to 2.5 cents per gallon. This is an increase of 66⅔ percent in the Federal tax on a product already taxed by both the Federal and the local governments at rates far in excess of the rates imposed on any other article of such general productive use.

I realize that most of us are prone to see the evils of a tax that falls on our own people. Sometimes in our proper solicitude for our own people we overlook the broader public good. While I come from the greatest of all oil-producing and gasoline-refining States, I represent a district that neither produces oil nor refines gasoline. The people of my district are farmers and small-town merchants and professional people, but we live closely enough to the great petroleum industry to know something of its importance to a great section of this land. I therefore believe that I can, and I shall certainly attempt to, view the problem fairly. I want oil and its great derivative, gasoline, to pay their fair share of the defense burden, but I want this committee to always remember that gasoline is but a source of power that is used just as is coal and falling water to do man's work and move his goods. Gasoline is the absolutely indispensable handmaiden of modern industry and commerce; it is not a luxury or a nonessential like tobacco or liquor, the only other articles of general distribution on which we now levy anything like the tax we already impose on gasoline. To recognize that gasoline is a necessity of the most basic kind, let us look at the warring nations. Would not any one of them give up almost any article or product more readily than it would give up gasoline?

The man in the street thinks of gasoline in terms of 5 or 6 gallons for a dollar. The man who is familiar with the oil industry thinks of the refinery price of about 5 cents per gallon. He realizes that oil must be produced and refined for that small figure. He also knows that a difference of one-fourth cent per gallon in the refinery price spells the difference between a profit and a loss. He, therefore, is very aware that the average State gasoline tax is a 90-percent levy on this price, and that this State tax plus the present 1½-cent Federal levy amounts to considerably more than the refinery price. In other words, Government costs have doubled the price of this product at the refinery. Is it any wonder, then, that he is filled with foreboding at the prospect of an additional 1-cent Federal levy? It is just as though his production costs were arbitrarily to be increased. When he contemplates such figures he certainly must wish that he engaged in some other business where sales taxes range from 2 to 3 percent.

I cannot believe that the existing Federal tax of 1½ cents per gallon on gasoline should be increased. The highway users of the country are already paying their full and proportionate share of all general taxes. In addition to that they are contributing, in round figures, about $2,000,000,000 a year in special highway taxes of various kinds—Federal, State, and local. This sum is approximately equal to 14 percent of the total revenue accruing to all the units of government in the United States. Roughly speaking, State and local taxes on highway transportation amount to $1,500,000,000, while the Federal Government is collecting about $500,000,000 a year from this source. State taxes imposed on gasoline now average 4.4 cents per gallon. The existing Federal levy of 1½ cents per gallon brings the total to 5.9 cents. Adding another cent per gallon for Federal purposes would bring the average total to 6.9 cents per gallon. At the present retail price of gasoline, this would represent a sales tax of more than 50 percent. To the wholesaler it is a tax of more than 100 percent on the value of his product. Of course, it must be passed on to the consumer.

When the revenues derived from gasoline taxes are expended in improving and maintaining the highways, there can be no legitimate criticism. However, it must be kept in mind that much of the gasoline purchased by farmers is used for plowing, threshing, filling silos, sawing wood, grinding feed, and for other purposes that do not involve any use of the highways. Many States, including my State of Texas, properly refund the tax to farmers on gasoline used in such ways as have been enumerated. Other States do not make these refunds. So far as the Federal tax on gasoline is concerned, no refunds whatsoever are made. To increase the Federal gasoline tax would therefore result in increasing the farmer's cost of production. The same can be said for many other lines of business that use gasoline for nonhighway purposes.

The intrusion of the Federal Government into the gasoline-tax field cannot be regarded as desirable. Such appropriations as the Federal Government has made for highways can all be justified from the standpoint of national defense, to facilitate the transportation of the mails, and for other purposes benefiting all the people alike. It definitely is an unsound policy to allow two independent taxing authorities to heap excise or sales taxes upon one commodity, especially when that commodity is an everyday essential.

The States must be given some source of revenue. The field of gasoline taxation was first occupied by the States on the sound basis that, since they provided most of the cost of public roads, that it was proper for them to levy that tax. The field has been fully occupied. Gasoline already pays taxes out of proportion to its value. Only tobacco and spirituous liquors are taxed in amounts even remotely approaching the taxes on gasoline. Gasoline is a vital necessity of modern life.

The present discriminatory taxes imposed on gasoline can only be explained on the erroneous assumption that the Federal tax, like the State taxes, has some reasonable relation to benefits conferred by the Federal Government—that is, as a highway tax. We have, however, long since passed the stage where we could make that claim. Now it is frankly admitted that we propose to tax the most widely used motor fuel simply because we can make gasoline consumers pay. The theory is the same as that used in some European countries that tax salt, but it has other far-reaching and unjust implications.

Gasoline-propelled motor-born transportation is in direct competition with steam-propelled railroad transportation. What tax is proposed on the coal that the railroads use? Why not levy a tax of $5 per ton on soft coal? It will produce revenue. The Government needs the money. Is there any reason in morals or justice why all of the cost of supporting the Government should be heaped on one form of transportation and competitive forms should go free and, in fact, be guaranteed a profitable price by law—both on the transportation furnished by the railroads and the coal furnished by the mines?

I fully recognize the necessity under which this committee labors of devising a tax bill that will produce revenue. I only ask that the burden be equally distributed. I ask no special favors for gasoline or the users of motor vehicles, but I do plead with the committee to give this great commodity and those who use it equal and fair treatment.

Housing and the Nation's Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES F. BYRNES

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 16 (legislative day of Tuesday, June 10), 1941

ADDRESS BY THE VICE PRESIDENT

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered by Hon. HENRY A. WALLACE, Vice President of the United States, before the National Committee on the Housing Emergency, Inc., at the Mayflower Hotel, Washington, D. C., on June 12. The subject of the address is: Housing and the Nation's Defense, Present and Future.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

In this splendid 2-day meeting the National Committee on the Housing Emergency has had the benefit of the advice of many experts. I make no claim of being an expert, but my amateur enthusiasm for housing is so great that I found it impossible to resist Mrs. Rosenman's invitation.

It happens that for many years I have studied the ups and downs of the building cycle and have often pondered on how to iron out those cycles on a higher and progressively rising level of housing standards. Back in 1933 I belonged to that group which felt that one of the best ways of ending the depression was to start building on a large scale. Marriner Eccles, Winfield Riefler, M. L. Wilson, and a number of others, used to meet together from time to time to formulate the principles which finally were written into the several housing laws which have done so much to unleash the energies of private capital, lower the cost of money, and increase the standards of building excellence.

Before I came to Washington I was director in a building and loan association, and in recent years building-and-loan people have come to me and spoken of the interests of building and loan being different from those of the Federal Housing Administration. My key to resolving such conflicts has always been how to get the job done best, not who is to do it. There are at least a dozen different Federal agencies engaged in house-building activities of one kind or another. When I was Secretary of Agriculture the Farm Security Administration did a lot of house building for low-income farmers, and it gave me a great deal of pleasure to work with the engineers in cutting the cost of building these houses in two. We finally got so we could build a pretty good house for the South for $1,400. When peace comes, farm housing will be recognized as one of the most important jobs before the American people. But at the moment we are talking about housing in relation to the war emergency.

It is time to point out clearly the difference between wartime prosperity and wartime necessity with respect not only to housing but to everything else. They went through this in Germany about 6 years ago. Hitler started his vast rearmament program in 1933, when Germany was at the very bottom of the depression, with about one-third of her people out of work. The huge armament expenditures created an artificial prosperity, and those who had formerly been unemployed began to buy. But after the people became fully employed it became apparent that wartime prosperity must not be allowed to interfere with wartime needs, and General Goering came out in December of 1935 with his famous statement that the German people must choose between guns and butter.

The United States today is passing through the preliminary prosperity stage before we get down to real business. We have increased our production of both guns and butter and will no doubt continue to do so until such time as we begin to run genuinely short of labor. In the first quarter of this year the people of the United States built 32 percent more houses and bought about 20 percent more household furniture, about 40 percent more refrigerators, and 30 percent more passenger cars. No wonder sales of many other things have also increased, for factory pay rolls were nearly 30 percent greater than they were a year ago, corporation profits were 22 percent greater, and the money buying power of farmers also increased 8 percent. The cost of living has risen only 3 percent, and thus millions of our people are better off than they have been in many years.

The fact that we are now producing about four times as much in the way of defense materials as we did a year ago at this time has had an enormously stimulating effect on the great majority of our farmers, workers, and businessmen. Our effort so far has been easy and rather painless, and for the most part we have merely been putting idle industrial capacity and men to work rather than building new factories. By producing more guns, we have made a greater market for butter, automobiles, houses, and house furnishings.

The honeymoon of wartime prosperity will not last forever. Sooner or later higher taxes will begin to eat into the purchasing power of most of us, while at the same time we begin to see how defense needs are restricting our freedom of purchase. Our battle cry during the months immediately ahead must be "First things first."

Certain types of housing deserve to rank with the speedy building of bombers and ships. Other types of housing may need to wait until the war is over. We want to use our Federal Housing, United States Housing, and all the other Federal organizations, in cooperation with the private agencies, to build as rapidly as possible the houses which are necessary to take care of the defense workers, especially in those localities where defense industries and Army camps are located and where the population has doubled almost overnight.

There should be much additional housing also in towns where Army camps are located. Wives who wish to live near their husbands while they are serving in the Army can, if they have comfortable quarters at reasonable rents, do an even better job of building Army morale than they are now doing. Anyone who has visited towns like Newport News, Va.; Fayetteville, N. C.; Alexandria, La.; or San Diego, Calif., knows the magnitude of the housing problem which has suddenly been created by our defense efforts. The splendid Americanism shown by those living under congested conditions is one of the most inspiring things in America today.

We are better organized to do a speedy, creditable housing job today than in World War No. 1. We have public agencies, both for construction and for aiding private business, that are well past the experimental stage. They have done a good job so far in 1941, and they will do an even better job during the rest of this year.

From now on, until peace comes, there will be as much need for the various housing agencies holding down on the wrong kind of house building as for stimulating the building of houses where they are most needed. Perhaps new housing of the luxury or higher-income type can be curtailed in favor of housing essential for decent living conditions for defense workers and low-income groups. In this great effort there is no room for inefficiency or for conflicts which interfere with defense action. The job is big enough to keep all the private and public housing organizations busy in the defense areas, and they will not measure up to their opportunity unless there is the utmost of harmonious cooperation. National unity demands that the various housing agencies pull together as they have never pulled before.

I mention the need for harmony and good will because the agents of the dictators are continually at work among us trying to stir up discord. Every disagreement among ourselves is a free gift to Hitler. And so I hope the various housing organizations will compete to see who can do the most work, and that they will not allow themselves to become entangled in conflicts of a sort which will only give pleasure to the dictators. Our job is to compete with each other in promoting the general welfare and the common defense with the greatest speed possible.

There is still another reason for emphasizing need for harmony. The better the job our housing agencies do now in cooperating in behalf of the defense program the greater will be their opportunities to do the socially right kind of housing job for the Nation in the post-defense period. I, therefore, trust that the National Committee on the Housing Emergency will direct its effort toward promoting cooperation, not merely to get defense housing built with all possible speed, but also to consider the way in which housing can be used to help break the economic shock of the peace. I am one of those who believe that peace can be made to mean more and better housing, more and better food, less unemployment, and more security for old age. There are forward-looking businessmen in both the United States and England who realize more than ever before that the test of democracy is whether or not it can provide good food, decent shelter, and security.

There are men in government, business, labor, and agriculture who are willing to plan now as they have never planned before, for they want to make sure that we shall not again lose our hard-won peace. In all countries the people are hungry for that kind of peace which will give them freedom from the terrorism of the Gestapo; freedom from the fear of unemployment, hunger, and lack of shelter; and freedom from the fear of future war. The people of free democracies are fighting for this kind of peace. Eventually, 90 percent of the people in the dictator countries will be hungry for it, too, and, with the help of the democracies, will drive out the dictator and his gang who now deny them these freedoms and this peace.

The democratic way is for each citizen of this country to figure out for himself, as he listens to the radio and reads the newspapers day by day, a personal standard of priorities. In the months immediately ahead, we may want to cut down very greatly in our purchases of things which we can do without now but which we will want to buy when peace comes. If we thus adopt personal-standard priorities with intelligence, determination, and unselfishness, we shall be able to outproduce the aggressor nations and take the heart out of the dictators.

Aroused democracy has just begun to fight. In present-day mechanized warfare, the measure of our fighting power is the volume of our defense production. The National Committee on the Housing Emergency is going to make its contribution toward pushing the right kind of housing in the right places with the greatest speed possible. It asks for the cooperation of labor, industry, and Government. But, above all, it asks for the understanding cooperation of you who are listening in tonight, eager to do your utmost in your own democratic way.

A Pagan Philosophy of Government

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LISTER HILL

OF ALABAMA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 16 (legislative day of Tuesday, June 10), 1941

COMMENCEMENT ADDRESS BY HON. GEORGE W. NORRIS, OF NEBRASKA, AT WOOSTER COLLEGE, OHIO

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, this morning, at the commencement exercises of the College of Wooster, Wooster, Ohio, the distinguished senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] delivered the commencement address. In his very able address Senator NORRIS presented a wonderfully graphic and challenging picture of the international situation as it confronts our country today. I wish that every man, woman, and child in America could read the address. I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

In these unprecedented days of sorrow and world-wide suffering, when century-old nations are falling like the leaves of the forest, honest men and women are wondering what has happened to our civilization. Students of history are searching literature in vain for any similar period in the world's history. Our present-day civilization seems to be sinking to the dismal abyss of dishonor, misery, and woe. The code of honor which has governed men and women has, to a great extent, lost its power and sunk into oblivion or has been forgotten.

What has happened to our world that we thought had reached such a high degree of civilization? The pillars of peace, erected by men and nations of honor and integrity, are crumbling all over the world. The laws of humanity, made by honest men and nations, have been repudiated by ruthless and murderous attacks upon civilization, paying no heed to the suffering of the innocent, but inflicting cruel and unholy vengeance upon unoffending millions of victims whom it crushes to death upon pagan altars. All over the world we hear the wailing cry and the dying moan of the suffering victims of this pagan philosophy until all of civilization, in the agony of its sorrow, like Christ on the cross, raises its eyes to Heaven and exclaims, "My God, why hast Thou forsaken me?"

Four of the great nations of the earth are led by a desire to kill and enslave peaceful and harmless people who refuse to submit to the ravages of hate, and to bow and bend the knee in meek and humble slavery to the pagan rulers who are bent upon the destruction of home, fireside, and the love that God intended to exist among his people. Civilization, against great odds, is struggling to preserve fidelity, honor, and honesty among the peoples of the earth, to save itself from destruction and slavery, and to maintain law and order in this troubled world.

Japan, without reason, without cause, and practically without notice, seized Manchukuo and subjected its people to the domination of a despotic ruler.

Mussolini, likewise, without reason or cause, murdered and slaughtered the weak and helpless men and women of Abyssinia—without giving any excuse for this onslaught and the destruction of a people who had never given any offense either in thought or deed.

Russia, like an unrestrained demon, took Lithuania, Estonia, and Latvia and, without pretense of authority or reason, made war upon Finland and, because she was powerful enough to do so, took a large part of that little nation into her own domain and later on took a portion of Poland.

Hitler, with a heart of stone and without any semblance of reason, murdered the men and women of Poland, seized her territory without excuse and, in the continuous march of his disgraceful course, by dishonorable subterfuge and deception, conquered Austria, Czechoslovakia, Norway, Denmark, Belgium, Holland, Rumania, Bulgaria, Yugoslavia, and Greece, until now, without any cause, without any reason, and without any authority, he is the dominant ruler of nearly all of Europe.

There is no love between these four dictator nations. In truth, they hate each other with a hatred that is now kept under control but each one of them knows that, before he can attain his ambitions, there must be a war of extermination between them. The time for fighting among themselves has not yet arrived. They are controlled by no code that has ever existed between men and nations of integrity or honesty. Like the beast of the jungle, Hitler pounces upon the innocent peoples of Europe and reduces them to slavery. Each one of these dictatorial rulers is imbued with the idea that he is to become the ruler of all the earth. There is no secret about these ambitions. The Japanese believe that ultimately Japan will rule the world; Mussolini, controlled by his own cruel instincts and moved by his ideas of superiority, believes that ultimately Italy will be the power that dominates all creation. The doctrines of Stalin are openly proclaimed over the world and the boast is made that eventually Russia will be the ruler of all. Hitler has implanted in the hearts of his people the belief that they are a superior race and that their destiny is to march on and on until every nation in our civilization is subdued. He has taught his people to believe that they are born to rule—that all other peoples are born to serve his conquering hosts—and that, by their superiority of intellect, and through their murderous and disgraceful methods of inhuman slaughter, the world will finally be brought into subjection and the inferior nations will be slaves, while he sits in undisputed possession of the throne which shall govern the world.

Should England be conquered, no great nation stands in their pathway except our own and it is to the interest of every one of them that they should now be combined inasmuch as the common goal demands that the United States must be conquered before the world can be subdued. Of all these four dictatorial powers, Hitler stands out preeminently as the most prominent and as the leader of them all. He dominates them all today and, at the present time, his will is superior to any of them. He is the evil genius who will be the guiding spirit in the great battle to control the Western Hemisphere. In order to get control of North and South America, he must first conquer England. The conquering of England, however, is only one step in the march toward world domination. It is a necessary step and, if he fails to conquer Great Britain, then he will be defeated beyond the possibility of further success. Hitler is not moved by any thought of justice, of kindness, or of mercy. This pagan philosophy has within it no place for justice even to the innocent and to the unoffending. His theory is that he has an absolute right to conquer any nation or any people if he has the power to do it. He can conquer the weaker nations without any struggle as he boasted when he conquered Czechoslovakia "without the firing of a shot." His philosophy is one of deception as his own writings and his own conduct show beyond the shadow of a doubt. He does not hesitate to resort to deception of the vilest kind to attain his end and his ambitions are well known. He makes no secret of them.

To be conquered by Hitler is to be subjugated into a bondage of human slavery. In his march of inhuman triumph, he tramples under his heel both the babe in the cradle and the old and infirm standing upon the brink of the grave. At the present time, Great Britain stands in his way. She has, by a defense of bravery and courage never before witnessed by mortal man, thwarted his attempts and defied him with a fortitude which is unequaled in the history of nations. Hitler makes no promise that if he conquers England he will be satisfied, but even if he did, who would believe him? How often, in his successful and tyrannical march, has he made such promises! The world knows that he has violated these promises without any hesitancy. If England goes down, there is no doubt but what, as soon as he has made the necessary preparations, his march of conquest will continue. All the world knows this to be true. Hitler does not deny it. Everyone knows that after he has conquered England, his next step would be to come to the Western Hemisphere and that the only power in the Western Hemisphere which is prepared to offer any resistance is our own country.

I think everybody in America realizes this struggle with Hitler must come sometime. There is a divided opinion—an honest division I think—as to when and how soon that struggle will come. I am not one of those who think that the fall of England will be followed at once by an attack upon this hemisphere. Nor am I one of those who thinks an attack will come, in the first instance, upon us. It will come through South and Central America. It may take several years before he is ready and these will be years of preparation.

If England falls, the United States will be entirely shut out of the European trade. Hitler can get what he wants in South America. He already has his "fifth column" supporters in many of the South and Central American countries. These countries produce the raw materials he needs. Hitler will supply them with the manufactured products. As a commercial proposition, it will be almost a perfect setting. He will establish business connections with every nation in South and Central America. Europe, dominated by Hitler, will become the market for their goods, and the trade will be prosperous for both Hitler and for his South American clients. Does anyone believe, judging from past experience, that he will fail to plant his trusted men in every country to the south of us? When we have lost our European trade and South and Central America have it all, will not the time be ripe for him to practice his deceptive methods of winning the peoples of these nations? How long will it be, after England falls, before Hitler will have established friendly relations with all of these countries?

In the meantime, he will be building up a navy. I know it is said that, while this is going on, we will be building up a navy. Undoubtedly we will, but let us see how this race for naval supremacy will come out. Hitler will have Japan, Russia, and Italy united with him in the struggle for greater armaments. Every one of these nations will increase its army. This race will not all be on one side.

Those Americans who beat their breasts and boast of our great resources, our strength, our power, and our courage, forget that four other nations will be engaged in the same race. Do we not know that they can produce the same amount of military armament for one-half less than it will cost us? Suppose this race goes on for 2, 3, or perhaps 10 years, how are we going to fare? The commercial trade between Hitler and South America will be prosperous and increasing year after year. Our trade with Europe will have vanished. The four dictator nations will be building battleships, submarines, and airplanes. They will build them for much less than we will be building ours, and is there any reason to think that they will not build them faster than we do? Will a sensible man say they will do nothing while we are going on with the expenditure of billions of dollars every year to increase our armaments and our Navy? We should never make the mistake, either in business or in any other walk of life, of underestimating the power and resources of an enemy in any kind of a controversy. When we look back over the last few years and see the wonders that Hitler has performed, we must realize he has done almost the impossible. He has built up a dominating power in the air—he has done it so secretly that the world knew nothing about it. He has today the largest airplane force of any power on earth. Even within a few years he has surpassed us in the air. Although blockaded by the British Fleet, he has built at least two of the greatest battleships that have ever floated upon the seas. Not until one of these battleships had been destroyed was it known to any of the experts in any country on earth that he had such a battleship. It is now known that he has another one just like it. No one knows how many more. He has been building up a navy without the knowledge of his enemies. Apparently he has done this without any money. He has done it in violation of all the ordinary rules of procedure. He has more submarines in the bosom of the ocean today than all the rest of the world put together. He has done this out of nothing. When you ask, "How is it possible?" the answer is, "It is already accomplished." He has come well-nigh controlling the commerce of the Atlantic Ocean by these submarines. They prey upon the commercial as well as upon the armored ships in the middle of the night. Like a serpent stealing toward its victim, he pounces upon his enemies, in violation of all ethics and all honor, sinking his victims to the bottom of the sea. We should not underestimate his power. In some respects he stands without a peer in the history of the world. He has accomplished many things the experts have said over and over again were impossible. Although he is without semblance of any truthfulness or any honesty, he is, nevertheless, one of the great geniuses of the world.

It must be remembered, too, that, if England goes down and a period of several years of preparations on both sides goes on, he will have the airplane factories of Europe at his back. If he does in that race what he has been doing during the past several years, he will produce an air force greater than we can possibly produce in the same length of time, and producing airplanes on his side will be Japan, Russia, and Italy. Assuming that England is out of the picture, then the factories of England will be producing at his will. With all this combination against us, can we expect to keep up in that race? The same possibilities will exist in the building of ships, submarines, and armament. This will all be done by persons who will not be paid a living wage to the extent now enjoyed by our people. To a great extent it will be carried on by men who get no wages—or, at least, just a bare subsistence.

Let us see what we will be doing. Those who are willing to let England fall know that after England does fall the war will come to us sooner or later, and they boast how we will produce all kinds of military machines to such an extent that the world cannot compete with us. And yet we are united in the desire not to subject our people to the same methods of living as prevail under Hitler. We are going to pay a living wage; we are going to pay profits to manufacturers; we are going to keep up the high standards of living which we now enjoy. How will we produce the goods? We know now that they will cost many times more than our enemies will have to pay. We know also that while this is going on we will be deprived of the trade of Europe and that we will probably lose most of our trade with South and Central America. We know that, under all the circumstances, Hitler can offer a greater inducement for that trade than we can.

With this curtailment in our foreign trade, we will have to levy taxes to meet these added burdens. Where will they end? It requires only a few moments' thought to see that we cannot successfully carry on this race. We are certain to be beaten in the race for military supremacy. While we produce one airplane, our enemies will produce at least a dozen; while we produce one battleship, our enemies will produce three or four; and our enemies will outnumber us a dozen to one in the production of submarines. Their taxes will not be as high as ours. Ours will be ascending rapidly step by step. Deprived of world trade, we will have to take care of our own surpluses. We will have to reduce our people to the level of Hitler's people or meet ignominious defeat in that race of war preparation. So that the longer the race lasts, the greater the probabilities are that our production will not compare with that of our enemy. What will happen under these circumstances with our increased taxes? We are already burdened almost to the limit. Every man knows there is a limit to taxation and that the very burden of taxation, if continued indefinitely, will crush us. Is the result not plain? Do we not know the outcome even before we begin? We stand no show in that kind of a race under the circumstances which will exist. How long can we keep this up and maintain ourselves? How long will it be before we will have to meet the sad fate of other nations and face a revolution at home?

The outcome is plain. In this kind of a struggle, we will go down to defeat without a shot being fired. This is the way that Hitler has already narrated that he expects to win. He knows he can produce cheaper and, with his allies, faster than we can, and he would not object if this armament race went on several years until he won without the using of his navy, his army, his airplanes, or his submarines.

I know this is a sad picture I am painting. It has in it very few, if any, stars of hope and, yet, I believe it is a true picture and we should face the truth no matter how humiliating or distressful it may be. If England wins over Hitler, all this will fade away. The war will be ended and this struggle which I have described will never take place.

The answer then, it seems to me, is to help England win and help her now. If we can supply her with airplanes, with food, and with military material, I believe she can and will win, and the war will be over. If she falls and we must go on with these years of preparation for greater armament, the probabilities are that we will fail but, even if we did not, we will be sending soldiers to South America and we will be sending soldiers to Central America. Suppose we help England now. Does anyone believe we are going to send soldiers to Europe? So far as I know, no one believes that. If Hitler starts a war against us because of the assistance we have given to England, it will be only a fight upon the sea. If we wait for the war that is to come after the fall of England, it will be a war not only upon the seas but American boys will be sent to South and Central America to preserve this hemisphere. If England falls and we start in this race for military supremacy—which everybody admits we will—with all the chances against us, will life be worth living during that period? When we see our enemies increasing military preparations faster than we can increase them; when the burdens of taxation are binding us to the earth; when we are finding it impossible to have any enjoyment or comfort in life, with the full knowledge that our young men are soon to be sent to the wilds of South America to fight, will life be worth living? The chances are that we would go down at the end of the struggle and become the slaves of conquering Hitler. So that, if the theory of those who oppose England be true, we are very likely, in the years to come, to be doomed to a life of suffering and toil and, during those years, we will have to live a life that is worse than death itself.

There is another point which I have in mind and which, so far as I know, has received no attention. If England falls, and we are doomed to a life of military preparation, where that is the dominant thing in our lives, where every effort and every energy of our people is moved by military considerations; if we are to be subjected to that kind of a life and it is to become permanent, many of our people will lead a life of bitterest poverty and military sentiment will dominate completely and absolutely our Nation and our lives. If carried on for a sufficient length of time it will convert our people into a military-minded population and will gradually but eventually obliterate completely all the greatest pleasures and joys which can come to a liberty-loving people.

Hiter could not have the control he now has over the German people if there had not been this preparation which has been going on for centuries. The Germar of today was born into a world of military preparation and military control. He has known nothing else during his entire life. His father was the same before him. The child is taught that military supremacy is the highest ideal of the Nation; that to bring about military supremacy it is necessary to have absolute subjection of the people to their masters. The little child, from the beginning, is taught to respect the commands of the officials in the higher ranks without asking any questions. This becomes a part of the make-up of the human being. It comes into all walks of life. It degrades womanhood. She becomes a slave in order that men may spend their time in the Army preparing themselves to slaughter and be slaughtered on the battlefield. All these things have been taught the German people for generations and so they were prepared for the next step when Hitler came into the picture. It was only another step from what they had been doing to place themselves under the domination and control of that evil genius. The German citizen of today does not complain about any injustice he may suffer at the hands of his government. He tries to make himself believe it is not an injustice and, if he cannot understand it, he tells himself that it is the command of those who know more than he does and, after all, it is for his own good. The women are taught to perform the work of the men and, after a generation or two they believe it to be their duty. They apparently enjoy this sacrifice in order that they may make their Nation more powerful in a military way. If free speech, free press, and the right to speak one's mind or to criticize even in a very modest way, is suppressed, the person who has lived through that life passes it off on the theory that the command comes from those who can do no wrong.

That result will come to us just as surely as we start on a national course that has nothing but military supremacy for its object and yet we are face to face with that kind of a picture. When we have to meet a demon like Hitler with the power he possessess, there is nothing else for us to do. If those who do not want England to win have their way, and we go on with our military preparations and arm ourselves so we can defy the world, that is one of the dangers which will face us and we cannot avoid it.

To my mind this is one of the greatest dangers which we face today. I cannot see how it can be avoided because we are faced with an enemy powerful and strong and it is generally conceded that we must meet him some day on the battlefield. It seems plain that, even at the risk of war which will not extend, so far as I can see, to the sending of an army to foreign lands but will be confined to warfare upon the seas and in the air, it will be far better to take that chance than to see England fall and thus automatically compel us to go through the preparation which will be necessary to meet the foe at a later date.

But will helping England win bring us into the war? We have already done many things which could be taken by Hitler as a justification for war upon us, but does he want us in the war now? Is it sensible to think he wants to add to his enemies in the desperate struggle now going on in Europe?

It seems reasonable to say that, regardless of the course we take, he will avoid war with us if it is possible. At the present time, he does not want to add to his belligerent enemies and, therefore, aid to England does not necessarily mean that we will become engaged in the war itself and, even if we do, it is improbable that we will send an army of American soldiers to foreign lands. The war which will come if England falls, and which everybody admits will follow, will mean that our soldiers will be sent all over South America.

It seems plain and reasonable and the probabilities are that, if through our aid to England, we get into war, it will not follow that we will send an army to fight on European soil. It is practically a certainty, if we follow the course of those who are willing to let England go down that, later, we will have to send thousands, and perhaps millions, of our boys to South and Central America to fight Hitler there. If England is saved, and Hitler is defeated, the probabilities are that no American boy will lose his life on foreign soil. If England falls, and Hitler wins, it is almost a certainty that our soldiers will die in untold numbers in practically every country of South America.

We are told by those of our countrymen who oppose further aid to Great Britain that the example of the last World War illustrates that, in the end, aid to England does not mean the saving of democracy in the world. It is said we were deceived then and made to believe we were fighting a war to save democracy, but that, as a matter of fact, the fighting of that war did not mean any safety for democracy. I believe there is truth in this assertion. We were, in my opinion, unjustified in entering the last World War, but conditions which confronted us then have no similarity to the conditions which confront us now. At that time there was still honor among nations and men, even though they were enemies upon the battlefield. The enslavement of peoples was not then at stake. There was no likelihood then that the life of our own Nation, as well as that of every other democracy in the world, would be endangered, no matter what the outcome of the war might be. There was no claim or belief in the mind of anyone that, if Germany won that war, it would be followed by a war in this hemisphere. Our liberties, and the freedom of our people, were not involved. However, in this war, we are confronted with an enemy whose ambitions are known to the world and that means the destruction of every democracy in the world and, since we are the largest of those democracies, it means more to us than to any other country.

The democracies are confronted with an enemy whose avowed purpose of destruction and enslavement of our people is but thinly veiled if it is indeed covered at all. The same pagan philosophies he applied in the conquering of the weak and peaceful nations of Europe apply with equal force to our own. We are confronted with an enemy who has thrown international law to the winds—who openly avows that the German people are superior to any other people on earth and that it is their destiny to conquer and rule the earth. His methods are disreputable, dishonorable, and deceitful. The ruin which will follow his victory would bring destruction and suffering to most of the human race where liberty prevails and freedom is enthroned. It means slavery to the conquered nations. To us, it means a life which would be worse than death. Everything we hold dear, everything for which we have struggled for more than a century, is at stake, and although we may be innocent, our innocence will avail us nothing. Although we may be blameless, that will not save us from destruction and from slavery if Hitler conquers. His success means that the Christian religion will be wiped off the face of the earth and that freedom of speech, freedom of the press, freedom of assembly, and freedom of petition will fade out of our lives forever.

Those who oppose further aid to England point to her long history and say she has been guilty of conquering other nations without just cause. A fair study of English history must convince us that there is much truth in this charge. If the same charge were made against our own country, I think, in honesty, we, ourselves, would have to plead guilty. If the sins of the past are to be charged up to those who want a higher and a better life, then all hope of future happiness and joy for the people of this world must vanish.

In this struggle no one has claimed that those who are defending liberty and justice are themselves entirely free from sin but England has made great progress along the road toward greater democracy. We, ourselves, fought her in the Revolutionary War to obtain our own freedom and, yet, the world knows that today the people in England, and her possessions, are enjoying liberties which compare very favorably with those we enjoy here. The world today acknowledges that England and the United States are the two outstanding nations where freedom and liberty are respected more than in any other countries. Moreover, recent events have shown the honesty of British pledges and that a greater freedom and a happier way of life will follow the defeat of Hitler's misguided followers.

Our own country has already acknowledged that exterritoriality in China will cease when this war is over. That step will be a bright page in American history. England has already announced that, when Hitler is conquered, a fuller life of liberty, freedom, and justice will come to the millions in far away India. That, too, is another step showing an upward and onward march of British sentiment toward the rightful enjoyment of life which should come to the people of India. Those acknowledgements from our own country and from Great Britain should fill the heart of every human being who loves freedom and liberty with pride and joy. That those promises will be kept no one doubts. They shine like bright stars in the earth's firmament, showing conclusively that a higher and better life will be the object of these two great world powers in the future.

Taking it all in all, it seems that, if England wins, and Hitler is defeated, the lessons she has learned, and the lessons we have learned from our own suffering, are going far toward establishing a universal sentiment all over the civilized world for the obliteration of wrongs and for the upbuilding of a universal sentiment in favor of greater justice, a higher life, and a greater brotherhood of man.

It seems to me, in concluding my remarks, I should say something about the peace which should follow the overthrow of Hitlerism. In the last World War the victorious nations, including our own, exacted a humiliating surrender from our enemy. It was, in my opinion, an unjust peace which was imposed upon the German people. It was as humiliating as it was possible to make it. The doctrine of an "eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth" was applied. The treaty of Versailles was not only humiliating to the vanquished but it was disgraceful on the part of the conquerors. The victorious nations demanded from their foe financial impossibilities. That treaty engendered a sentiment of revenge which has had its effect in establishing in power such a man as Hitler. The peace which should follow the destruction of Hitler and his pagan philosophy of government should be one which would give prominence to the liberality of the conqueror in the day of his victory. There should be no reparations or indemnities. This may look like a concession on the part of the victors. Considering past history, it would be a concession, but one we should be willto make if we desire to preserve a world of perpetual peace. The treaty should recognize the fact that it is impossible for any nation, conquered or otherwise, to meet in financial language the payment for the destruction which has been brought about by Hitler's warfare. Even the subjection of the conquered peoples to perpetual slavery could never compensate in money for the damage Hitler has done to the world and to world civilization. This is a debt a revitalized world ought to be willing should never be paid—first, because it is impossible; and, second, because it would be unjust and mean the sentencing of the conquered people to a life of servitude.

The peace treaty should provide for the complete disarmament of Germany. Their submarines should be sunk to the bottom of the sea, their battleships destroyed, and their munition factories razed to the ground. Their bombing machines should likewise be destroyed, and their forts and arsenals dismantled and completely obliterated. The treaty should provide for the complete restoration of every one of the nations Hitler has taken. This should be followed by promises on the part of the victors so that, as soon as peace is completely restored and Germany totally disarmed, a repetition of his disastrous campaign for destruction is made impossible. Both England and the restored nations should be called together in conference and an earnest effort made to bring about disarmament the world over. If the world is disarmed, everlasting world peace will follow. If there had not been this race for supremacy of armament among the nations of the earth, the World War would have been impossible and complete disarmament would be a cure for future wars. An arbitration administered by impartial courts of justice the world over would mean that future generations, although saddled with a debt it will take generations to pay, will nevertheless enjoy freedom, liberty, and a way of life which will bring happiness, comfort, and joy to all the world. In a few years the doctrine of hate would disappear and it would be replaced by a brotherhood of man which would be followed by confidence in each other on the part of all the nations of the world. Hatred of Germany, hatred of France, hatred everywhere would disappear from the minds of men, and people all over the world would soon learn the truth of the divine injunction "It is more blessed to give than to receive."

The victors at the peace table will have an opportunity to perform an act which would take away from the minds of men the idea that war has a place in the world, and rule by force would in time become a thing known only to students of ancient history. It is that kind of a peace which should follow this world catastrophe and it is that kind of a peace which will follow if the victors are moved by sentiments of mercy and of human love. Our Nation should take a leading part at the peace table when that time comes. We should be willing to sacrifice whatever may be necessary to bring about such an international condition. I have no doubt but that we can take a leading part in that peace conference. It will bring to the peoples of the earth the greatest satisfaction that has ever been theirs to enjoy. It will bring to every American citizen a pride in the fact that our own country has been a leader in bringing about such a peace. In the midst of a disarmed world, with our flag floating in the breeze, we could unite in repeating the words of our own great poet:

> "Thou, too, sail on, O Ship of State!
> Sail on, O Union, strong and great!
> Humanity with all its fears,
> With all the hopes of future years,
> Is hanging breathless on thy fate!"

Supplying Food to People of Belgium and Other European Nations

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ARTHUR CAPPER
OF KANSAS
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 16 (legislative day of Tuesday, June 10), 1941

ADDRESS BY HON. ARTHUR CAPPER, OF KANSAS

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered by me over radio station WIBW on June 8, 1941, urging our State Department to arrange with England and Germany to allow limited supplies of food for the suffering people of Belgium and other European people threatened with starvation as a result of the blockade of practically all Europe.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Friends in the radio audience, I was 1 of 37 Senators who last week joined in sponsoring the resolution urging our own State Department to arrange with England and Germany to allow limited supplies of food for the starving people of Belgium and other continental European peoples threatened with starvation as the result of the blockade of practically all Eurcpe.

Leaving aside for the moment the humanitarian problem involved, I seriously question the effectiveness of this blockade in aiding England to win its war with the Axis Powers. The blockade was intended to starve out Germany, as was done in the previous World War. Terrible as it is to contemplate starving women and children and the aged of a nation in order to compel the fighting men at the front to capitulate—that is war. Under the stern necessities of war, it is regarded as justifiable, in fact as necessary—if and when it can be done.

But from what we can learn, in this war England is not starving Germany, with whom she is at war, but the Belgians, British allies, and the French, who were Britain's allies, and peoples of other nations who either were allied to or friendly toward the cause of Britain.

In the last war Germany and Austria, completely encircled by land and sea, were unable to draw foodstuff from the rest of the world. So the British blockade was an effective blockade against Germany.

In this war Germany is not encircled. She is getting foodstuffs from Russia, from the rest of the continent of Europe. True, she is doing this ruthlessly but she is doing it. With all of continental Europe and Russia to draw from, the German people are going to be the last ones in Europe to feel the pinch of starvation.

Now, just suppose you lived in conquered Europe, and knew that the people of the United States were able and willing to supply you and your children and your neighbors with some foods at least—milk and food particularly for your children. And suppose a blockade was maintained against you by a military power with which you were not at war. If that condition continues over a period of 2 years, or 3, or maybe 10 years—I ask you, what would be the attitude toward the blockading country?

We have seen what is happening in France; France is turning against England. I very much fear that the net effect may be to turn all Europe against the British cause—while Germany gets enough to eat, despite the blockade.

In the last war Herbert Hoover was able to work out a program by which the starving women and children of Belgium were saved from starvation. And there was general agreement then that the program worked; that none of the food from America sent to Belgium got into German hands or was of material assistance to the cause of Germany or of material detriment to the cause of the Allies. At that time Britain and France not only acquiesced in the Belgian program, but assisted in every way to make it effective.

Today the exiled Belgian Government in London is pleading with the British Government to allow a limited supply of foodstuffs, principally milk for children, to be allowed to go through the blockade to these hapless people.

Today the small democratic nations of Europe—the democracies whose cause Britain is fighting; the cause for which we have become the arsenal of democracy—are under the heels of the conqueror. These peoples, allies of Britain, resisted to the limit against the onrush of German might. Their peoples are suffering from malnutrition; they face starvation after the coming harvest.

John Cudahy, former ambassador to Belgium from the United States, in a recent issue of Life magazine, paints a touching picture of what is happening to the children of Belgium.

"There is something revolting and depraved in the spectacle of suffering inflicted upon a child," says Mr. Cudahy. "It is like witnessing the slapping of a blind man's face (only worse) and I felt hurt and grieved and bitterly resentful.

"Brussels is a city of walking wraiths, but Dr. Noll told me his main worry was not about grown people. What concerned him above all was the blighting effect upon the rising generation who could never grow without the materials for growth and who, because they could not get these materials, were rapidly developing deficiency diseases like rickets, edema, partial blindness, bronchial pneumonia, tuberculosis, pellagra, eczema, and anemia."

Mr. Cudahy's description of conditions is simply appalling. Surely, there is something we can do about it.

The American Committee on Food for the Small Democracies recently made a proposal for a trial feeding in Belgium by which 3,000,000 children, women, and unemployed men would be fed from soup kitchens. This would require monthly 25,000 tons of breadstuffs, and 20,000 tons of meats, fats, beans, peas, and rice for soup materials and milk and cocoa for children.

The Germans have agreed to furnish the soup kitchens, 25,000 tons of breastuffs monthly, to refrain from requisitioning imported and native food supplies, and not to attack mercy ships.

The exiled Belgian Government has strongly urged the British Government to give the program a trial, and has offered to finance it. The trial feeding would be administered by a neutral commission. Only small quantities would be imported into Belgium at a time. If the German Government disregarded its pledges—it generally was agreed it did not disregard its food pledges in Belgium in the last war—the imports could be stopped immediately.

The resolution which I sponsored jointly with the other Senators respectfully urges that the Secretary of State endeavor as quickly as possible to work out, in cooperation with the British Government and the other governments concerned, the setting up of food relief administrations for the small democracies, beginning with the trial in Belgium. I think we should by all means do this. Let the United States send some milk and soups and foods to Europe; not only implements of death and destruction and terror.

You might be interested to know who the Senators are sponsoring this action. A third of them, by the way, are not interventionists, but voted for the lease-lend bill. Here they are: Senators THOMAS of Oklahoma; AIKEN, of Vermont; ANDREWS, of Florida; BALL, of Minnesota; BANKHEAD, of Alabama; BARBOUR, of New Jersey; BILBO, of Mississippi; BREWSTER, of Maine; BROOKS, of Illinois; BROWN, of Michigan; BULOW, of South Dakota; BURTON, of Ohio; BUTLER, of Nebraska; CHAVEZ, of New Mexico; CLARK of Idaho; DANAHER, of Connecticut; DAVIS, of Pennsylvania; GILLETTE, of Iowa; HOLMAN, of Oregon; JOHNSON, of Colorado; LA FOLLETTE, of Wisconsin; MCCARRAN, of Nevada; MALONEY, of Connecticut; NYE, of North Dakota; REED, of Kansas; REYNOLDS, of North Carolina; SHIPSTEAD, of Minnesota; SMITH, of South Carolina; TAFT, of Ohio; THOMAS of Idaho; TOBEY, of New Hampshire; VANDENBERG, of Michigan; WALSH, of Massachusetts; WHEELER, of Montana; WILEY, of Wisconsin; WILLIS, of Indiana; and CAPPER, of Kansas.

I say this program worked out by Mr. Hoover and his committee should be given a trial. As you know, I hate war, but above and beyond that, I abhor and cringe from helping make war on helpless children, women, and aged people through starvation which is death by slow torture.

Fraudulent Freedoms

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RUFUS C. HOLMAN

OF OREGON

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 16 (legislative day of Tuesday, June 10), 1941

ADDRESS BY HON. GERALD P. NYE, OF NORTH DAKOTA

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, an able, appropriate, and patriotic address delivered by the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE] on Thursday evening, June 12, 1941, on the subject of Fraudulent Freedoms.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Now you see it, now you don't.

For weeks and weeks our country has been beset with no end of contradictions and with fears which have countenanced all manner of conclusions.

One cannot view the siege through which we have come without concluding that there is large ground upon which to build a belief that the greatest "come on" game of all time has been played upon Americans, with trickery leading us to goals undefined. We find the little ball under one shell and then the other, but never know where it might be at the moment. Our people have been taken for a ride in a game of guessing, until the Nation stands utterly bewildered in its inability to tie to anything.

The interventionists, aided by the administration in force, have been for weeks striving to sell the American people the theory that without America's full out war aid, England, the British Empire, and the British Navy were doomed to destruction. Then along comes Ambassador Winant fresh from London, as reported in the New York Herald Tribune of June 8, with the word that the British can win without America in the war. This declaration allegedly was made in the presence of five leading Senate Democrats, and has not been denied. The fact that the interview was not generally reported by the press is probably good evidence that it was not considered proper for the American people to know what were the observations of men close to the scene of pressure in London.

Then on the next day came the announcement by former Ambassador to Belgium John Cudahy, asserting upon his return from Europe that if the present World War is not pushed to a military decision by October that the world is in for another 30-year war.

Then, too, and while the Nation was entertaining the fear that had been planted, to the effect that a new dominance in Europe was going to mean the end of American foreign trade—then comes Bernard Baruch, an outstanding business authority, with the most emphatic declaration that come what will abroad so far as totalitarian strength is concerned, the United States can undersell the totalitarians in the world markets, and that Germany is the one that would be on the spot economically if she won the war.

All of this from such immediately prominent sources of necessity drives a people to wonder what in the world has all of this recent siege by the Cabinet, by Willkie, by the columnists, really meant—these programs of throwing fear broadcast over the land and driving the Nation ever nearer to war. Are we simply trying to start a fight, or are we wanting to emulate the drunk who found his pal in the gutter, and failing every effort to lift him up, declared: "I can't get you out of there but I can get in with you."

It becomes more obvious daily to Americans that things are probably not as they have been made to seem to be by those who have been leading America down the path to involvement in Europe's war. The causes and purposes which these leaders enunciate more and more lend themselves to the charge of fraud. We have been told about the freedoms which the United States was bound to defend, to carry to all the world. The lead-up, or come-on, to the lend-lease bill last January was the President's address to Congress in which he proclaimed it American duty to carry to all the world, in our time and generation, freedom of speech, freedom of worship, freedom from want, and freedom from fear. Minister Eden of Great Britain was quick to pick up this call to duty as being the cause for which Britain was fighting. It is fair to assume that Mr. Eden was entertaining as many mental reservations concerning these freedoms as the President was entertaining when he declared for them.

But more recently comes a fifth freedom about which much has been said since the chat by President Roosevelt some 2 weeks ago, which has been referred to in some circles as the fire-alarm chat. Freedom of the seas returns to us once again as the challenge of the hour. Just how many wars have been fought to win freedom of the seas without winning it does not now matter. The truth is that in our time and generation a war was fought for that lofty cause by a people who somehow failed to forget that freedom of the seas was not an accomplished fact, even though we had won the war. But here it is again. Freedom of the seas, thrust at Americans as a challenge which Americans must meet.

Again comes Minister Eden, echoing "freedom of the seas" as a cause for which Great Britain was fighting, and we would fight, if only we would aid Great Britain in her present struggle. I am not at all surprised that Premier Churchill did not himself choose to echo the President's call to arms in the name of "freedom of the seas," for, for him to do that would have been to make of himself the laughingstock of the world, in light of his own attitude on the subject of "freedom of the seas" when it was presented as an issue for decision following the World War.

Any call to arms beside Great Britain in the name of "freedom of the seas" is fraudulent. The World War was brought to an end with President Wilson's 14 points as the basis for consideration. Even before the armistice was signed these points were being weighed. Foremost among the points was President Wilson's demand for a war settlement that would insure freedom of the seas. The Allies played with President Wilson on this point and finally denied it a chance for life. David Lloyd George, in his Memoirs of the Peace Conference most emphatically demonstrated that the last thing in the world that Britain would tolerate would be freedom of the seas. Writing in 1929 in his book entitled "The Aftermath," Winston Churchill declared that Lloyd George was absolutely right when, during the peace discussions, he turned his back upon freedom of the seas as presented by Woodrow Wilson. So clearly was it demonstrated then that neither England nor France would tolerate freedom of the seas that it seems to me to be rank fraud today for any spokesman for Britain, such as Eden, to be successfully selling us the idea that Britain might today be for freedom of the seas.

What Britain wants is what she has had for centuries, not freedom of the seas, but dominance and sovereignty of the seas, that condition which has kept Europe in constant turmoil, that condition which has been costly to the tradesmen of America in their undertakings to enjoy world trade.

When Mr. Eden, or any other British spokesman undertakes to put his country in the light of favoring freedom of the seas, Americans will do well to conclude that there is a big colored youngster somewhere in the wood pile and that America will do well to approach with greatest caution that precipice to which these representations would lead us. It should not be possible for Britain to fool the American people on this score and I cannot believe that Britain can fool President Roosevelt on it either.

When we were through with our last experience with Europe, we came to discover how utterly fraudulent were the representations of causes for which we thought then we were fighting. That fact undoubtedly contributes largely in this hour to what the interventionists call the apathy of the American people toward the war in Europe. It is not apathy in any sense, it is simply plain good judgment that the American people are exercising when they let experience, rather than propaganda, be their teacher. The American people will be the first to fight for principles which are declared to be involved in this present conflict, when the people can know that those principles really are the causes involved in the war. There has as yet been no representation that clearly demonstrates that the causes allegedly involved are the real causes, or are causes that can be won. That is why the American people are standing so steadfastly by their resolve against any step that will involve us actively in Europe's present war.

Magnificent has been the way in which the American people have stood up against the blitzkrieg of expression that was obviously intended to lead America all the way into the war. The manner in which they have made themselves heard by official Washington has been an eloquent compliment to the intelligence of the American people. The manner in which the administration here in Washington has checked what appeared to be the march to war is a tribute to the success of our democracy when its people will but make themselves heard.

But we must not now assume that the challenge is ended, for we must know from what we see day after day, that the cause of the interventionist is being constantly organized and pushed, seemingly with a view that ultimately the hour will come when our Government can be moved directly into the war. Some of the newspaper columnists are clearly revealing what is in the mind of the interventionists. One of these columns, unusually sympathetic to the cause of intervention, and especially close to the White House, has this week been daily pressuring the President into immediate action. This column in reporting the President's answer to those advisors who are urging him to act at once, reports that the President "always recurs to the case of his former chief, Woodrow Wilson."

"President Wilson, he points out, was far better placed when he led the Nation into the first World War. A succession of incidents, in which American lives were taken and American property was lost, had inflamed public opinion over many months. The debate on the armed merchantmen bill had revealed an almost united Congress. There were only 12 in the little band of willful men whose Senate filibuster forced Wilson to arm the merchantmen on his own authority. In the end, when Wilson went to Congress and requested a declaration of war, he could be certain that every dissident voice would be drowned out by the roar of enthusiasm from a truly United States."

"Against the case of Wilson, the President then lays his own. While admitting he can count on majority support, and by crystallizing public feeling may make the majority extremely substantial, he remarks that the unshakable minority is both well organized and hysterically violent. This minority, he adds, is enough larger in Congress than the opposition to Wilson to carry on an interminable and highly dangerous filibuster against proposals for action of any sort. Resort to Congress is useless. Therefore, he says, he cannot act without the pretext of an incident, preferably a German attack on an American ship in the Atlantic, which will pull the country together and simultaneously permit him to order the Navy to fight back.

"The President's reasoning is undoubtedly correct."

Now, I submit that if these columnists are truthful in their representation to the effect that a strategy is being resorted to that is dependent upon the sinking of an American ship, and the loss of American lives, I say now that any strategy which would provoke the loss of American lives in order to take an unwilling people to war is so base, so cowardly, and so immoral that it ought have no place in American thought.

I cannot and do not believe the representation of these writers respecting the attitude of the President, but there ought to be at once a quick repudiation by the President and his administration of any contention that such strategy is an administration proposition or thought.

I submit that this is the hour when Americans can ill afford to be resting on their oars and assuming that the danger of our being moved into this war has lessened to a point that warrants a ceasing of the forceful manner in which the American people have been making themselves heard in their opposition to involvement in Europe's war. Eternal vigilance is the price of our liberties. And our liberties are going to be worth little or naught if we can again be prevailed upon to waste our lives and our resources for others who would never consider doing for us what they seem to expect us to do for them. We need in this hour to be applying to our own country the thought which British statesmen apply to their country. This thought was best expressed by Lord Palmerston when he said: "England has no eternal enmities, and no eternal friendships. She has only eternal interests."

America's place in this hour, when so many fraudulent causes are being dangled before our eyes, is to religiously stay out of that war, preserve our resources, maintain as large a degree of solvency as is possible, to the end that when the hour of exhaustion comes to Europe, we can be the anchor and the helping hand that the world is going to so desperately need if it is to be saved from worse than war.

Citizenship as a Living Legacy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALEXANDER WILEY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 16 (legislative day of Tuesday, June 10), 1941

ADDRESS BY HON. ALEXANDER WILEY OF WISCONSIN

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered by me on June 8, 1941, at Racine, Wis., on the subject of Citizenship as a Living Legacy.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Chairman, honored guests, and fellow-Americans, we meet today to observe Citizenship Day. We are not meeting on the day officially designated by the Chief Executive for this purpose, but we realize that in a larger sense our observance of the privileges and the obligations of citizenship must be a daily reconsecration, and it is fitting and right that on this Sabbath we should covenant our citizenship here in Racine, particularly, where the children and the grandchildren of those who fled from the tyrannies and oppressions of central and eastern Europe have learned to prize their American citizenship so highly.

Racine has been a mixture of many bloodstreams. The Americans of this city since the turn of the century can trace their forbears to at least 14 racial or national groups largely from the peoples of northern and central Europe.

RACINE A MONUMENT TO CITIZENSHIP

It is almost presumptuous for me to speak of citizenship here in Racine where your city itself is a living monument to citizenship in this land.

Your city, with its smokestacks and water towers and church steeples, silhouetted against the sky, is also a living memorial to your forbears who came here and envisioned in this land of opportunity under the priceless privileges of American citizenship, the possibility for building a great city.

Long before the city's great influx of immigrants, there were men who jerked out the oak stumps from the middle of Main Street. They were the men who incorporated Racine in 1841. They were the men who constructed your harbor in 1844 and chartered your city in 1848. They were the men who raised your wheat and built your wheat warehouses.

They were the men who created your factories, and they were the men who greeted the new citizens who flooded Racine in the 1850's. They were the men who extended the hand of opportunity to the immigrants as they filtered into Racine.

They were the men who founded your newspapers, your charities, your churches. They were the men who created great industries, great mills, great factories, and, what is infinitely more important, a race of great men and great women, strong in body, mind, and soul.

RACINE'S IMMIGRANTS BECAME GOOD AMERICANS AND MADE CONTRIBUTIONS

I think it is vital in these days, when we need tolerance so badly, that we remember that Racine gave America great men from its hardy stock of foreign-born Americans—men who gave their every allegiance to the land of their adoption—America, the land of opportunity.

In the yellowed pages of the old record books of the Racine County courthouse, you will find the name of one of these immigrants who made an outstanding contribution to American life. His name is Col. Hans Christian Heg, and here in Racine I need not retell the story of his life, because in the words inscribed on his tombstone in the Norway Hill Cemetery, "He who dies for country, dies not, but liveth evermore."

These men and scores of others whose forebears came from other lands made a great contribution to American life and they compensate us for those aliens who abuse our hospitality and spread subversive foreign "isms."

It is not alone the great men who have made a contribution, however. The average immigrant woman, who came to Racine with her peasant shawl clutched about her bent shoulders, who reared her sons strong, and straight, and tall, and with a fervent allegiance to America—that peasant woman and her humble peasant husband—they, too, made a great contribution to America.

NO PLACE IN AMERICAN LIFE FOR HATREDS, INJUSTICE, AND INTOLERANCE

Today we hear a great deal about race hatred. Actually that is not the correct use of the word "race." In reality the term would be nationality hatred. Totalitarian leaders have capitalized on race hatred, because through it they can create blind, unthinking quarrels.

There must never be race hatred in the United States. Lincoln said, "A house divided against itself cannot stand." We cannot adopt any of the European patterns for living. We cannot subscribe to race hatred.

We do not believe in pogroms. We do not believe in blood purges. We do not believe in torturing the people of any race. We are all Americans. We are all of one race. As Walt Whitman said: "Come, I will make the continent indissoluble. I will make the most splendid race the sun ever shown upon." And I believe we are doing that, you and I. We are building a new great race called American, without hatred, intolerance, and injustice.

I mention the varied racial origins of many of the Americans in Racine today because on Citizenship Day our citizenship observances are directed particularly at the newly naturalized alien and at the new citizen who has just reached the age of 21.

Our new citizens number about two and one-half million. There are two groups of new citizens. The largest group consists of native-born Americans who have reached the age of 21, and as such are entitled to the privilege of the franchise. Some of these new citizens may have been descendants of the 24,000,000 immigrants who came to the United States in the past 50 years and some of them may have descended from Mayflower stock.

NATURALIZED CITIZENS HAVE TO PROVE RIGHT TO CITIZENSHIP

The second group of new citizens is the group of those men and women who have won their citizenship through the naturalization process. That group usually numbers about 300,000. These are the men and women who did not achieve citizenship as the rightful heritage of free-born Americans. They had to prove their fitness to assume the obligations and the rights of citizenship. The largest portion of these groups have attended some type of naturalization school in order that they might secure information which would enable them to become good citizens.

In recent years applicants from almost every country in the world have flooded our naturalization offices with applications. During the 6 months' period from July 1 to December 1, 1940, there was a monthly average of 37,922 applications for first papers, and during that same time we had a monthly average of 46,154 applications for second papers.

At the present time there are fewer aliens in this country than there were three decades ago. At the present time we have a smaller percentage of aliens that we have ever had in the history of the United States, and there is every reason to believe that this alien population will decrease as time goes on.

CITIZENSHIP CEREMONIES A MILESTONE FOR FOREIGN-BORN CITIZEN

For those of you who are becoming citizens through the process of naturalization, these ceremonies represent a definite milestone in your lives. After an alien has satisfied a court that he will make a good and faithful citizen he is required to take an oath of allegiance to the United States.

I feel very keenly that the newly naturalized citizen must recognize in every fiber of his being the privilege of American citizenship because, in his mind's eye, he can still see the oppression and the tyranny of the Old World; and in his ears still ring the anguished cries of those who have cringed under the whiplash of pillage of tyranny in other lands.

For the newly naturalized citizen, then, our primary task must be the educational task of explaining fully the obligations and the rights of American citizenship.

FOR NATIVE-BORN CITIZEN WE HAVE TO DISPEL IDEA OF TAKING CITIZENSHIP FOR GRANTED

For the native-born American who has turned 21 and assumes the mantle of American citizenship, we have a somewhat similar task, but here we have also the task of dispelling the mental inertia whereby too many of our young people have taken American citizenship for granted.

For too long have we accepted our citizenship unthinkingly. That is why Congress passed a resolution requesting the President to issue annually an I Am An American Day proclamation.

Wisconsin pioneered in the field of citizenship training, and partly as a result of Wisconsin efforts Congress passed legislation, approved on May 3, 1940, which resulted in the issuance of a proclamation by the President of I Am An American Day.

This movement began originally with the community-wide celebrations, resulting from county-wide educational programs to teach new voters the organization, function, and operation of their local government in relation to the State and National Governments. The citizenship classes also sought to teach new citizens the rights, privileges, and duties of American citizenship. The entire program has been a sincere educational effort to prepare the new citizen for active, intelligent participation in government.

CITIZENSHIP OBSERVANCES EQUIP YOUNG CITIZENS WITH UNDERSTANDING TO MEET PROBLEMS UP AHEAD

Through the citizenship-day observances and their accompanying educational programs it is possible to equip our young citizens with a background of understanding, so that they can intelligently make up their own minds when they face the Gethsemane that is ahead for this generation—a Gethsemane where they will select the method they believe most effective in preserving the rightful heritage of every free-born American.

I was a member of the two-man Senate Judiciary Subcommittee to consider this legislation to authorize the President to proclaim a national citizenship day each year on the third Sunday in May. Our subcommittee gladly voted the bill favorably to the full Judiciary Committee, and the measure was favorably reported by the full committee.

The patriotic principles and the impressive ceremonies marking "Citizenship Day" represent a vital contribution to our national life. Through the educational program and through the ceremonies, where the new citizens officially embrace their American franchise and pledge allegiance to our Nation, we emphasize a covenant to use sacredly the rights of the franchise for the perpetuation of the ideals and the traditions of our Republic.

The days up ahead will be days requiring intelligent, active participation in the affairs of government by informed, enlightened citizens, who feel keenly their responsibilities and their interests in our Government.

Of course, the idea commemorating citizenship is not new in this generation. We know that more than 2,000 years ago, in Athens, there were examinations and ceremonies for the young men who reached the age of 18, at which time they received a kind of probationary cititzenship for 2 years. During this period they became ephebe. They took the ephebic oath, and that oath contained a number of pledges. One of these pledges read: "I will hand on my country greater and better than I found it." That pledge is, in a sense, still implied in our citizenship observances and it is a magnificent challenge to youth.

There were other countries where similar ceremonies were held, and it may be said that from earliest times most peoples have created a tradition for the person who becomes of age and who assumes the obligations of participating in community life.

WHAT IS CITIZENSHIP?

Today we know that in a world of chaos, an observance such as this is particularly important. It raises the important question: What is citizenship?

It is a privilege, an obligation, and a right.

We may have our differences as citizens about the great issues of the day—that is a healthy sign; but on the great question of loyalty to America there is no room for difference. In these perilous times there is no place in America for traitors or "fifth columnists."

If war should come—and I pray God that will never be—then there must be no division of loyalty. We stem from many bloodstreams. But our forbears and those who came here to join with us—we are all now a new and different breed, called the American.

This American breed of freemen cast off the shackles of Europe—its race hatreds, its limitations, its outmoded political theories, its Machiavellian diplomacy; and in their place we have freedom, equality of opportunity, and our own way of life.

HOW CAN WE PRACTICE OUR CITIZENSHIP?

How shall we practice this loyalty to our be'oved land—America?

1. We should study and learn to know and love its Constitution, its Bill of Rights. I wish I had time to enlarge on this idea—it is all important.

2. We should practice industry, loyalty, and love of our fellow Americans. We must dwell together as brethren. Are we not Americans?

3. We should appreciate our significant job of citizenship. Included therein is the privilege and obligation to protect our great freedoms—freedom of speech, freedom of press, freedom of worship, trial by jury, the right to sell our own labor and collect our own wages, the right to own property, etc. They obtain no other place on the globe. They are ours to enjoy, to preserve, and to hand down unimpaired to future generations.

4. We should learn to be tolerant of those who differ with us in politics, in religion, in all fields of human knowledge. It is well to get acquainted with your fellow citizen who thinks differently. When you do that you will find in most cases he is a fine fellow. No mortal has a monopoly on truth.

5. We should develop in ourselves a sense of orderly living, realizing that as a people we have not solved all our problems. We have social, economic, and political problems to solve. In America we believe in the law of growth. It is for us to meet the tasks of the present head-on, and by our conduct set an example for those who come after.

6. We should have faith—faith in this great people we are a part of; faith in America's future. We should cast out the defeatist. Let no one divide us. We have but one allegiance, and that is to this America of ours.

7. We should have vision—not clouded by distrust or fear, but lifted high so we can see that this is the promised land of freemen. It was and is the cradle of freedom. What a glorious task you and I have as sons and daughters of this great land—some by birth, some by adoption—to watch over and preserve her.

8. In these perilous times we must make sure that all smugness and complacency are cast out and that we are alert and ready to meet whatever would tend to undermine America. Let us get into the habit of praising her, loving her, sensing her true meaning. The opportunity is here for growth, for development, for national prosperity, for building the greatest race of men ever known to earth. The saboteur and the defeatist must be cast out. Each of us must become a builder. Like Nehemiah of old, we must be so busy with our job of building the walls of America that we will not be diverted by propaganda or any other means from our task.

9. There are many other ways of practicing loyalty to America. Become acquainted with her history, of the march of a people across a continent; become acquainted with her literature, her poetry; become acquainted with her geography, her lakes, her streams, her mountains, her prairies, her art, her music, her inventions, her tremendous development of material wealth; become acquainted with her schools and colleges, her museums and churches, her homes and her people.

But all these things are but the material symbol of her spiritual reality. Greater than the soil itself that we live on, greater than the wealth that we as a people have produced, greater than all her institutions, is this thing we are all a part of. In that great song, America the Beautiful, there is an indication of what I am driving at.

In other lands there is a blitzkrieg on freedom and a black-out of democracy. To prevent that in the United States it is vital that we continue to instill traditional American ideals in our new voters as a reaffirmation of our faith in America and her ways.

CITIZENSHIP MUST BE A LIVING LEGACY

Citizenship must be a living thing. Democracy must be dynamic. The ideals of our republic must live and grow.

Our way of life cannot stand still. There is no retreat. We must go on building.

These impressive ceremonies today dramatize citizenship. To all of you who have just attained your majority, I can say that twenty-one years ago the United States was entering upon a decade which was to see unparalleled prosperity.

That decade of prosperity brought us to a period of material plenty. It brought us a material feast, but a spiritual famine.

It brought us fruitful prosperity, but in another sense it was a barren and sterile era.

It was a "blue chip" age. It was the age of "big bull market." We put our trust in material things. The intellectuals of the country—and some of them are the very writers who today talk loudest about patriotism—laughed at Fourth of July speakers. They called patriotic speeches "flag waving" and "tub-thumping."

We were living in the aftermath of the post-war neurosis. It was an age of jazz and flappers. We had plenty of material resources, but limited spiritual resources. When the crash came, when the material resources were gone, we had little on which to fall back.

I am gratified that today we are leaving that adolescent stage when the intellectuals were ashamed of patriotism. I am happy and proud that today we are again "coming of age" in the sense that we revere patriotism as it should be revered.

WE MUST GO BACK TO FIRST PRINCIPLES

Today we must go back to first principles. Today, in our citizenship program, we must do everything we can to restore the health of our social organism through faith in God and faith in the great destiny of this Nation.

We have a hard road to travel up ahead. It will not be a road of ease and luxury. The task confronting the citizens of America today will not be an easy one. And yet, I find some consolation in that very fact, because I feel that, with few exceptions, America has always emerged from periods of crisis stronger and finer than ever before.

I feel that tomorrow's citizens may be stronger and better, because we have to meet the challenges of these times. Because there will be challenges, we will strengthen our moral fiber so that we can meet them. We will make sacrifices to safeguard our freedoms, and our form of government will be dynamic and growing. Great challenges and critical times produce great men.

Holland said:

"God, give us men! A time like this demands Strong minds, great hearts, true faith, and ready hands."

These are days when the field of citizenship is expanding. As the interest of our citizens in Government expands, there will be fewer pressure groups to lead us up blind alleys, and there will be fewer political profiteers.

WE CAN SPIN OUR OWN WEB OF DESTINY

It is true that to a degree we are ensnared and involved by circumstances in the web of our destiny, but even more is it true that we can spin our own web of destiny.

There are more than 130,000,000 people in America, and yet there are only 80,000,000 possible votes. Only 49,000,000 people voted in the last Presidential election. This is a challenge. We need not believe that the only challenges which confront our way of life are those challenges which can be met by men in uniform.

There are other challenges which meet us in our daily lives as citizens of the United States. When we become citizens it is our obligation to use the sacred right of the franchise. It is our obligation to become informed on the affairs of government, so that we may intelligently become part of an enlightened public opinion. It is our obligation to participate in the affairs of government. It is our obligation to make those sacrifices which are necessary in maintaining our financial stability, in increasing our production; and, above all, it is our obligation to use wisely the sovereignty which rests in the people.

In other lands sovereignty is vested in small venal groups and in self-seeking leaders. In other lands men exist for the government. In this land government exists for the people, and the group exists for the individual. In this land sovereignty rests with the people and is exercised by their representatives.

A NATION IS ONLY AS STRONG AS ITS INDIVIDUAL CITIZENS

A nation can only be as strong as its individual citizens, and a citizen can only be as strong as his convictions, his faith, and his strength permit him to be.

As Longfellow said:

"Not in the clamor of the crowded street,
Not in the shouts and plaudits to the strong,
But in ourselves, are triumph and defeat."

History will record these days as the story of the quick and the dead among nations. It is my faith and my fervent belief that America will meet the challenges of this chaotic era and will continue to build a dynamic democracy in a Republic.

In that job of building, groups such as these will play a leading role, and citizenship rather than being a gift from the dead hands of those who came before will be a living legacy.

Do you want to make your life rich and full and complete—life abundant? Then respond to the urge of this hour and day—feel within your soul the meaning of "I am an American." Life then will have a greater meaning. You will be called out of the rut of the commonplace to become a protector, a trustee of things American—the American way. You will feel a new exaltation, a great uplift, such as great souls have always felt who have preserved great values, great freedoms for the race.

Yes; the hour is here for men and women with poise, with tolerance, with valor, and understanding to give of themselves to America. Lift the fallen—those who fail to know and love America—and cleanse our ranks by getting rid of the saboteurs and "fifth columnists" who abuse America's hospitality, and bring to every new generation the meaning, value, privilege, and obligation of being an American.

In that hope, my friends, and in that belief that you, each of you, will meet the challenge of this hour, I conclude.

America Unites

OF

HON. WALLACE H. WHITE, JR.

OF MAINE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 16 (legislative day of Tuesday, June 10), 1941

ADDRESS BY HON. RALPH O. BREWSTER, OF MAINE

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, on Tuesday evening last, June 10, my colleague, Mr. BREWSTER, delivered a brilliant address over the Columbia Broadcasting System. The subject of the address was America Unites. I ask unanimous consent that the address be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I speak to you tonight not merely as a Member of the Senate, but also as one of 3,000,000 parents with a boy in training in the armed forces of the United States.

I might better say the unarmed forces of the United States since their artillery is of pre-World War vintage and antiaircraft guns are almost nonexistent in these days when aircraft more and more dominate the scene.

A Republican from the State of Maine is not to be suspected of Presidential idolatry.

I do not agree with the President in his handling of the Lindbergh affair. It seemed to me not in accordance with the American tradition and politically inept.

I should like to see Colonel Lindbergh—decorations and all—sent to Berlin as military attaché for aviation, and let Mr. Hitler think that over. No one could be better qualified to divine whether Germany is really building 400 planes a day, as one returning American diplomat reports.

But in foreign policy the founding fathers recognized the necessity of a unified command. The Supreme Court throughout the last century has repeatedly declared the primary responsibility of the President under the Constitution in the conduct of our foreign relations within certain well-established limits. Only the Congress may declare war and all treaties with foreign nations must be ratified by the Senate by a two-thirds vote. Within those limits, however, the President must be allowed broad latitude.

No confusion of counsel must paralyze our defense. One of the greatest military strategists of all times warned that one bad general is far better than two good generals.

Down in Maine we have been brought up on the sea, and when the ship gets out of sight of land we recognize the captain is the boss.

With breakers ahead and a storm raging it is not practicable to hold a town meeting every time we port the helm or reef a sail.

All will agree on these general maxims. Each must apply them for himself. For me they mean not to jiggle the captain's arm too often in rough weather. They mean to be careful about back-seat driving when the road is slippery.

Senator BURTON K. WHEELER declared again yesterday on the floor of the Senate that he was satisfied that the President was resisting the attempts of certain of his advisers to rush the country into war. Certainly this should reassure any who may doubt the determination of the President to think of America first and last in this terrific crisis in the world.

There is abounding evidence that the President is trying very earnestly under terrific strain to carry out the carefully considered policy of the country and the Congress to help Britain by all means possible short of war.

The President has been successful up to the present time. Britain is still fighting and America is not at war in spite of all the direful predictions that April again would witness our involvement.

Every American may be grateful that the English Channel is still the frontier for European dictatorships.

As President Roosevelt has well said we cannot now wait until we see the whites of their eyes—or the glint of our nonexistent searchlights on their planes. Then it will be too late.

Somewhere out in the Atlantic and the Pacific lies the American frontier drawn in accordance with the development of modern weapons of offense and defense. The President is constitutionally obligated as Commander in Chief to defend that frontier in terms of 1941. That is all that he has said.

America is safe from involvement in this conflict for the present because it does not suit Hitler's purpose to have us in. Hitler has other fish to fry. He would very much like to know how far President Roosevelt intends to go. The uncertainty has a most unsettling effect upon his domestic situation. That is why the President cannot take us fully into his confidence.

Hitler is fully occupied in Europe for some months at least to come. He has the capacity to ignore distractions. America is not on the slate for this year.

But it is interesting to note that Hitler makes no claim for good intentions so far as America is concerned—unlike some of his apologists in this country.

In his recent amazing interview with a former American diplomat Hitler answers the suggestion that he may attack America by declaring such an attack is impossible—not by the same sleeping powder of his benevolent intentions by which he lulled to fitful slumber most of his earlier conquests.

Hitler confirms by implication the charge of Colonel Lindbergh that Germany is now dominated by the philosophy that might makes right. Surely so rich a prize as the Americas would not count themselves secure in a world two-thirds of which was dominated by so ruthless a dictator—unless we are to accept his assurance that it is impossible for him to assail us.

Yet in his latest speech to the Reichstag recounting the scalp of the tenth innocent country fastened to his belt, Hitler proudly boasted that these victories showed (I quote).

"Nothing is impossible for the German soldier."

Americans may decide for themselves which Hitler they are to believe—the Hitler of the Reichstag or the Hitler of the Cudahy interview.

Now about this dictator business here at home.

Let us remember that George Washington was repeatedly denounced as a dictator.

Let us remember that Lincoln carried on for 3 months what proved to be one of the bloodiest wars in history without even calling the Congress in session.

Let us remember that Lincoln issued the Emancipation Proclamation revolutionizing our economy and our whole concept of vested rights built on the Constitution and the decisions of the Supreme Court without even consulting the Congress.

Let us remember that the Congress is now in constant session—ready to give the President whatever further appropriation or authority is necessary to make America prepared.

Let us make sure that to debate shall not mean to stagnate.

America does not want to be in the position of France with its mind never made up as a result of internal dissension and with its industries paralyzed by continuing disputes between capital and labor. The time for action has come.

America is still young and dynamic. America believes in doing things, and it is pretty nearly time to play ball.

I did not vote for the captain but, along with one hundred million other Americans, I am still a member of the all-American team.

All Americans are agreed that it is time for America to be prepared. Let us begin by realizing that we are woefully unprepared to defend the Americas.

Let us expend our boundless energies and resources in preparing the assembly lines to turn out planes and tanks and ships and guns and all the other paraphernalia of modern defense in quantities that shall leave no doubt in the mind of any dictator as to American preparedness.

American boys must not again be sacrificed on the altar of American unpreparedness.

Along with 3,000,000 other parents I want to see my son not only properly trained but adequately equipped with all the intricate mechanism essential for defense in the present day.

I do not want him indefinitely training on a field piece invented in 1897 and brought here from France in 1922. Styles in guns are changing according to the press.

William Knudsen is right in saying that America has a productive capacity twice as great as any other nation. He knows whereof he speaks. But he is also sadly right when he says we have not yet begun to strike our stride in preparedness.

Even in America we cannot match the industrial giants of Europe with one hand tied behind our back—and that is our position at the present time.

Every time we make a defense item for our country we make four other items for our own personal use.

In Germany and England today their entire production is on a 50-50 basis. Their country gets one-half their productive effort.

This year in America we planned to give one-fifth of our production to defense, but we are 25 percent behind that very modest program. We have not yet begun to tighten our belts.

Let every patriotic American ask this question each night: Have I helped or hindered my country today? Have I consumed more than I have produced? Am I an asset or a liability to my country?

The American frontier today is on the production line. There the future of America will be determined. Each of us has a part to play.

Let every American consider how he individually may help—by producing more and consuming less—by working harder and wasting less—by praying more and talking less—by making America strong and imploring Divine guidance for our President in as terrible a task as has faced any of our Presidents in the history of our United States.

Workers of America, arise and put your armor on. United we stand.

Action of Darlan-Laval Group

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WALTER F. GEORGE

OF GEORGIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 16 (legislative day of Tuesday, June 10), 1941

STATEMENT BY SECRETARY HULL

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD the statement issued by the Secretary of State under date of June 13, 1941, and which has appeared in the press of the country generally, with reference to the Darlan-Laval group in the Vichy Government.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

In response to further inquiries since his statement of June 5, 1941, the Secretary of State, Mr. Cordell Hull, today said:

"From the standpoint of the French people, and others who have a love for freedom, and have freedom, the attitude of the present government of Vichy is a matter of the deepest disappointment and sorrow.

"The original scheme of the Darlan-Laval group to deliver France politically, economically, socially, and militarily to Hitler seems now to have been brought out into the open by a succession of public statements by French authorities and especially those by Messrs. Laval and Darlan.

"When Germany recently desired to make use of Syria to attack British forces in Iraq no objection, much less resistance, to this action was made by France, although the terms of the armistice between France and Germany did not require that France permit territory under French control outside occupied France to be used as a base for German military operations, and Marshal Petain declared as recently as a few weeks ago that he would not permit such use. The use of Syria is a vitally important part of the general plan of Hitler's to invade Iraq, Egypt, the Canal area, and Africa. When the French authorities in Syria, acting under the Vichy government, made no effort to prevent German use of Syria as a military base, and when they permitted even the shipment from Syria of military supplies of French manufacture to be used by the Germans against France's former ally, they permitted Germany to extend the theater of war into French mandated territory. To resist this further expansion of German aggression the British forces in the Near East entered Syria to prevent German actions there which the French, under the direction of the Vichy government, were permitting if not abetting. Yet the French authorities in Syria have considered it necessary to contest bitterly this British effort to prevent Syria from being used as a German base. These facts unmistakably demonstrate that the German military effort is making use of France and that the German initiative in Syria is resulting in a conflict, not only of France against Britain but of Frenchmen against Frenchmen. Germany seems to have prevailed on the Vichy government to do Germany's fighting in the Syria area of the general German advance.

"But, aside from the situation in Syria, and considering the broader aspects of Franco-German collaboration, the public statements of the Darlan-Laval element demonstrate that the people of France are expected not only to surrender permanently and unconditionally their loyalty to all French traditions, institutions, liberties, interests, culture, and the entire way of life which made France great, but actually to transfer all of these loyalties—all hope of the future—to Hitler, in the hope of securing his personal favor. The general adoption of Hitlerism would set the world back 5 to 10 centuries.

"In a statement on June 10, Admiral Darlan, Vice Premier of France, urged the French people to conquer their illusions and consent to sacrifices and indicated that France would be utterly destroyed unless the French people should take this unprecedented and revolutionary action.

"Unless a military invader is devoid of all human attributes he extends to the conquered all of those considerations and recognitions contemplated by the rules and principles of civilized society. An armistice signifies a temporary cessation of hostilities between the parties to it. It does not contemplate that the successful belligerent shall make inhuman demands upon the country and people of the defeated belligerent, nor does it contemplate that they shall be bludgeoned into becoming allies of their enemy. If, therefore, Hitler cannot be depended upon, as implied by Darlan's statement, to observe such rules and laws in dealing with the conquered, how much less can he be depended upon to show the least consideration in these vital respects should the conquered peoples prostrate themselves before him and bestow upon him unrestrained license to deal as he may see fit with their lives, their liberties, and their entire future welfare.

"It remains to be seen whether the French people accept this preposterous status and thus pave the way for them to find themselves assisting Hitler as his cobelligerents in his desperate effort to conquer Great Britain and secure control of the high seas.

"In the prevention of such a possibility, both the French people and the people of the United States have a common interest of tremendous importance to the future."

St. Lawrence Seaway

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WALTER F. GEORGE

OF GEORGIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 16 (legislative day of Tuesday, June 10), 1941

STATEMENT BY STATE DEPARTMENT

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement on the St. Lawrence-Great Lakes waterway project, issued by the State Department under date of March 21, 1941. I think this statement should be in the RECORD for future use by the Congress.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Press release of the Department of State, March 21, 1941]

An agreement was signed between the United States and Canada on March 19, 1941, providing for a cooperative development and utilization of the water in the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence River Basin for navigation and power. The signatories to the pact, concluded at Ottawa, were the Honorable Leland Olds, Chairman of the Federal Power Commission; the Honorable Adolf A. Berle, Jr., Assistant Secretary of State; and the Honorable Jay Pierrepont Moffat, American Minister to Canada, on behalf of the United States; and the Right Honorable W. L. Mackenzie King, Prime Minister of Canada, President of the Privy Council, and Secretary of State for External Affairs; the Honorable Clarence D. Howe, Minister of Munitions and Supply; and Mr. John Read, legal adviser to the Department of External Affairs, on behalf of Canada. The agreement contemplates an early completion of the seaway between the Great Lakes and the Atlantic Ocean by the St. Lawrence River, as well as the development of the vast hydroelectric resources of the International Rapids section of that river.

The agreement is subject to approval by the Congress of the United States and the Parliament of Canada.

An exchange of notes preceding the agreement revealed that the construction of this project is regarded as directly associated with both the power supply and shipbuilding phases of our national-defense program, including the plan for defense of the Western Hemisphere and the determination to supply all possible aid to Great Britain, the members of the British Commonwealth, and their allies.

In a personal message to Prime Minister Mackenzie King, the President pointed out that "while our countries must put forth the maximum immediate defense effort, we must also prepare for a protracted emergency which will call upon the industries on both sides of the border to meet constantly expanding demands." He called attention to the fact that, in terms of the time factor, the St. Lawrence project could be completed as soon as vessels of war for which money is now being appropriated

The President concluded that "failure to take advantage of the possibilities of this project would be short-sighted, in no way contributing to an increase in our immediate defense effort, while limiting our defense program in the difficult years which lie ahead."

The essential features of the agreement may be summarized as follows:

PROVISION FOR GREAT LAKES-ST. LAWRENCE BASIN COMMISSION

In article I the two Governments agree to establish and maintain a Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Basin Commission, consisting of not more than 10 members, with each Government designating an equal number. The duties of this Commission would be to prepare and recommend general plans and specifications for the construction of works in the International Rapids section, prepare a schedule allocating the construction of these works to the respective Governments, approve all contracts, and supervise the construction work. The Commission would submit periodic reports to the two Governments on the progress of the work.

UNDERTAKING BY CANADA

In article II the Government of Canada agrees to construct the works in the International Rapids section allocated to Canada by the Commission to operate and maintain the works in Canadian territory, and to complete, not later than December 31, 1948, the essential Canadian links in the deep waterway. There is a proviso that the period within which the waterway links are to be completed may be changed by mutual agreement to meet the requirements of continuance of war conditions or of defense.

UNDERTAKING BY THE UNITED STATES

In article III the Government of the United States agrees to construct the works in the International Rapids section allocated to the United States by the Commission, to operate and maintain the works in United States territory, and, not later than the date of completion of the essential Canadian links, to complete the works allocated to it in the International Rapids section and the works in the Great Lakes system above Lake Erie required to create essential links in the deep waterway.

To counterbalance expenditures already made by Canada in the Welland Canal link in the deep waterway, the Government of the United States also agrees to provide funds for all works in the International Rapids section except machinery and equipment for the development of power and works required for rehabilitation on the Canadian side of the boundary.

INSTALLATION FOR POWER AND USE OF WATER

In article IV the two Governments agree that each may arrange for the installation in its own territory of machinery and equipment for the development of power at such time or times as may best meet its power requirements, and that, except for the water which Ontario plans to divert from the Albany watershed into the Great Lakes Basin, each country shall be entitled to utilize one-half of the natural flow of water available for power purposes in the International Rapids section of the St. Lawrence River.

In this article the two Governments also agree that the flow of the water shall be controlled and regulated so as to protect the navigable depths in the harbor of Montreal and in the navigable channel of the St. Lawrence River below Montreal. They also agree to maintain facilities for 14-foot navigation during the construction period.

MAINTENANCE OF EXISTING RIGHTS

In articles V, VI, and VII the two Governments agree that nothing done under the agreement shall alter the rights of the Governments within their respective territories, that either Government may at any time construct at its own cost alternative canal and channel facilities for navigation within its own territory, and that existing rights of navigation in both the Great Lakes and the St. Lawrence River shall be maintained.

DIVERSIONS TO AND FROM THE GREAT LAKES BASIN

In article VIII the two Governments agree that either country diverting waters into the Great Lakes system, from other watersheds lying wholly within its borders, shall have the exclusive right to the use of equivalent amounts of water for power below the port of entry, so long as it constitutes a part of boundary waters.

In this article the two Governments also agree that if any diversion of water from the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence system, other or greater than diversions permitted in either country on January 1, 1940, is authorized, the Government of such country will give immediate consideration to any representations which the other country may make. In case no settlement is reached, on the request of the other Government, such country will submit the matter to an arbitral tribunal which shall be empowered to direct such compensating or remedial measures as it deems just and reasonable.

PRESERVATION AND USE OF NIAGARA FALLS AND RIVER

In article IX the two Governments agree to provide for the preservation and enhancement of the scenic beauty of the Niagara Falls and River, and for the most beneficial use of the waters of that river, as envisaged in the final report of the Special International Niagara Board. Such provision would include:

1. Plans to be prepared by the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Basin Commission for works designed to distribute and control the waters of the Niagara River, to prevent erosion, and to insure at all seasons unbroken crest lines on both the American and Canadians Falls. The construction of such works would be arranged by exchange of notes.

2. Permission, on completion of such works, for each country to authorize an additional diversion at the rate of 5,000 cubic feet of water per second for power purposes within its borders.

3. Recommendation by the Commission, after exhaustive tests, for the best and most equitable use of the waters of the Niagara River, with particular reference to preservation of the scenic beauty of the Falls and rapids, the requirements of navigation and power. The agreement provides that, on the basis of the Commission's recommendations, the Governments may by exchange of notes and concurrent legislation determine the methods by which these purposes may be attained.

CLAIMS, DAMAGES, AND LAND ACQUISITION

In article X the Governments agree on provisions for the disposition of claims and for responsibility for damages. Each Government assumes responsibility for the acquisition of lands or interests in lands in its own territory.

EMERGENCY SPEEDS NEGOTIATIONS

Negotiations leading to the present agreement were initiated in 1936. The outbreak of the war in 1939 and the events of 1940 which compelled adoption of a policy of hemispheric defense made it obvious that an agreement was of major importance. Accordingly, the technical features of the project were reviewed by experts from both Canada and the United States. On October 17, 1940, President Roosevelt allocated $1,000,000 of one of the early special defense appropriations to the Federal Power Commission and the Corps of Engineers of the United States Army for preliminary investigations, particularly engineering surveys, of the International Rapids section of the St. Lawrence River. At the same time the President established a St. Lawrence Advisory Committee consisting of Messrs. Leland Olds, Chairman of the Federal Power Commission; Adolf A. Berle, Jr., Assistant Secretary of State; Brig. Gen. Thomas M. Robins, Corps of Engineers, United States Army; and Gerald V. Cruise, executive secretary and acting chief engineer of the New York State Power Authority. The function of this committee has been to advise the President in the necessary preliminary planning and to cooperate with the appropriate agencies of the Canadian Government, particularly the Canadian Temporary Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Basin Committee, a comparable body designated to assist the Canadian Government. These two committees completed a joint report on January 3, 1941, which has been submitted to President Roosevelt and Prime Minister King.

In this joint report the results of engineering investigations are submitted. The principal conclusion contained in the report is that the so-called 238-242 single-stage control project is the plan best adapted for the development of the International Rapids section of the St. Lawrence River. Such a project, according to the joint report, "combines the essential features which have been continuously advocated by the representatives of both countries throughout the long period of study and negotiation devoted to the undertaking," and involves a construction program arranged "so that delivery of power can be begun and navigation provided within 4 years of the time when active work is initiated." Accompanying the joint report there were analyses of the main features of the single-stage project and a revised series of cost estimates which take into account rising construction costs and additional expense likely to be incurred in expediting the work in the interests of national defense.

These engineering data were submitted jointly by Brig. Gen. Thomas M. Robins, of the Corps of Engineers of the United States Army, and the Honorable Guy A. Lindsay, engineer in charge of the General Engineering Branch of the Department of Transport of the Canadian Government. They were assisted by Olivier O. Lefebvre, vice chairman of the Quebec Streams Commission; T. H. Hogg, chairman and chief engineer of the Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario; M. C. Hendry, assistant engineer, Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario; Roger B. McWhorter, chief engineer, Federal Power Commission; and Gerald V. Cruise, executive secretary and acting chief engineer, New York Power Authority.

COST OF INTERNATIONAL RAPIDS SECTION PROJECT

According to the cost estimates, the total cost of the project in the International Rapids section will be $266,170,000. This will provide for completion of the 2,200,000-horsepower power project as well as for the deep waterway improvement in this section of the river. In addition, there will be expenditures for the improvement of navigation channels, both below and above the International Rapids section, in order that a waterway to accommodate vessels requiring 27 feet draft may be provided throughout the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence system, from Lake Superior to Montreal.

America's Place in World Affairs

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES M. MEAD

OF NEW YORK

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 16 (legislative day of Tuesday, June 10), 1941

ADDRESSES BY HON. JAMES M. MEAD OF NEW YORK

Mr. MEAD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD two speeches delivered by me, the first before the Switchmen's Union of North America, at Buffalo, N. Y., on June 9, and the second before the Post Office Employees' at their communion breakfast, on Sunday morning, June 8, 1941.

There being no objection, the addresses were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SPEECH OF UNITED STATES SENATOR JAMES M. MEAD, CONVENTION, SWITCHMEN'S UNION OF NORTH AMERICA, BUFFALO, N. Y., MONDAY, JUNE 9, 1941

This is a real pleasure for me. I feel that I am among real friends. It is a privilege to acknowledge the introduction of our international president, Brother Tom Cashen, whose matchless leadership has earned the plaudits of railroad union executives, railroad management, as well as the respect of leaders of Congress and high officials in the executive departments of the Government.

I am only sorry that, in this renewal of old and friendly associations, I cannot bring a rosy report on conditions of national concern.

I want to tell you as briefly as I can what this great Republic of ours is up against, and what your responsibilities and my responsibilities necessarily must be in this grave crisis.

There is no point in beclouding or belittling the issues at stake. It would be less than patriotic if I were to represent the situation as I see it in any way which would be misleading or which would, in its effect, serve to lull into a sense of false security you who are devoting your utmost energies to the national needs of the hour.

We all know what the circumstances are. But let us hastily review them. During the past 8 years we have witnessed the rise of despotism in Europe. While democratic nations were wrestling with economic, labor, and social problems dealing with the security of its citizens, these despots of Europe were concentrating all available material wealth and human strength into the construction of a mighty military machine calculated to challenge and conquer the world.

Communism took root, flourished in its Russian homeland, and then extended its tentacles menacingly into other lands. Communism became a supergovernment, with centralized power exerting complete state ownership and total authority over man and private property. Nazi-ism and fascism, fungus political growths, sprang out of economic chaos and developed into vicious imperialistic regimes.

They put private capital in a strait jacket and regimented human labor. These three totalitarian systems flouted practically every principle of self-government and of inherent individual rights. Surcharged with old hates and half-forgotten prejudices, electrified by socialistic, demagogic, utopian promises, and guided by scheming, abnormal, sadistic geniuses, millions upon millions of peace-loving people were led straight down the road to a campaign of vilification and aggression, which can find no victory and from which there can be no honorable retreat.

The European war will be 2 years old in September. During its duration we have seen the mechanized might of the despots roll over 15 countries and crush to earth the personal rights and political privileges of millions of innocent men, women, and children.

We have seen the weapons of aggression explode and destroy all hope and semblance of peace and security on the map of Europe. We have seen heroic resistance rendered futile because courageous hearts and empty hands are no match for the diving Stukas or the onrush of armored tank and Panzer divisions.

Today, on land, in the sea, and from the air, the ruthless aggressors continue to wage their campaign of death and destruction, aimed to pierce the heart and break the back of the one last remaining great democracy abroad.

In this country, and throughout this hemisphere, we have witnessed these developments and we have debated, with characteristic democratic thoroughness, the course of action we should take. We have been careful not to drift toward war, but, to the contrary, we have sought to insulate ourselves against the conflagration abroad, and to withdraw our ships, our money, and our men from the war-infested areas. Peace was our objective.

But the war has been constantly and quickly closing in on us. Every success of the current conqueror of Europe has had to be translated as a new danger to our way of life.

To meet these new dangers and to combat this expanding menace which begins to threaten the peace and the security of people everywhere, the Congress of the United States has taken several significant measures. Congress repealed the Arms Embargo Act; it adopted the Selective Service Act; it approved huge and unprecedented military and naval appropriations; it granted the authority contained in the lend-lease bill to give all-out aid to the embattled democracies abroad.

Furthermore, the leadership of our country consummated successful negotiations for the establishment of naval and air bases on British and Danish island possessions, stretching all the way from the northern reaches of Greenland to the semitropics of the Caribbean Sea.

Two weeks ago the President of the United States, in a clear pronouncement of America's needs and objectives, pointed out the dangers which confront us and called for an accelerated defense effort which requires the complete unity and cooperation of all of our people.

With the seriousness of the President's message to the American people has come a realization of the additional contributions which all of us must make and of the sacrifices which will be entailed in order to see this program through.

That great debate has ended. Our country's policy is now crystal clear. We are going to build up the mightiest defense program in the history of the world. We are going to build ships and planes and tanks and guns to make America secure, and to preserve for ourselves and our children and our children's children the blessings of freedom which have been our own happy heritage.

We are going to place in the hands of the resisting democracies abroad the food, the equipment, and the weapons they so sorely need to repel and to keep at bay this new European threat to civilization.

Into this vast and inestimably necessary program of defense production, American labor must throw all of its resourcefulness, initiative, and energy. Labor is charged with a severe and taxing duty. It will meet the demands which are now thrust upon it, and it will carry out its responsibility in this crisis because labor has an all-important stake in a victory over totalitarianism.

American labor knows that under communism, fascism, and nazi-ism labor on the Continent of Europe was stripped of all of its hard-earned gains and was placed in bondage. Labor in bondage—regimented, regulated, and shackled—was forced into the production of the dictators' war machine. This convention just couldn't happen over there. The strong-arm methods of the storm troopers, the crafty cunning of the Gestapo, and whip lashes in the concentration camps were some of the means employed to destroy the rights of labor in Europe and to direct mass productive energies into the construction of lethal weapons.

Could American labor ever find a measure of security in a world dominated by tyrants to whom labor is only a commodity to be used as a tool to build armaments for the invasion, persecution, and conquest of defenseless minorities? Could American labor find any measure of security in a world which would have to bow to the dictates, industrially and commercially, of despots?

No; American labor does not want that kind of a world, and it does not want that kind of a nation.

Labor has learned from observation and experience that communism, fascism, and nazi-ism form unsurmountable barricades across the pathway of labor's progress.

Here, labor wants no "ism" but genuine Americanism. American labor knows that its destiny, prestige, and effectiveness are safe where a democratic government is found. In this country labor has found strength, dignity, and nobility. Here, exemplary labor leadership has been developed; labor standards and working conditions have been improved; class hatreds, serfdom, and slavery have been eliminated as possibilities in this Republic. We shall preserve and improve these standards.

To turn to railroad labor specifically, we all know that our railroad workers were among the first group of wage earners in the United States to establish unionism.

The locomotive engineers organized in 1863, the conductors in 1868, the locomotive firemen and enginemen in 1873, the trainmen in 1883, and our own switchmen's union started at Kansas City, Mo., in 1894.

These were early indications of labor's privileges in the United States. Our union, as well as other labor unions, has not always had a placid history, but over the years we have achieved prestige, popularity, and success. Today practically all groups of railroad workers are covered by collective agreements, negotiated by national labor organizations. These agreements have been made possible as a result of your leadership through legislative victories. They have been effective in their operation because railroad labor has universally fostered arbitration and the peaceful settlement of their disputes. Railroad labor respects the integrity of contracts.

Since the passage in 1926 of the Railway Labor Act, the history of railroad labor mediation has been a happy one. This act stands as the Magna Carta of railroad labor.

Under its provisions, local employee grievances receive the attention of the National Railroad Adjustment Board, composed of 36 members, 18 representing the employees, and 18 representing the carriers. Occasionally, the Board fails in its task and the matter is turned over to the National Mediation Board which is directed by law to appoint a referee and to settle the question at issue.

The National Mediation Board, for the most part, offers a tribunal for the peaceful arbitration of all major disputes. It has been eminently successful in the past. It will be, I am sure, in the future.

This system of conciliation and arbitration has proved its effectiveness in several minor emergencies that have developed. Its machinery is fortunately available now and railroad labor can be assured of the continued enjoyment of the protection it affords.

That grievances and disputes can be peacefully and acceptably arbitrated, is a proven fact so far as railroad labor is concerned. The satisfactory settlement of an important case at this time would prove exemplary to the country. It would be a boon to the Nation in this defense crisis today if similar mediation machinery were available to all elements and factions of labor in the country.

We all know that there have been some tempestuous chapters in the history of organized railroad labor, but, on the whole, the cause of unionism has been cleanly fought, earnestly defended, and fairly won. No finer leadership is to be found anywhere than that which has been developed in our standard railway unions.

Today, regrettably, railroad labor, generally, is faced with a burden of great magnitude.

In this all-embracing program of defense, however, labor can see its goal clearly in sight.

There will be no permanent black-out of labor's well-established gains. We will extend rather than restrict democracy here. There will be further rewards to compensate for the sacrifices which are now demanded. In this struggle between democracy and despotism, we cannot afford to take half-way, half-hearted measures. We must accept our individual and appointed responsibilities in the spirit of true Americanism. But we will make it clear that we are not permanently surrendering our hard-fought economic or social gains.

Organized labor generally has never been found lacking in a national emergency. It has never shirked its responsibility in a great crisis. American labor has made one contribution after another to our national security in the past. Railroad labor likewise will continue to uphold, enrich, and strengthen our American way of life. It will continue to shun the bigot, the demagogue, and the agitator. It will not tolerate the Communist, the bundist, or the Fascist. It will continue to contribute to national unity, increased tolerance and social progress. It will continue to stand by our country's Constitution, to advocate the philosophy of our Declaration of Independence, to pay its complete loyalty to the flag of our Republic.

There will be difficulties ahead, as there have been in the past. But from now on, in keeping with the President's urgent appeal, disputes must be referred for arbitration and there must be no work stoppages in the national-defense program of our Nation.

We will see to it, in keeping with the traditions of America, that work stoppages do not occur by reason of labor injustices; that employers do not utilize the emergency to exact undue penalties from labor or to profiteer at the expense of the American people.

With these requirements uppermost in mind, we now close ranks behind our courageous President, the truest friend labor ever had in the White House—Franklin D. Roosevelt—who is determined to carry out the Nation's policy, which has been adopted in accordance with the will of the majority of our citizens.

The day for outspoken, destructive criticism has now passed. Those who call for a new policy now, or for a new leadership now, do the vast majority of the American people a disservice in this emergency.

Like true Americans, we will uphold and respect the leadership of our elected and chosen officials; we will carry out to the letter the urgent demands that are made upon us.

I know that you members of the switchmen's union will contribute unselfishly and unstintingly to your Nation's supreme defense efforts. I know that you will not permit doubts to assail you or specious arguments to detract you from the primary policy now guiding the destiny of our great Nation.

With Stephen Decatur, you will say: "My country, in her intercourse with foreign nations, may she always be right. But, right or wrong, my country."

SPEECH BY SENATOR JAMES M. MEAD, OF NEW YORK, DELIVERED AT POST OFFICE EMPLOYEES' COMMUNION BREAKFAST, BUFFALO, N. Y., ON SUNDAY, JUNE 8, 1941

Postmaster Driscoll, Right Reverend Monsignor Britt, honored guests, my fellow countrymen, in the common exercise of the unrestrained right of the traditional privileges of American citizenship there is bound to be some confusion, in times like these, as to the duty and obligation of the people to their Government and to their duly elected leadership.

A review of the progress of totalitarian aggression and a summation of our legislative steps will be helpful in fixing our course as exemplary Americans.

My attitude may not square with yours in every detail. It may be assailed by some, doubted by others. But it finds support in the utterances of great Americans in emergencies of the past.

Now, setting aside every consideration except the considerations we owe to God and country, let us review the years since the peace of the world was interrupted by the madmen of Europe.

Officially, the European war will be 2 years old in September. Unofficially the war was 8 years old this spring, because it was 8 years ago that Adolf Hitler usurped responsible leadership of the German Reich.

Hitler has been charting his mad course of vengeance and of personal ambition through all of these years. Playing on the sensitivities of the defeated nation of the World War, stirring up the emotions of a high-minded, patriotic people, holding forth glib socialistic promises of human security which could not be fulfilled, intimidating the hesitant with the clubs of the storm troopers, coercing the opposition with the cunning and the ruthless methods of the Gestapo, crushing the souls and bodies of the recalcitrant within the foul walls of concentration camps, this modern tyrant of Europe enforced a program of savage abnormality on some 80,000,000 people.

While other nations of the world wrestled with the burden of economic depression and with the problems of human needs, Hitler, with compelling and regimented force, built up a powerful, productive war machine. It was a machine that drafted the labor of a nation into the miserable task of creating invincible weapons of human destruction.

All other needs were surrendered to the one primary demand—that of a military superiority capable of challenging and conquering the world.

The peace-loving German people were goaded into the construction of a Frankenstein monster. That monster was one day to become a mighty military machine that was to roll ruthlessly over the Continent of Europe and to crush to earth the personal liberties and political privileges of millions of its neighbors.

Into this program of death and destruction were fed the material wealth of a nation and the collective energies of all of its people.

Today across the narrowing Atlantic we see the fruits of Hitler's maniacal labors. It is a repulsive and fearsome sight. We see 15 European nations that have been betrayed and beaten; 15 nonbelligerent neighbors, whose only acts of violence were those in their own defense against invasion from without; 15 nations that have been attacked, conquered, occupied, and impoverished.

We see innocent men, women, and children starving in order that the army of the aggressor may be fed and sustained for further acts of violence.

During the 15 swift scenes which have made up the first bloody act of this modern tragedy of Europe, America has become aware that the curtain of this drama of murder and abuse will rise on more acts, the scenes of which will feature still other nations.

We have become aware that the weak and the unprepared and the peace-loving nations of the world are seized upon as easy prey for the Axis dictators. It has been unmistakably demonstrated to us that the cloak of neutrality offers no protection against the lust for power of the current conqueror of Europe. The weak are despised, overrun, and liquidated. Those who attempt a courageous but ill-equipped defense suffer the reprisals of the diving Stukas and the onrushing hordes of numberless tanks which swarm over the victim nation like legions of insatiable and devouring locusts.

America is now well aware of the fatalism of unpreparedness. We are well aware of the bestial and unquenchable thirst for world domination which motivates the leadership of the Axis powers.

To profit by the example of the defenseless victims of aggression in Europe and to forestall the possibility of consequences here comparable to those which afflict and mortally threaten the British Isles, America has determined to steel herself against the unpredictable future.

The intrigues and the bubbling volcano of the Orient, the daily assault on Britain, the clashes in Africa, the bloody struggle in the Near East, and the deadly battle of the Atlantic dictate what necessarily must be our policy. The pride we take in our relatively advanced economic and social position, as well as in our more perfected system of government, adds to our determination to adhere to that policy.

This Nation has been conducting a prolonged debate on what role we should properly play in this crisis. Now that debate has ended. Our own little battle of nerves—our own little war of words—is through.

Our course is clear, our policy determined, our objectives defined. We have not been drifting toward war. War has been closing in on us. It is now perilously close.

With Europe in chains, with the Atlantic a sea of lurking death, and with Africa and Asia in flames, our President, bespeaking the will and the unshakable conviction of the overwhelming majority, has plainly stated our aims.

He has announced the existence of an unlimited national emergency, and he has reflected the will of the Nation only after, and in traditional democratic fashion, the merits, and the needs, and the measures of our course have been exhaustively debated on the public platform, over radio stations, in the press, and in legislative chambers throughout the United States.

The Representatives of the American people have debated almost every conceivable angle and detail of the questions at issue on the floors of the House of Representatives and the Senate of the United States. Discussions, deliberations, and debates have been prolonged and complete. I repeat—the debate now has ended.

We have determined now, under the leadership of our President, our elected Representatives, and our chosen officials, that we will undertake the greatest defense-production program in the history of the world, and that we will extend all-out aid to the embattled democracies which still repel and hold at bay the ruthless invader who, at the first indication of equivocation or weakness, proposes to close in for the kill.

We have determined that we shall not sacrifice our right to the freedom of the seas at the dictation of any despot. We have determined that the sanctity of the Monroe Doctrine is not to be forfeited, and that, if need be, we shall defend that policy with our very lives. We have determined that we shall not cower before the will of the totalitarian tyrants. These determinations constitute the foreign policy of the United States.

To implement them, the Congress of the United States has taken several significant steps, among which should be included the repeal of the arms embargo, the Selective Service Act, the huge military and naval appropriations, and the Lend-Lease Act for aid to the democracies. These steps, without exception, followed the course outlined for legislative action by the framers of our Constitution.

Congress shall in the future take such additional steps as may be necessary to make secure and effectual the policy of action upon which we are now agreed.

We have builded and we are now continuing to build our Nation's defenses with amazing speed. The maximum attainment for which we strive has been stepped up to meet the challenge of graver threats. The military training of our young men has been accelerated and is now under full swing. Our all-out aid to the defending democracies abroad has already shown its effectiveness. Our goods and our weapons of armed defense are now going into the hands of those who fend off the attacking forces.

We will send more and more goods—more and more implements of defense to those people. We will not permit the fruits of our production to end up in the watery depths of the Atlantic or the Pacific. In the words of our Chief Executive, it is our determination that they shall reach certain destinations, and we shall insist that they do quickly and successfully reach those destinations.

We have taken dramatic and protective steps, in collaboration with the friendly democracies, to establish naval and air bases on island possessions in the western Atlantic. Our bases, under present plans, will be quickly established on outlying islands extending from Greenland to the Caribbean Sea. In addition to these bases which are being established on British and Danish possessions, I have advocated an effort on the part of our Government to enter into friendly negotiations with the French Government at Vichy for the establishment of naval and air bases on the French possessions in this hemisphere.

While we are taking and, in some instances, now discussing these important steps of hemispheric defense, the aggressors across the sea turn ambitious and covetous eyes on potential sites for bases in Africa, in Iceland, and on islands in the eastern and central parts of the Atlantic.

These ambitions may seem, in one sense, to parallel our own, but an all-important distinction must be drawn. Our bases are being established in friendly cooperation with all the republics of this hemisphere and for defense purposes and for the duration of the emergency only. In the instance of the Axis Powers, however, they seek bases for the purposes of offense and invasion, and there is no thought of just temporary acquisition. They seek permanent possession and permanent acquisition in any and all directions where there is not adequate resistance.

As these activities progress with a tempo characteristic of the blitzkrieg, our collective task becomes magnified. Our great debate is ended and now we must close ranks behind the leadership of America.

Each of us must do our individual and appointed task just a little bit more diligently; we must accept the sacrifices which are entailed in a spirit of patriotic devotion to the cause for which we labor.

I firmly believe that the hour for outspoken destructive criticism of the regularly adopted national program has passed. The right to free speech and free press are among our most jealously guarded prerogatives. We will protect and preserve those institutions so long as this democracy endures. However, in a crisis of this magnitude, it would be a calamitous mistake to permit a handful of defeatists and distorted disciples of pseudo-Americanism to undermine, to confuse, and to thwart the efforts of our leadership and the plain, well-defined will of the majority.

The President of the United States has appealed for unification of productive effort. The majority, through its elected representatives in Congress, has spoken in like manner. From here on, it is our obligation to be bold and courageous and, if the word is suitable, single-minded, in this accomplishment of our grave objectives.

The demand is for unity in support of a clearly defined national policy, of all classes, sections, races, religious, and political parties. The responsibility rests equally upon each of our citizens. The lumberjack in the far-off regions of the Northwest, the cowhand on the Texas Panhandle, the tenant farmer on the plantations of the South, the most humble laborer in the industrial North, and the farmer of the Middle West—all share equally in this national responsibility. The housewife, the high-school student, the rich and the poor, the aged and infirm, all have places of responsibility and trust in this unprecedented program of defense and production. Not one individual can be spared. Not one drone can be tolerated. Not one strike on the part of labor that can be settled by arbitration, and not one act of profiteering on the part of private enterprise can be permitted to stop this Nation defend its way of life.

I appeal for an acute awareness of the magnitude of the task upon which we are now employed. The coming months will bring these demands closer to the individual citizen. The requirements for more work and for more sacrifice will become apparent. But we are a strong people, morally fortified by the blessings of freedom, and physically fit by virtue of wholesome conditions of comparative abundance.

We will execute this job in complete unity and accord, not only in fulfillment of the request of the President, but in excess of the program now projected. In the end, this struggle will see the dignity and rights of mankind elevated to a proper place in the conduct of human affairs. Those who have proposed to live by the sword will, in fact, perish by the sword. We are a peaceful people and we despise this business of war. But now that it is clear that our national interests are threatened—now that there is no alternative to the need for arms of defense—now that the die is cast—as exemplary citizens of a great republic, we will see it through in the American way.

On the words of the immortal Daniel Webster, uttered in an earlier emergency, we take our stand. Webster, in a crisis of his day, declared: "I have differed with the President, as all know who know anything of so humble an individual as myself, on many questions of great general interest and importance—but all these differences afforded, in my judgment, not the slightest reason for opposing him in a measure of paramount importance, and at a moment of great public exigency. I seek to take counsel of nothing but patriotism, to feel no impulse but that of duty, and to yield not a lame and hesitating, but a vigorous and cordial support to measures, which, in my conscience, I believe to be essential." We can do no better, in this grave crisis of today, than to emulate the forthright, illustrious and patriotic Webster.

Rather than to heed the advice of those who now daily advocate a new plan of new leadership, we should close ranks behind the President of the United States and recall the inspiring words of the audacious Stephen Decatur who asserted: "My Country, in her intercourse with foreign nations, may she always be right—but, right or wrong, my country!"

Acquisition of French Possessions in the Western Hemisphere

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES M. MEAD

OF NEW YORK

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 16 (legislative day of Tuesday, June 10), 1941

CORRESPONDENCE OF HON. JAMES M. MEAD, OF NEW YORK, AND THE SECRETARY OF STATE

Mr. MEAD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD correspondence between the Secretary of State and me with reference to the acquisition of French possessions in the Western Hemisphere.

There being no objection, the correspondence was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MAY 21, 1941.

The Honorable the SECRETARY OF STATE,
State Department, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: In keeping with the defense-minded activities of our Government and with the urgent problems of the hour with which you are constantly dealing, I contribute a suggestion which unquestionably relates to a subject of utmost gravity now under full consideration by the State Department.

The feasibility, from a national-defense standpoint, of the acquisition by the United States of French possessions in the Western Hemisphere is receiving widespread attention throughout our country. Leaders who are generally critical of our present foreign policy are quick to agree that these possessions should be taken over if such action is indicated as necessary to the adequate defense of the Western Hemisphere.

It is my own viewpoint that our Government might well undertake negotiations with the government at Vichy for the establishment of defense bases on the above-mentioned French possessions which, I understand, would include the islands of St. Pierre, Miquelon, Martinique, Guadeloupe, St. Bartholomew, and Clipperton. To that list I would add French Guiana.

If such negotiations were suggested by our Government, they could, in my judgment, be advanced in a neighborly fashion which would invite the sympathy and support of a large portion of the French population.

In accordance with the traditional policy of our country, it should be clearly understood that the French Nation would not be deprived of ownership of the islands in question but that the United States would seek only the right to establish naval and air bases on the possessions for the duration of the present emergency.

It could be suggested, for example, that the Vichy government grant lease rights to the United States for the above purposes through one of the following methods:

1. By cancelation of a portion of the French war debt to this country.

2. By establishing French credits here for the provision of nonmilitary supplies to French possessions and to unoccupied regions of France.

3. By any other acceptable formula arrived at by the negotiating parties, provided, that it be unmistakably demonstrated that the United States has no imperialistic aspirations and that the defense of the Western Hemisphere is our sole objective.

A proposal to negotiate along such friendly lines as here suggested could scarcely provoke criticism from the real friends of France. If a proposal to negotiate were rejected by the Vichy government such a rejection could hardly be interpreted as anything else than an action taken as a result of extreme pressure from the contemporary continental conqueror.

Should a proposal to negotiate be rejected or should such negotiations fail, the temporary seizure by the United States of the possessions referred to would be less objectionable to the French people and would be more acceptable and better understood by our South and Central American neighbors.

I understand, of course, that should negotiations be undertaken, the terms and implications of the recently approved Pact of Habana would be fully respected and observed. Perhaps, under the terms and the spirit of that pact, a commission representing the Americas could be formed to visit Vichy and to confer with officials of that government.

I would emphasize that our establishment of defense bases as herein suggested would be purely a temporary acquirement. So long as there is a Free French Government in the world the ownership of these possessions would remain undisturbed. Should events in the future cause a change in this status, adjustment of ownership would be made in keeping with the terms of the Habana Pact and in full recognition of the rights and claims of all governments in this hemisphere.

To sum it up, the meat of my suggestion is that our Government, in keeping with the historic friendship between the United States and France, recommend friendly negotiations with the Vichy government for the acquisition of certain desirable military bases on the French possessions located in the Western Hemisphere. Should this effort prove futile and should it be the judgment of our Government that the interests of this hemisphere are in jeopardy, seizure by force should be accomplished without delay.

With expressions of my esteem and regard, I am,

Yours sincerely,

JAMES M. MEAD,
United States Senator.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, June 2, 1941.

The Honorable JAMES M. MEAD,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR MEAD: I have received your letter of May 21, 1941, setting forth the desirability, from a national-defense standpoint, of the acquisition by the United States of French possessions in the Western Hemisphere and suggesting that this Government may undertake negotiations with the Government at Vichy for the establishment of defense bases in the French Islands of the Antilles, St. Pierre-Miquelon, as well as on French territory in French Guiana.

The Department is giving full and careful consideration to all aspects of the problem presented by these French territories in this hemisphere and its possible implications as regards national security and defense. As you are no doubt aware, the policy of this Government as regards the French West Indies, which includes all territories subject to the jurisdiction of the High Commissioner for French territories in the Western Hemisphere, is governed by an agreement entered into at the Habana Conference in 1940 by all of the American Republics, including the United States, as well as by the arrangement entered into between the High Commissioner and Admiral Greenslade, U. S. N., and later confirmed by both Governments. This arrangement provides certain guarantees regarding the movement of French vessels in American waters and commits the French Government to prior notification regarding any shipments of gold. It also permits the establishment of a daily patrol by vessel and by plane of the Islands of Martinique and Guadeloupe, and a naval observer is at present stationed at Fort de France, Martinique, to check its observance.

This Government is also releasing on a monthly basis a restricted amount from French funds blocked in this country to permit the islands to make purchases in this country of foodstuffs and essential supplies to maintain the economic structure of the islands and French Guiana. It has been agreed that supplies purchased through the use of these funds shall be limited to products urgently required on the islands themselves and shall not be for reexport from the islands to French North Africa or Metropolitan France.

Should evidence develop so that further action by this Government in the interests of national defense be required, you may be assured that any action contemplated will accord with the agreement reached with the other American Republics at the Habana Conference.

Sincerely yours,

CORDELL HULL.

Railroads in Defense of the Nation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHAN GURNEY

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 16 (legislative day of Tuesday, June 10), 1941

REPORT BY JOHN J. PELLEY

Mr. GURNEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a radio address delivered by Mr. J. J. Pelley, president of the Association of American Railroads, at Washington, D. C., June 13, 1941, entitled "A Report on Railroads in Defense of the Nation."

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I am here to report to you on the part which our railroads play in the rearmament of America. That means reviewing briefly what has been done since war broke out in Europe nearly 2 years ago; outlining the situation as it stands today; estimating the job ahead.

That job will be bigger than anyone anticipated. It may come faster than anyone foresees—but it can hardly grow faster or more surprisingly than did the demand for transportation when war began in Europe in September 1939.

Between May and October of 1939 there was a rise of more than 50 percent in railroad traffic—but the railroads handled it, and handled it without congestion or delay.

The American rearmament effort began in the summer of 1940—just a year ago. It was apparent then that the supply of freight cars was sufficient for 1940—as, in fact, it proved to be. But, looking ahead to 1941, the railroads undertook a program of providing 100,000 new cars for service this year. That is being done.

Still looking to the future the railroads have embarked on a plan of adding 120,000 cars to the supply for the traffic of 1942—to keep themselves ready to do their part in a defense effort which has doubled and redoubled and redoubled again

By this fall the railroads will have added 195,000 new and rebuilt cars to their fleet since war started in Europe. Besides this, they have put their cars in repair until today there are fewer bad-order freight cars in the United States than ever before. By what we call in the railroad world a "side window inspection," the observant passenger on the trains can sense that situation for himself.

Here are some of the things which the railroads have done, so far, in the defense effort:

They have delivered an average of 5,000 cars of freight a day to the 150 or more Government defense construction projects, and have done it so well that there has been no loss of time due to any failure of rail transportation.

They have delivered export freight so smoothly and with so little difficulty that few persons know that freight is flowing through the ports in a volume which at times has approached that of the war year of 1918.

They have handled in the first 4 months of this year more than 1,000,000 members of the armed forces of the United States, while maintaining their regular passenger service.

To sum it up, the railroads in 1941 have moved more tons of freight more miles—nearly 25 percent more, in fact—than they moved in the same months of the war year of 1918. They have done it without any of the congestion, delays, and car shortages of that time and have done it with fewer freight cars than they had in 1918.

The number of cars the railroads have is important, but the use made of the cars is more important. There were enough cars in this country in 1917 and 1918 to handle the business. The record of 1941 in handling one-fourth more ton-miles with fewer cars shows that. In 1917–18 the trouble was, too many freight cars were loaded that could not be unloaded promptly at destination. Therefore, the loaded cars became warehouses on wheels instead of being used as vehicles of transportation, which they really are.

Probably, the most outstanding illustration of using railroad cars as warehouses on wheels during 1917–18 is found in the first report of the late William G. McAdoo, who was Director General of the United States Railroad Administration during the last war. As Mr. McAdoo put it, one of the potent causes of congestion of that time was the attempt to control transportation by Government priorities, with no control over priorities, and cited the following fact: Piling was needed at the Hog Island shipyard. Piling was bought and loaded on flatcars. Priority-rush tags were put on the cars, and they were rushed to Hog Island until—before anyone was ready to receive and unload them—there were actually on hand more than 5,000 cars of piling. And there they stood for days, weeks, some even for months—cars out of service, taking up terminal space, interfering with the movement of other things.

The handling of railroad transportation has changed since the World War days. In the first place, we have better railroads than we had then. We have better track, longer sidings, more terminal trackage, better signals, better shops. We have fewer cars and fewer locomotives, it's true, but they are much better. The locomotives are more powerful and efficient. The cars carry more, break down less. The railroad plant, in short, is a different sort of plant. And railroad operation today is a different sort of operation from that of the last war. Trains run faster and carry more; their hourly output of transportation is more than double what it was—due to the improvements carried forward at great cost since the last war.

Equally important—perhaps more important—is the second change since World War days. As a result of the experiences of that time, all of us acquired a keener appreciation of the fact that transportation is an enterprise which requires cooperation both among railroads and between railroads and those who use them. Today the railroad industry is well organized for that sort of cooperation.

Railroads themselves work together through the Association of American Railroads. Shippers work with the railroads through 13 regional shippers' advisory boards, and a national association of these boards. The membership of these boards is composed of shipper representatives of industry throughout the country. Railroads work with port authorities and steamship lines through an organized port-control section. They work with the defense departments of the Government through a military transportation section—none of which were in existence at the time of the last war.

With our vastly improved railroad plant, with our new organization through which we have the full cooperation of the railroads with one another, the cooperation of shippers and of departments of the Government, the railroads are ready to supply the Government and the public with the maximum amount of rail transportation. I will give you one important illustration as to the way railroads function today. There has been much apprehension about the movement of the large winter wheat crop, the harvest of which is just starting. As is generally well known, a large part of the 1940 wheat crop is still in storage in the Wheat Belt and some of it has just begun to move, taking cars east at the time we are moving cars west for handling the new crop. Notwithstanding this unusual situation, we have built up a reserve supply of about 25,000 grain cars in the Southwest for the movement of the new crop, which is ample to enable the railroads to move all of the new winter wheat for which storage space can be provided.

This movement was handled by the car-service division of the Association of American Railroads, which has the authority of all railroads to move or transfer equipment to meet any emergencies which might arise at any point in the country.

The facts I have stated show that the railroads are alert to the job ahead and are working on it. They know that they may be called upon to take over more of our internal transportation, due to the transfer of ships now in the Panama Canal service to foreign services. They are prepared to do that. They may be called on to carry a larger portion of the supply of oil to the eastern seaboard. For many years the railroads have been a diminishing factor in the transportation of oil, as the oil companies have built up their own transportation systems of tank ships, barges, pipe lines, and tank trucks. But to the extent that tank cars are and can be made available, the railroads will do what they may be called upon to do in connection with this situation.

The Office of Price Administration, the Consumers' Counsel of the Bituminous Coal Division of the Government, and the Advisory Commission to the Council of National Defense have each advised the early purchase and storage of coal in advance of the increased demand upon railroads which is to be expected this fall. With that advice we are in thorough accord. Its wide adoption will lighten the peak loads to be expected this fall.

But when all is done that can be done there still will be a heavy demand on the railroads to do their essential part in commerce and in defense. We don't know just what that demand may grow to be, but we do know that the railroads have the capacity and the organization to keep pace with its growth.

There has been no break-down of rail transportation since war started in Europe or since the American defense program began. There is nothing of the sort now. And there will not be.

Our report to you on rail transportation in the defense of the Nation therefore is just this:

Rail transportation is adequate to meet present demands. It will be kept adequate. For 2 years the railroads have met the rising demands of commerce and the multiplying needs of defense. That they will continue to do.

Strikes

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. TOM CONNALLY

OF TEXAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 16 (legislative day of Tuesday, June 10), 1941

RESOLUTION BY OFFICE OF PRODUCTION MANAGEMENT

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I hold in my hand a press release several days old, issued by the Office of Production Management, Division of Labor, at the instance of Mr. Sidney Hillman, in which he refers to the strike of the International Association of Machinists in the San Francisco Bay area, and other strikes on the Pacific coast. It sets forth a condemnation of all these strikes by the Labor Policy Advisory Committee of the Labor Division of the Office of Production Management. I ask unanimous consent that the press release be printed in the RECORD as showing the attitude of the Office of Production Management.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OFFICE OF PRODUCTION MANAGEMENT, DIVISION OF LABOR.

Sidney Hillman, Associate Director General, Office of Production Management, today issued the text of a resolution adopted this morning by the Labor Policy Advisory Committee, Labor Division, Office of Production Management. The text follows:

"Whereas Lodge No. 68 of the International Association of Machinists has called and continued a strike in the shipyards and ship-repair shops in the San Francisco Bay area, together with the local union No. 1304 of the Steel Workers Organizing Committee in the same area; and

"Whereas this strike is in direct and flagrant violation of valid existing contracts entered into in accord with established collective-bargaining procedure under which Lodge No. 68 has operated; and

"Whereas this strike seriously retards and menaces the construction of ships crucial to national defense; and

"Whereas, officers of local union No. 683 of the United Automobile Workers of America, during the progress of negotiations before the National Defense Mediation Board, and in complete and irresponsible disregard of proper trade-union practice have instigated a strike in the North American Aviation Company plant at Inglewood, Calif.; and

"Whereas this strike does immediate and irreparable damage to the vital and important plane-production program for national defense; and

"Whereas officers of the International Woodworkers of America have unjustifiably continued a strike of lumbermen and loggers in the Puget Sound region; and

"Whereas these same officers have issued violently false and inflammatory attacks upon the National Government and its agencies; and

"Whereas this strike threatens to interfere dangerously with national defense; and

"Whereas these several actions reflect adversely upon the integrity and patriotism of the American labor movement and are directly contrary to the best interests of American labor and this Nation and in essence reject the appeal by the President of the United States that labor cooperate with agencies of the National Government for adjusting disputes in defense industries: Now therefore be it

"Resolved, That the Labor Policy Advisory Committee of the Labor Division, Office of Production Management, wholeheartedly endorses and supports the appeal by the President of the United States that Nation-wide machinery for conciliation and mediation be employed 'to prevent interference with production of materials essential to our Nation's security'; and be it further

"Resolved, That the Labor Policy Advisory Committee unqualifiedly condemns and denounces the foregoing strikes and the union officials guilty of them; and be it further

"Resolved, That we do here and now appeal to all legitimate union groups in the country to join with us in this condemnation and urge strongly upon public-spirited officers and members of the unions affected by these above-named strikes that they themselves take action to terminate these stoppages and return immediately to their jobs in these national-defense industries."

A Toast to the Flag

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES M. MEAD

OF NEW YORK

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 16 (legislative day of Tuesday, June 10), 1941

BY JOHN J. DALY

Mr. MEAD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD a Toast to the Flag, by John J. Daly.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A TOAST TO THE FLAG

(By John Jay Daly)

Here's to the red of it,
There's not a thread of it,
No, not a shred of it,
In all the spread of it,
From foot to head;
But heroes bled for it,
Faced steel and lead for it,
Precious blood shed for it,
Bathing in red.

Here's to the white of it,
Thrilled by the sight of it,
Who knows the right of it,
But feels the might of it,
Through day and night?
Womanhood's care for it,
Made manhood dare for it,
Purity's pray'r for it,
Keeps it so white!

Here's to the blue of it,
Beauteous view of it,
Heavenly hue of it,
Star-spangled dew of it,
Constant and true;
Diadems gleam for it,
States stand supreme for it,
Liberty's beam for it,
Brightens the blue.

Here's to the whole of it,
Stars, stripes, and goal of it,
Body and soul of it,
O, and the roll of it,
Sun shining through;
Hearts in accord for it,
Swear by the sword for it,
Thanking the Lord for it,
Red, white, and blue.

Shall We Go to War?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES A. SHANLEY

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 13, 1941

EDITORIAL FROM THE SHORELINE (CONN.) TIMES

Mr. SHANLEY. Mr. Speaker, I take advantage of my unanimous consent to insert an extraordinarily able and courageous editorial from one of the most representative papers covering many of the so-called small towns in my district, the Shoreline Times:

[From the Shoreline (Conn.) Times]

SHALL WE GO TO WAR?

Although not put in words before, this editorial has been in the process of being written for the last 10 months. We have shrunk from writing it because we weren't sure we knew what we wanted to say. We're not sure now. We wish as earnestly as we've ever wished anything in our life that it were possible to dispel the confusion that is in our mind regarding the world situation that we face today. We envy certain friends who can sincerely say that they are sure of what must be done * * *. "We must beat Hitler," say they, "by going to war against him." It would be so easy to fall in with their attitude * * * it is, of course, the popular one. But the more we think about it the more impossible it becomes for us blindly to sound such sentiments.

We want Hitler beaten. We fully realize that there can be no lasting peace * * * no normal life again until this madman, this megalomaniac, and the totalitarian way of life for which he stands are thoroughly crushed and wiped off the face of the globe. But we can't bring ourselves to believe that plunging into war is the way to beat Hitler.

To our way of thinking, war is the most destructive force that man has ever faced. It defeats victor and vanquished alike. It is like some loathsome disease that consumes every sinew of the body and finally rots the mind. War is a horrible, beastial waste.

If we must adopt war as a means to end the scourge of Hitlerism, we are taking a cure that is as bad—yes, in some respects, worse than the sickness itself. We say this with full knowledge that there are those who will call us appeaser and coward and other epithets even less pleasant. That's why it's tremendously difficult to write this editorial.

"What do you propose that we do, then, if you believe Hitler should be stopped, and yet you don't think we should go to war to stop him?" That's a fair question. We believe Hitler's empire will fall of its own weight, just as that of every tyrant has fallen in years gone by throughout the history of mankind. We believe that he cannot subjugate millions of people and keep them beneath his heel for long. And it is on this certain knowledge * * * this everlasting faith that we pin our hope for a new day.

We should stay out of the holocaust abroad so that we may be strong enough * * * so that we may possess sufficient perspective to guide and aid the peoples who will some day certainly rise from the enslavement of Hitler. We can guide them only by study and thought and prayer, and never by shooting and stabbing and killing.

A Country Editor Speaks to Disloyal Unionists

EDITORIAL FROM THE DOWAGIAC (MICH.) COMMUNITY NEWS

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, the day has gone by when any appreciable number of our people oppose unions, object to collective bargaining; but the day is fast approaching when our people will no longer tolerate the demands of a few politically ambitious and personally selfish labor leaders who use union organizations either to increase their financial gains, ride into office, or interfere with national defense.

Throughout the country, the smaller independent weeklies and dailies are expressing the opinion of the people of their vicinity. One of those opinions so concisely, so forcefully, states the viewpoint of the vast majority of our citizens that it is printed below. It is that of Bob Wilson, editor, published in the June 13 issue of the Community News, Dowagiac, Mich. Bob writes:

[From the Dowagiac (Mich.) Community News of June 13, 1941]

A DISGRACE TO THE NATION

We read with interest—and regret—that it was necessary for 3,000 United States soldiers to march into the North American Aviation plant at Inglewood, Calif., to insure continuation of production of $200,000,000 worth of bombing planes for the Government in its defense program. Following their entry, cars with public-address systems drove around the throngs of strikers and announced, "Hold to your demands; the Government needs your services and will pay whatever you demand."

How this must thrill the $21 a month draftees who have left their families, many of them unwillingly to serve for us—you and I—anywhere they are ordered, to do whatever they are told whether they like it or not; eating what is set before them; knowing nothing of what they may have to do in another month. Is this the backing these young soldiers deserve?

It is true that the Government needs the services of these factory workers. But what good are guns without men to fire them? What good is an army at the front without proper equipment? How can soldiers keep up their morale knowing that civilians will not keep a supply of necessities coming unless they gain the remuneration they demand?

While we feel that it matters little to this Nation whether Hitler or Britain wins this combat in Europe—either one will cut our economic throat with a smile to gain their point (past history certainly proves this)—if it is necessary to have a huge army trained for action, it is even more necessary that we have every material these men need available before they need it. Bombing in Europe shows that civilians are in as great danger for their lives as soldiers, so we should not let any plant shut down, regardless of reason, if we need production. France didn't back up her military forces—where is she today? We can, and should, take a lesson while there is time.

EDITORIAL FROM THE HOLLYWOOD CITIZEN-NEWS

Mr. LELAND M. FORD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Hollywood Citizen-News of June 10, 1941:

[From the Hollywood Citizen-News of June 10, 1941]

CONVERSION

With all the laughing at the expense of President and Mrs. Roosevelt over their delayed conversion to the fact that everything done in the name of union labor is not necessarily right, one should be thankful for the fact that the Nation's first citizens were open to conversion.

If the President and Mrs. Roosevelt had not been disturbed over the North American Aviation plant strike which was acting as Hitler's agent in destroying 10 war planes a day, then the Nation would have had to bow its head in shame. The fact that they were disturbed is evidence that they are concerned in their country's welfare to the extent that they will not willingly remain blinded indefinitely to true conditions.

A short time ago Mrs. Roosevelt was ridiculing anyone who condemned the defense industry strikes. They were of little importance compared to the whole defense program, the Nation's First Lady argued. Now she is ready to admit that the strike situation is "sad."

President Roosevelt, who appointed Gov. Frank Murphy as Attorney General and then as Supreme Court Justice after Murphy had refused to enforce the law against sit-down strikers in Detroit, has finally come around to a half-way admission that there are times when strikers should obey the country's laws.

Progress is being made in opening the intellects of other New Dealers.

Attorney General Robert H. Jackson declared that the "situation at the North American plant more nearly resembled an insurrection than a labor strike." That shows that while Jackson hasn't given other strikes any consideration he really has been looking at the North American situation. If he had taken a little more time for observation he would have noted that the criminal defiance of duly constituted authorities at the North American plant is of the exact nature as that which has taken place at many plants where it was called a "labor strike."

The Attorney General says that the distinction "between loyal labor leaders and those who are following the Communist Party line is easy to observe." Mr. Jackson at last sees the Communists as challenging the Government of the United States.

That's a real admission for a New Dealer. One recalls how President Roosevelt accepted a half-million-dollar contribution from the C. I. O., then filled the offices of the National Labor Relations Board with appointees approved by the C. I. O., then, when a few citizens complained against the Communists in the National Labor Relations Board organization, the New Dealers derided the critics as the enemies of humanitarian government, and defended the Communists.

When the Dies committee started its investigations of un-American activities the New Dealers rushed to do battle against the committee. Communists who were claiming to be New Dealers and were welcomed as guests at the White House were to be protected by the New Dealers at all costs. There was to be no exposure of any Communist who claimed to be a New Dealer.

The New Dealers ought to be able now to change their minds about another thing. In the past it has been their contention, as so strongly expressed by Supreme Court Justice Murphy, that officials should refuse to enforce the law against strikers on the grounds they might cause bloodshed.

C. I. O. State President Connelly told Mayor Bowron that if the police attempted to make it possible for men who wanted to work to go through the picket lines there would be bloodshed.

Well, the Army took charge, showed the strikers that the Government of the United States was going to be respected for once, and the strikers marched away in front of the gentle prodding of bayonets. The talk of bloodshed was a bluff that had been used once too often. Strikers are no idiots. Once they see that they cannot criminally bluff law enforcement, they will obey official orders.

That striker who appeared in the picket line with the United States flag was sadly misusing his country's emblem. He didn't care, however. He thought that he could fool a few ignorant workers into believing that the flag of the United States stood for the open defiance of law. He thought that some people had so little intelligence that they would believe that the things for which the flag of the United States stands were founded upon the criminality of the country's citizens and upon mob rule.

Then there was the guy who thought that he was making a point out of alleging that the use of the United States Army to command respect for the law was "the way Hitler did it." That poor fellow had just been victimized by cunning labor leaders who took advantage of his low degree of intelligence.

Hitler represents dictatorship. The dictatorship attempted at the North American was the dictatorship of the mob, which attempted to assert that because of size it could criminally prevent other citizens from exercising their right to work.

Hitler knows no right excepting his own to do as he pleases. That is what the mob of strikers at North American were insisting upon.

Democracy isn't built upon the theory that everyone can do just as he pleases. Democracy is built upon the theory that everyone's liberty ends where the fundamental liberties of others begin.

Democracy is built upon the theory that respect for law must be maintained and that the use of arms by law-enforcement officials will be resorted to if that be necessary to curb criminal disobedience to law.

Col. Charles E. Branshaw, under whose command the soldiers stopped the lawlessness of the strikers at the plant, made this statement: "Word has reached me that some North American Aviation employees and their families have actually been threatened and that other employees may be threatened with bodily injury to themselves or to their families if they return to work at the North American factory."

That gives one an idea of the type of criminals who are violating laws in the name of union labor. That shows the issue before this country today. It is, whether or not union labor, in addition to the right to organize, bargain collectively, strike, and peacefully picket, is to commit any crimes it desires with the sanction of the majority of the country's citizens.

SERMON BY DR. GEORGE HAMILTON COMBS

Mr. TRUMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an able sermon entitled "America, Awake," preached by Dr. George Hamilton Combs, our ablest pastor in Kansas City. He is the father of Representative George Hamilton Combs, who served with distinction in the House of Representatives. This address covers our present situation, and I think it ought to be incorporated in the RECORD.

Dr. Combs is finishing his forty-ninth year as a minister in Kansas City and is at the present time the oldest active minister there. During the last war he had three sons in the service, and he himself was with the Y. M. C. A. in France for more than a year before the armistice was signed.

There being no objection, the sermon was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The most amazing spectacle in the world today is not a beleaguered Britain, nor soldier bodies floating on Mediterranean waters, nor Libyan sands reddened by human blood, but America asleep. Asleep while marching events on three continents are shaping the destinies not only of those continents, but our own, and that, maybe for a thousand years.

Asleep, and dreaming, and talking in her dreams, talking of business as usual, profits as usual, pleasures as usual, everything as usual, while the world is burning down.

A recent survey by the New York Times disclosed that in the Northeast, Southeast, Southwest sections of our country sleep is lightest; that the coast, once isolationist, because of widespread and prolonged strikes is stirring in its slumbers; that of all sections the Middle West is soundest in its sleep and loudest in its snores.

America asleep, and it is not as if she had had no warning. The platform has thundered, the radio has screamed, the press has sounded its trumpets, the camera has blanketed her with the pictures of cities blasted, ships going down at sea, the roaming homeless millions, men and women dying midst northern snows and southern sands, yet still the poppy juice glues her eyelids down, and still she is unawakened from her sleep.

It is an inglorious slumber. We may sing as we do America the Beautiful, but though we sing it till our voices crack and every vocal cord be torn out by its roots America is not beautiful when America is asleep. Character has gone out of her face. It is an ugliness just this side the ugliness of death.

To what should America awake?

1. To the realization that she cannot live unto herself no matter how hard she may try. At times we all wish it might be so. The world has gone mad. Imperialisms, ambitions, greed, hate, have made three continents an insane asylum and a charnel house. Let us get away from the horror of it all. Ah, if only we could. But we can't. A Chinese wall cannot be rebuilt even in China, much less here. And much less now. Not since the Atlantic has shrunken to a strait, not since the coming of the ocean cable, the wireless, the radio, the swift-going ship, the bomber that can cross and recross the ocean without folding its wings. If we could hitch America to another planet, we could live apart from other nations, but not as long as it remains a part of this ball we call the earth. America is the most nearly self-contained of all countries but not without grievous hurt to her economies, her politics, the things of the spirit, could she live unto herself. She might, indeed, build round her a wall of defense so strong that enemy armies could not break through it, but she could never build it so high that corroding ideas and ideals could not fly over it.

You can't catch the winds of earth in a pocket handkerchief and bury them; round the whole earth they'll howl and rend. Nor can we catch the storm of totalitarianism in a blanket and bury it out of sight. And so long as that storm rages across the seas, it threatens us. We are world citizens. Our fortunes are tied up with the fortunes of all the nations of the earth and with them we rise or fall, we live or die.

It is irony of history that the man who first showed us that the Atlantic is but a ferry should now be exhorting us to live this side that ferry.

2. Awake to the recognition that by governmental act our Nation's cause has already been charted. We have crossed our Rubicon. The die is cast. In wisdom or in folly we've done what we've done and now there is no going back. We have committed ourselves to the material aid of the democracies and it is ours to live up to the vows we've made.

Present criticisms of a national policy already buttressed by congressional action and Executive decree serve no useful purpose. they only confuse and divide. They are but cries over water that has already gone over the dam. Colonel Lindbergh, to whom our admiration went out in his epic flight and to whom our sympathies went out in the tragedy that befell his home, we hold still in honor, but when challenging the wisdom of the Congress and the President in what they've done he calls for a "new leadership," we may hold that call coming from his heart and not his head, for, short of forswearing the validity of democratic processes, short of the overturn of our Government as we have it at present, there can be no new leadership. We can have no new congressional leaders inside a year and a half, can have no new President inside 3½ years. Meanwhile, under the present leadership, the American people are to find unity if they shall find it at all, and without that unity we are lost.

It must have given our Wheelers pause when on last Wednesday John Whitaker said that Hitler sees the necessity "of luring Japan into the war against America while the American people are still divided and paralyzed by its isolationists." And bear in mind that as Raymond Clapper said at Lawrence last week, this division of opinion, this tragedy of disunity, this paralysis of effort has been brought about chiefly by the questioning of what we have already done. Political post mortems like all other post mortems come too late.

3. America should awake to the recognition that her defense has only in smallest way passed from plan to performance. Blueprints are a thousand miles ahead of construction. Designs have outrun deed. On paper, thousands of tanks rumble across our fields, tens of thousands of fighting planes and bombers fill the air, two navies command the sea—yes, on paper. In reality, as yet, we are only a third-class military power. Viewing our potentialities, we swell with pride and declare that we can lick the world, but potentialities as compared with production are as the moon to a wagon wheel.

We are fronting a possible combination of four great world powers whose every economy is geared to war, who for a decade have been preparing for war, whose factories and the factories of subjugated peoples are turning out the implements of war; slave labor tilling their own fields that their nationals might be at the battle front, yet our output of military material is only a dribble when it should be a flood.

Nobody knows precisely how much aid we are extending Britain, but everybody knows that it's too little. And what is our national attitude toward this tragic deficiency? Complacency. Are we working furiously to make up for past laggings? We are not. Five days in the week, we work 8 hours per day, when workers in totalitarian countries toil 10 hours per day, 7 days in the week. Fact is, labor labors only when it has a mind to and when it isn't so minded it strikes.

This is the intolerable situation we face today—strikes called and strikes carried on, not just in the factories turning out curling irons or lip sticks, but in plants turning out tanks and planes and guns—strikes in shipyard, strikes in aircraft industries, strikes in munition plants. Strikes running through days, running through weeks; strikes carried on in spite of recommendations and pleas of conciliation boards and Presidential entreaties; strikes stubbornly persisted in and which, if much longer carried on, will make our every defense effort futile and lead our 135,000,000 as lambs to the slaughter. This can no longer be tolerated. Friend of labor all my life, I solemnly declare to it today that it is in the way of losing all its half century gains. When strikes have gone so far that Mussolini's mouthpiece, Gayda, says: "They have caused the loss of nearly a quarter billion working hours and held up the execution of nearly $200,000,000 of our defense contracts," and when he further declares that "this is the first phase of our civil war," it's time to call a halt.

Call it a right if you will—the right to strike—nevertheless there are some rights that have precedence and claim over all others and chiefest of these is the right of self-defense, the right to protect our own, the right to live. He who blocks that right is traitor. If our Government in self-defense has right, and it has, to go into our homes, summon our boys to the camp, the drill grounds, and if need be to fields of battle, it has right to say to workingmen, "This is a job as important as that which we are calling our young men to do and without whose doing they can do nothing. Their lives depend on you. Carry on." Strikes had largely to do in bringing France to her knees and present humiliation. We will not longer suffer them here. Henceforth strikes in defense industries should be put where they belong, among the "fifth columnists," the saboteurs, traitors. Strikes in these industries is nothing short of treason.

Time has come when America, awaking to the littleness of what it is doing, must make an honest-to-God all-out effort to aid Britain without which aid Britain will surely go down.

4. Awake to the recognition that the tempo of time itself has quickened. Events today move at such a dizzying pace that awakening from an hour's slumber, we shall see greater change than did Rip Van Winkle after his 20 years' sleep. Map makers of today must wait for the latest editions of their morning newspaper. What changes in Europe's map since last June! What changes will another year bring? It makes you catch your breath to realize that before ever the green leaves now on the trees shall turn to brown, Britain may be either on the way to the preservation of her freedom or beaten to her knees and shackled as a slave; that Hitler shall be either master of Europe and Africa and well on his way to world rulership or, another Napoleon, nearing his Waterloo and on his way to a lonely Mediterranean isle. So swiftly moves time and so slowly move we. Yet, in this 1941, the clock of destiny is striking.

The time has come when America should get its ostrich head out of the sands, realize that a world tornado swirls, that it moves with the speed of light, and, that a 12 months will show whether Britain—Britain to whom we have sworn solemn oaths to aid—shall through our help still be standing, or doomed to fall—a fall that will shake the earth.

The sands in the hour glass are fast running out, but ours is not the tempo of the running sands. The Congress appropriates billions. The President calls for speed, more speed, but America has only a tortoise crawl. Sparks by the millions fly from a fireside chat, but they fall on sodden hearts and kindle no conflagration.

Oh that heart-tearing phrase of Lloyd George, "too little and too late." Is this also for us? "Too little?" That holds. Commensurate with our might our aid has not been given. "Too late?" Pray God, no. Oh America, thy day of opportunity is quickly speeding by. The morning's gone, the noon's going and in a little while, oh such a little while, will come the night—the night in which we can no longer do. Awake! Awake!

5. Awake to our present peril. Yes; peril; no other word will do. All that we have and all that we love are in dire peril. I know there is a minority though, an extremely vocal minority, that pooh-poohs such a declaration, that brands as warmongers all who sense this peril. Those who tell us that even with a Hitler-dominated Europe and Africa we should not be endangered. That the conqueror of two continents would be content to rest on his laurels and that America would still be as safe as safe can be. I should like to ask these hushers these questions:

(1) Have they not read Hitler's book? Have they not read his speeches? Have they not read the deliverances of his chief henchmen? These are the blueprints of the "world revolution," the "new order." A "world revolution," not a European or African revolution. "A new order"—a new order for the world. They are the blueprints of a world horror and these blueprints have already passed into construction on the Continent of Europe. Are they pleased with the picture? Was Hitler lying when he said he would go all the way? Is he always lying?

(2) Do they not know that nazi-ism is geared to war and that peace would bring as profound dislocation of Reich economy as would war to us? Do they not therefore know that Hitler cannot stop.

(3) Do they not know that though the totalitarian powers should win on all other continents, they would yet be impoverished? And do they think that any consideration would restrain them from attacking us, a nation with three-quarters of the world's gold and our heaped up riches of factory and of farm?

(4) Do they believe Herr Hitler when he declared to John Whittaker the other day that he has no designs on the Western Hemisphere? Hasn't he said that, too, of every country he has ravaged? Will they accept as truth the promises made by a man who in book and speech has justified the lie and whose lies to subjugated countries are still in our ears?

(5) Do they not know that not only does Hitler despise American democracy but hates it, rages against it, and though, thus far, we have done tragically little in Britain's aid, that little is a grindstone on which he is sharpening the axe of his revenge?

It's too late to placate Hitler even were we base enough to try. Only our Quislings would find favor in his sight.

So, I repeat, America is face to face with deadly peril. What is in peril? Our democracy, freedom is imperiled, individualism, the whole American way of life. What is in peril? Our culture. What has happened in the Reich would happen here. What has happened there? Free enquiry is no more. Universities have become cultural prisons. German scholars, one time the world teachers, are in exile. The Gestapo heads, the schools trail the procession. The land of the scholars has become the land of the goose-steppers. Learning totters, art languishes. Culturally, Germany has become a barren land. And so would we become.

What is in peril? Morality, as we understand it. In totalitarian countries, the ethical concepts evolved by the human race in its long pilgrimage out of the night have been rooted out. The accepted standards of morals have been trampled in the mud. The "nots" have been taken out of the Ten Commandments. The lovely ethics of the Sermon on the Mount have been bespattered by the slaves of dictator contempt. The simple duties we learned at mother's knee wake only derision in the halls of Berchtesgaden. "Wave of the future," Mrs. Lindbergh? Oh gentle, too trusting Anne, the wave of the future that draws your eyes is a wave sucked from the lowest depths of man's bestialness, flashing for a moment at the crest, then falling back into noisome depths from whence it came. Pray God that in the brief moment of its cresting, we become not a part of it to be sucked down into the eternal dark.

What is in peril? Our religion. Are we willing to see it go? To see churches turned into garages as in Russia? Proscription of protestantism, as in Italy? An insidious campaign waged against it as in Germany, ranging from its uprootings in the schools, to the barbarism of the concentration camps? Hear it, and on this matter, at least, I speak with authority: Hitler is out after nothing less than the destruction of all religions, holding them alike superstitions. He would have the Christians of Luther lands go back to the worship of its old Norse gods. And he's logical, for Hitlerism and religion cannot live in the same world.

What has happened there would happen here. What the black flag of the pirate once meant at sea, the swastika would mean here. Yes; all that happened there can happen here. "Fifth columnists" can sprout on New England hills, in southern cotton fields, on the steep sides of the Rockies and beyond as well as in Denmark or Yugoslavia.

Chamberlains may hoist their umbrellas in New York as well as London. Stanley Baldwins can smoke their pipes of complacency in Senate conference rooms as well as on Downing Street. Lavals and Quislings can be found in America as well as in Norway and France. Chains may clank here as there. What happened there is warning. Will we heed it? The far-from-hysterical Saturday Evening Post, until of late a die-hard isolationist, in last week's issue editorializes:

"Liberty is fighting for its life. If the aggressor be not destroyed, he will devour the world. America is in peril. Only by heroic and sacrificing exertions may we hope to save ourselves. There is no time to spare."

No time to spare and yet America is not yet awake. How can she sleep? How can she sleep while her implacable foes are drawing ever closer around her a cordon of steel? How can she sleep while her few allies, mauled already to grogginess, are buckling at their knees? How can she sleep when wisdom is crying from the housetops, "tomorrow may be too late?" Oh, how can she sleep? God in Heaven, wake us. Pound on the anvil of Thy wrath till its poundings shake us from our dreams. Rekindle within our hearts the patriot fires that have gone out. Blow on the cold ashes till they become a living flame.

Oh God! Oh God! Open thou our eyes. Oh America, land of Pilgrims' pride, of patriot love, land of glorious yesterdays, wake up! Wake up!

We Must Keep America Independent

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. STEPHEN A. DAY

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 16, 1941

RADIO ADDRESS OF HON. STEPHEN A. DAY, OF ILLINOIS

Mr. DAY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address which I delivered yesterday over the radio:

Before I was elected to the Congress of the United States, I promised the people that I would take the radio and issue a call for their support when I found that the Nation which we love so dearly was in danger. I am completely satisfied that a grave peril now confronts us. Unless we act immediately and a vigorous protest from all loyal citizens reaches Washington at once, our form of Government under the Constitution and our American independence will be overthrown not by a foreign invasion using military force but by a treasonable betrayal which is already in the making.

There is a powerful movement thoroughly financed throughout the British Empire and in all parts of the United States to surrender great, free America into a permanent confederation or union which will cancel the Declaration of Independence written by Thomas Jefferson in 1776 and completely undermine the Constitution of the United States. Hore Belisha, former Secretary for War in London, this week stated publicly that the plans have been worked out and it now awaits a word from Winston Churchill and President Roosevelt to complete the colossal surrender of all time. While we have been engaged in discussing the wars in Europe, Asia, and Africa, and whether the United States will be involved, the first secret steps have been undertaken.

Millions of good Americans were shocked when the Congress passed the lend-lease bill. What did it mean? What was to become of the Johnson Act forbidding loans to nations which have not paid their debts owing to us from the first World War? What was to become of the Neutrality Act, with its cash and carry provisions? Why did President Roosevelt turn over 50 of our destroyers to Britain without payment? Why did the President say that Britain was fighting our war and that our first line of defense was on the Rhine? Why was Stimson made Secretary of War? Why was Knox made Secretary of the Navy? Why did Ambassador Kennedy resign his post as our Ambassador to Great Britain? Why did Ambassador Bullitt who represented us in France tell the French that if they started the war we would finish it? Why have the American people been urged to aid Britain "short of war"? Why did President Roosevelt promise the American people that our boys would never be sent to fight and die in a foreign war?

All these questions can be answered when we understand that we are to become a part of the British Empire. All news now coming out of Washington is censored, and the people are not told the facts. The truth is known only to the President and those within the inner circle handling and operating the $7,000,000,000 of war materials which we are giving to Britain. When the plan for union with Britain is completed there will be no need for Britain to repay us, since the American people and all subjects of the British Empire in Canada, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, India, Ireland, the British Isles, and Africa will be all citizens of one government, the rulers of which will be Winston Churchill and Franklin Delano Roosevelt. The Senate of the United States will be absorbed in the parliament of the new union. All Members of the American Congress will be deprived of their seats, and new delegates will sit in the parliament of the new union. You will no longer be a citizen of the United States. Your new allegiance will be to this new union, and you will be a fellow citizen of the hordes in India and the tribesmen of Africa. The New Deal has grown into the new union.

Lord Halifax has been sent here to put this deal over. Anthony Eden has proclaimed it. Winston Churchill has said that the movement is flowing steadily onward, and like the great Mississippi River cannot be checked. When Wendell Willkie went to London he carried a note to Winston Churchill stating that the union would sail on. Ambassador Winant has just returned from Britain with a report that all is well.

How near is this new union? American armed vessels are now acting as patrols all over the high seas escorting merchant ships to Britain. The President, proclaiming the freedom of the seas, has issued an order for an unlimited national emergency. He is carrying on an undeclared war with Germany and will never come to the Congress for a declaration of war as provided in our Constitution. Secretary Stimson and Attorney General Jackson have publicly stated that all previous international law has been canceled. Secretary Stimson testified before the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations that we are acting under the edicts of a conference of international lawyers held at Budapest, Hungary, in 1934; that President Roosevelt can make war anywhere in the world without any authorization from the Congress.

Plans are now under way to ask the Congress to recess and go home from the middle of July until after Labor Day. The Congress has already appropriated $43,000,000,000, while less than one-third of this sum is all that is needed for American defense. Experts in the Army and Navy have testified that we do not need an Army of over 800,000 for our own defense. On July 1 this Army will already consist of 1,500,000 men. The Congress is appropriating for this year $10,000,000,000 for the Army. Why such gigantic appropriations? All experts in the Army and Navy admit that there is no danger of an invasion of this country by Hitler. Facts and figures have been given to absolutely prove this. Former President Hoover has stated that we can be of more help to Britain if we stay out of the war. Everyone in Washington knows that we are unprepared to carry on successfully a foreign war at this time. Everyone in Washington knows that we cannot have a two-ocean Navy until 1946. Everyone in Washington knows that Japan will attack us if we make war on Germany. Japan is bound by treaty with Germany to come to Germany's aid. We cannot successfully fight a war in both the Atlantic and the Pacific at the same time. You are asking what does all this mean?

Those who advocate the union now with Britain do not mean a union after the war. They mean a union now. If this union be accomplished, then Britain's war is our war, and no matter how it comes out, we will be a part of the British Empire. The fears of the American people are to be played upon until we are forced to accept this union now. The press and radio are flooded with appeals to our sympathy. By day and night we are told the merits and bravery of the British people.

Lord Halifax and Senator PEPPER have toured the Nation calling upon us to espouse the cause of Britain. The will of the people is being broken down by every scheme and device to the point where we will accept an agreement which President Roosevelt will proclaim that he has made with Winston Churchill. The American Navy will be pooled with the British Navy; all private property will be seized by the President; strikes fomented by Communists will furnish the occasion for the use of military force with which to take over manufacturing plants; Mayor LaGuardia is forming the citizens into an army for home defense; Mrs. Roosevelt is about to draft American women into her army; all those who oppose these plans are called Copperheads, Hitlerites, and "fifth columnists." Charles Lindbergh and Senator WHEELER have been smeared. A magazine of wide circulation has carried an article that Americans of foreign stock will be interned and it is even suggested that the rank and file of such organizations as America First Committee and the Keep Us Out of War Committee will be carefully investigated with a view to internment.

In the name of God, whither are we heading? When I say, "We must keep America independent now," you know what I mean. This Nation is full of foreign agents. They are not all Communists. Many are British agents. We shall not tolerate undivided allegiance. We shall condemn all subversive doctrines whether they be Communist, Fascist, Nazi, or British. The minority in Congress which has made the fight for the American people need your help. In my campaign for election as Congressman at Large, I pledged the voters that I would never vote to send the son of an American father or mother to fight and die in any European or Asiatic war. I shall keep that pledge. I also pledged that I would never vote one cent for this purpose. I kept that pledge and voted against the lend-lease bill, against the amendments as they came from the Senate, and I voted against giving Britain the $7,000,000,000. President Roosevelt proclaims a national emergency, unlimited in scope. Since we are not at war, he has no more right to do this than I have. He is usurping the powers of the people. He has no more right to seize all private property than I have. He is acting as a dictator and will continue so to act unless he hears from the American people.

Let us get this straight. Can it be possible that the Congress will sit idly by and watch the President take us into an undeclared war in open defiance of the Constitution of the United States which clearly states that the Congress alone can declare war? Can it be possible that the American people will sit idly by and see their sons shackled into a Union Now with Britain without any authority from them, from the Congress, or from the Constitution? Some will say that it cannot happen here. To all these I make answer How can you explain the fact that just a few days ago the President submitted to the Congress for its approval an agreement to build the St. Lawrence seaway project as a defense measure when at the same time in his message to the Congress he admitted that it cannot be built within 4 years from now? How can you explain this action by the President when all in authority know that such agreement amounts to a treaty and should be submitted to the Senate of the United States, as was done several years ago? Why is it not a treaty today? What has happened to change the status of the project? Conceded to be a treaty heretofore, how has it become a mere agreement now? Can you not see that in the mind of the President the Constitution means nothing. If he can undermine the Constitution in this instance, who can say that he is not ready for Union Now with Britain?

Today we find the Congress of the United States in about the position that the French Council of the Five Hundred was in the early autumn of 1799, just before Bonaparte drove them out of their chamber with his dragoons. Measures are offered for the consideration of the Congress under rules which put a gag on debate. Amendments are offered to bills on the floor of Congress which the Members have not even read. If this condition continues our Republic will pass away and we shall have an endless emergency dictatorship, and only those measures will be submitted to the Congress which Hitler would submit to the Reichstag.

On this day, June 15, the interest is due from Britain for the debts owing to us from the last World War. No interest has been paid; instead, the debtor is seeking to absorb the creditor and thus wipe out the debt. Who could have foretold that anything so monstrous could happen in America? This is Father's Day. I appeal to the fathers of America to weigh well what I have said. I appeal to you to make known to the President and the Congress that you will not tolerate any further steps in betrayal of our American independence. We all agree that we must do our utmost to defend the United States. But that does not mean that we must accept a Union Now with Britain and that you and your sons for all time to come will be subjects of the British Empire. What have we done that this should come to us? God knows that it is hard enough to give up a son for military training in defense of our common country. It cannot be possible that He will inflict this curse that will deprive us of our American citizenship. I call upon the American people to awake to this danger and write or wire the President and the Members of Congress at once, tonight, that you will not permit the loss of our American independence. We applaud the loyalty of the subject of the British Empire for standing by Great Britain; we expect Frenchmen to be for France; we expect Italians to be for Italy; we expect Hitlerites to be for Hitler. But why, in the name of God, can we not expect Americans to be for America first, last, and always?

The tide is turning in Washington. The Congress is determined to drive the serpent of internationalism from the free soil of America. We have commenced to put the Communists in their place. We must not stop there. With your help, we will check the betrayal of America into a Union Now with Britain. We have a right to cherish our American independence. No man can take this birthright from us. Just as in 1776 the wrath of the American people must be made known and when the American people decide that this mongrel New Union shall not happen here then I am satisfied we shall remain free and independent. Let us hear from you. We need your help. May God bless you all.

Special Committee of the Bar Association of St. Louis After Exhaustive Investigation Recommends Additional United States Judge for the Eastern District of Missouri

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN J. COCHRAN

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 16, 1941

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, on April 23 the House passed a bill introduced by the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, Mr. SUMNERS of Texas, which provided for an additional United States district judge for the Eastern District of Missouri. During the consideration of that bill the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BENNETT] read a telegram he had received from Hon. Charles B. Davis, senior United States district judge in the Eastern District of Missouri, in which Judge Davis wired Mr. BENNETT as follows:

Members of the bar have made no study of the condition of the docket. Lawyers have displayed no interest in the bill providing for an additional district judge. No lawyer has had difficulty in getting his case tried. The courts have not been burdened with work for the past year.

I called attention to the situation in the eastern district of Missouri and discussed the matter at length during the debate on the bill. I pointed out that year after year conferences of United States circuit judges had recommended an additional judge for this district, and it was upon that latest recommendation that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] introduced the bill. There are 114 counties and the city of St. Louis in the State of Missouri, and almost one-half of the counties and the city of St. Louis are included in the eastern district of Missouri.

When the bill reached the Senate, Hon. Kimbrough Stone, Chief Justice of the Eighth United States Circuit Court of Appeals, who had submitted the original recommendation, filed an additional statement with the Senate supporting his previous contention that the additional judge was needed.

The bar association of St. Louis, composed of leading lawyers of my city, appointed a special committee to make an impartial investigation of the situation and to file a report as to whether or not this additional judge was required.

I have just received from Judge Fred J. Hoffmeister, president of the Bar Association of St. Louis, as well as the secretary, Russell H. Doerner, a report of this special committee, and under leave granted me by the House, I include in my remarks excerpts from that report, which follow:

To the Executive Committee of the Bar Association of St. Louis.

GENTLEMEN: At a meeting of the bar association held May 5, 1941, a resolution was adopted directing the president of the association to appoint a committee of three members to investigate the necessity for the creation of an additional judgeship for the United States District Court for the Eastern Judicial District of Missouri, as proposed in a bill which has passed the House of Representatives and is now pending in the Senate.

Pursuant to that resolution, the president appointed a committee consisting of James E. Garstang (chairman), Roscoe Anderson, and Samuel H. Liberman.

The committee in the course of its investigation has conferred with Hon. Charles B. Davis, Hon. George H. Moore, and Hon. J. C. Collett, United States district judges, and with Hon. Harry C. Blanton, United States district attorney.

The committee has also communicated with Hon. Kimbrough Stone, senior circuit judge of the circuit court of appeals for the eighth circuit.

Your committee has read and considered the report of the Judicial Conference of Senior Circuit Judges held at Washington, D. C., October 1-4, 1940, the report of the administrative director, the report of the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives, and has studied statistics dealing with the business of the court submitted by the district judges, by the district clerk, and by the district attorney.

The need for additional judges in both the eastern and western districts of Missouri was apparently felt as far back as the year 1929. At that time there were two judges in each district.

At the judicial conference, which is composed of the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States and of the senior circuit judges for all of the circuits, in October 1931 the Honorable Kimbrough Stone, senior circuit judge for the eighth circuit, urged that there be created an additional judgeship for each of the two districts. The judicial conference recommended one judge for the western district to act by assignment in the eastern district, upon Judge Stone's statement of his willingness to try this experiment and ascertain whether one or two judges were needed to meet the situation.

On June 22, 1936, an act was passed providing for one judge to serve both districts.

In 1938 the judicial conference reached the conclusion that the appointment of one judge to serve in both the eastern and western districts did not meet the needs of the situation.

It therefore recommended in 1938, 1939, and 1940 at its annual meetings that there should be an additional judge for the eastern district of Missouri.

In 1939, bills for the creation of a new judge for the eastern district were introduced by Mr. COCHRAN and by Mr. SUMNERS, chairman of the Judiciary Committee.

In April 1940, Mr. Will Shafroth, Chief of the Division of Procedural Studies and Statistics in the Administrative Office for the United States Courts, made an exhaustive personal study of the situation in the eastern district of Missouri, and as a result of his investigation, the Director of the Administrative Office recommended to the Judicial Conference at its meeting in October 1940, the creation of an additional judge for the eastern district of Missouri.

One of the primary functions of the Administrative Office is to study the conditions of the dockets in all the Federal courts and to make recommendations as to such steps, including additional personnel, as are, in the opinion of the Director of the Administrative Office, calculated to improve the prompt and efficient dispatch of the business of the Federal courts.

A bill providing for the creation of such an additional judge has passed the House of Representatives and is now pending in the Judiciary Committee of the Senate.

From the foregoing it will be seen that the need for the creation of an additional judge has been the subject of exhaustive study and consideration by the judicial conference and that the conference has recognized the need for a full-time additional judge in the eastern district of Missouri since 1938.

While your committee has not had the time to make an exhaustive personal study of the relative statistics, it is clear that from the point of view of the cases filed, the cases filed in the eastern District are higher in number than the average prevailing over the United States.

The cases which are now pending and which we are advised by the United States district attorney are to be filed shortly, involving condemnation of lands by the Federal Government, will, in the opinion of your committee constitute such a demand upon the time of the judges that there will be serious danger of clogging the civil docket, to the detriment of private citizens engaged in ordinary litigation.

There are pending at the present time 73 cases involving the Jefferson Memorial project. There have been instituted and are to be instituted other proceedings in connection with the Wappapello Dam, the Clearwater Reservoir, the Weldon Springs TNT plant, and other projects which, in the opinion of the committee based upon information submitted by the United States district attorney from his past experience will require approximately 800 trial days.

It is apparent that the right of a landowner to a speedy determination of his damages is essential to his protection.

We are advised that at the Cape Girardeau division of the court the first case which could be tried between private litigants in 2 years was tried a short time ago, and that this situation was the result of the fact that the Government had so many condemnation cases pending in that district.

If the judges were required to devote all of their time to the trial of condemnation cases, the civil docket would, in the opinion of your committee, fall about 3 years behind.

We are advised that a substantial increase in the number of criminal cases instituted by the Federal Government can reasonably be anticipated.

There are pending in the eastern district four important railroad reorganizations, and although the end is in sight for one or two, there remains and will remain a large burden of administrative work on the shoulders of the district judges handling these reorganizations. In addition to the railroad reorganizations there are pending other corporate reorganizations under the Bankruptcy Act, which require a substantial part of the time of the district judges.

At the end of the Federal Government's last fiscal year, June 1, 1940, there were pending in the eastern district 200 civil cases which had been on file for 6 months or more, and of these at that time 127 were not at issue. Under the new rules of civil procedure, it is to be expected that issue will be joined in civil cases much earlier than they were under the old procedure, and the effect of such earlier joinder of issue will be to add to the number of cases that are triable at any particular time.

The docket in the northern division (Hannibal) is in current condition, but it is to be noted that there are few, if any, condemnation cases which have been filed or are pending in that division, although it is anticipated that there may be a number of proceedings instituted in the Hannibal division in connection with the Mississippi River development.

The amount of business dispatched by the district judges in the eastern district compares very favorably with the business transacted in all other districts. In the St. Louis division, up to this time, attorneys whose cases are at issue have been able, through the cooperation of the judges, to obtain reasonably prompt settings of their cases.

Notwithstanding the above, the report of the administrative office shows a slight loss of ground in the docket in the eastern district for the year 1940; this loss was shown before the impact on the docket of the condemnation proceedings above referred to could be felt.

The pending bill for the creation of an additional full-time judge was amended in the House so as to provide that the first vacancy occurring in the office of district judge in the eastern district shall not be filled.

Under the bill as amended, there would be three full-time judges for the eastern district until such time as a vacancy occurred in any of the three judgeships, at which time there would be only two full-time judges.

In view of the existing and immediately prospective volume of litigation, it is the unanimous conclusion of your committee that the additional judge provided for by the pending bill is necessary to the prompt and efficient dispatch of litigation in the eastern district.

Independently of its own conclusions, however, the committee feels that the need for an additional judge who would be available for full-time duty in the eastern district is fully demonstrated by the fact that the creation of an additional judgeship has been unanimously urged and recommended by expert sources which are fully cognizant of the needs of the district and which are responsible for the prompt and efficient dispatch of the business of the courts, and whose motives cannot be questioned, namely, the senior circuit judge of the eighth circuit court of appeals, the judicial conference, and the Office of the Administrative Director.

The committee respectfully recommends that the executive committee promptly take such action as it deems appropriate to urge the passage of the pending bill in the Senate and its enactment into law.

Respectfully submitted.

JAMES E. GARSTANG, Chairman.
ROSCOE ANDERSON.
SAMUEL H. LIBERMAN.

Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that this report, coupled with the second report of Justice Stone, is a complete answer to those who say an additional judge is not needed in this district.

The Muhlenberg Family

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE W. GILLIE
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 16, 1941

LETTER FROM REV. PAUL H. KRAUSS, FORT WAYNE, IND.

Mr. GILLIE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter:

TRINITY CHURCH,
ENGLISH EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN,
Fort Wayne, Ind., June 11, 1941.

The Honorable GEORGE W. GILLIE,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR DOC: Here's one letter that hasn't anything to do with war. That must be a relief. (However, to be in the clear, I am now convinced that we should give ourselves to all-out aid for Britain. What other sensible thing is there to do?)

I said this wasn't going to be a letter about war, and it isn't. It is to ask your help in a project undertaken by the United Lutheran Church in America, which will find collateral appreciation from all the Lutherans in this country, including the Missouri Synod. We want to get a special stamp issue celebrating the two-hundredth anniversary of the arrival, in 1742, of the Muhlenberg family in America.

The Muhlenbergs gave dramatic and distinguished service to the laying of the foundations of our Republic—the father and three sons all being notable. The father, Henry Melchior Muhlenberg, came to this country in 1742, was prominent in the Colony of Pennsylvania, married the daughter of Conrad Weiser, the influential Indian agent of William Penn. Henry Muhlenberg was the circuit-riding, church-founding patriarch of the Lutheran Church in this country.

One of his sons, General Peter, was aide de camp to General Washington. He received Cornwallis' sword at Yorktown. His statue is one of two representing Pennsylvania's most distinguished sons in Statuary Hall in the Capitol Building. He was the clergyman who preached a stirring sermon in the pulpit in Woodstock, Va., at the outbreak of the Revolutionary War, winding up with a climax, "There is a time to pray and a time to fight. Now is the time to fight"—threw back his black Lutheran pulpit gown, disclosing a blue uniform of a colonel in the Continental Army—the drums rolled outside, and men of his congregation enlisted in the first German-Virginia regiment.

The second son, Frederick A., was the first Speaker of the National House of Representatives. The third son, Ernest, was a noted botanist in American colonial history. They all were ordained clergymen of the Lutheran Church.

These men gave leadership to the very large early German migrations into Pennsylvania, New York, and Virginia, and swung them solidly to the support of the Revolution, the Constitution, and the founding of the United States. John B. McMaster, the historian, says it was the influence of these Germans in Pennsylvania that swung that colony against the tories to the cause of independence.

So this stamp would be certainly worthy, and an inspiration to patriotism, in these days when patriotism is needed. It would be appreciated, not only by the Lutherans of German extraction, but by all Americans of German extraction, and also by the substantial number of Lutherans of Scandinavian extraction, particularly in the Middle West, who would have a proud interest in such a heritage.

The Honorable John S. Rice, of Gettysburg, Pa., is chairman of the committee of the United Lutheran Church in America, in charge of looking after the matter. President Henry W. A. Hanson, of Gettysburg College, and Rev. William C. J. Weidt, of Mount Vernon, N. Y., are the two other members. They are a subcommittee of the committee on Muhlenberg bicentennial of the executive board of the United Lutheran Church in America, of which committee I happen to be chairman. The offices of the president, Frederick H. Knubel, are at 39 East Thirty-fifth Street, New York City.

Please help us on this. It will be another star in your crown.

Yours sincerely,

PAUL H. KRAUSS.

Flag Day Address

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DEWEY SHORT
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 16, 1941

ADDRESS OF HON. DEWEY SHORT, OF MISSOURI

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by me at the annual Flag Day exercises, June 14, 1941, Department of the Potomac, Grand Army of the Republic, east front, United States Capitol:

Mr. Chairman and my fellow countrymen, on June 14, 1777, a year after the signing of the Declaration of Independence, the Continental Congress in Philadelphia decided that the flag of the United States be 13 stripes of red and white, and that the union be 13 stars, white in a blue field. In 1912 New Mexico and Arizona entered our Union of States and the stars in the flag reached 48, the number we have today. It was just a quarter of a century ago today that President Wilson proclaimed June 14 as Flag Day, which is annually observed throughout America by appropriate ceremonies. We do well to pause and honor those few surviving members of the Grand Army of the Republic under whose auspices we meet. It is a high honor and a distinct privilege to be invited to stand on the east steps in the front of our National Capitol to address our fellow Americans on Flag Day. Even more than when our Chief Executive takes his inaugural oath we are here today gathered under one flag that knows no partisanship, and where every man in spite of race, color, or creed may walk the earth his own king, the equal lord of every other man, to go his own way, work out his own will, weave into the warp and woof of the magic days the dreams that haunt, the duties that inspire and urge him on.

Let me say at the beginning that in this New World every man, rich or poor, high or low, Gentile or Jew, Protestant or Catholic, Republican or Democrat, new dealer or old dealer, can rise to any heights that his own capacities, virtues, and energies allow him.

God must have smiled upon this New World because everyone wants to come to it. The poor and distressed peoples in Europe, Africa, Asia, and in the islands of the sea look forward to America as their haven of refuge and hope. We do not claim any particular credit for our fortunate position. Providence has laid its benediction upon us. Though we occupy only 6 percent of the world's surface and have only 7 percent of the world's population, we are fortunately blessed. We have most of the world's railroads, telephones, commercial airplanes, automobiles, radios, refrigerators, carpet sweepers, and all the other physical comforts of life. Moreover, we have the greatest intellectual and religious freedom known to man which is coveted by myriad millions throughout the world. All these blessings were not dropped into our lap but were won through the attention, application, sweat, and toil of men and women who wanted to go forward in this world. No gain was ever made without sacrifice by somebody and we who are the recipients of these benefits should be willing to put forth every effort and sacrifice ourselves in order to pass them on to unborn generations. Shame on any man who would strike to hinder or deter the production of such essential weapons as are necessary to defend his own country.

Tonight we have gathered here to commemorate and celebrate Flag Day. At this hour it is most appropriate that we do this. Symbolism is a natural, normal, and necessary thing. The savage in Africa has his sign; the barbarian in the uncivilized island has his banner; the more advanced man in other lands has his pennant; and in the most civilized nations he has his flag. Whether it be sign, letter, banner, crown, or flag—they all reflect one spirit—the spirit of allegiance, sacrifice, and devotion to the standard that symbolizes the aspirations for which it stands.

Though we are an infant nation, our flag is older than the ensigns of most of the other great nations of the world. For over a century and a half it has waved over a progressive and free people. It is the symbol of a glorious past, of a precious present, and of a hopeful future. It not only guarantees rights but it also imposes duties. It demands as well as gives. It tells of struggle and sacrifice, of honor, loyalty, and devotion to all that is noble in man. The red in it stands for the precious blood shed by our unselfish and valorous forefathers on the gory fields of battle; the white in it signifies the purity of our purposes; the blue in it symbolizes the loyalty of an undivided allegiance of its citizens.

In Great Britain patriotism is centered in the Crown, which means the King. In America patriotism is centered in the flag, which is above and beyond any person or group of persons. Old Glory is America. It is the Constitution. It is the President, Congress, and the Supreme Court all wrapped up into one. It is more than that. It is 130,000,000 Americans who, in spite of individual differences and idiosyncrasies of character, are bound together in an indissoluble union. Beneath the divergences of individual opinion and the differences of individual thought there is a more fundamental unity of the interests and purposes of mankind. Like a big family we may quarrel among ourselves, but when attacked from without we are united and strong, determined and capable of repelling any foreign attack. Blood is thicker than water, and let the whole world understand that while we may differ among ourselves as to policy, there is no disagreement among us on great fundamentals. If America is ever attacked from without, woe be unto the aggressor. There is no division among us when it comes to defending our own country. We are divided only when we begin to police the world or take sides in foreign disputes.

My fellow Americans, we are living in strenuous and uncertain days. Many are the dangers that threaten us from without and from within. As one who loves his country and wants to protect it from all dangers, I do not wish to minimize the threat from without; neither do I want to overlook the dangers from within. While I realize the possibility of attack from abroad, I consider it very remote, and I fear much more our break-down within. Abraham Lincoln once said:

"At what point shall we expect the approach of danger? By what means shall we fortify against it? Shall we expect some trans-Atlantic military giant to step the ocean and crush us at a blow? Never. All the armies of Europe, Asia, and Africa combined, with all the treasure of the earth—our own excepted—in their military chest, with a Bonaparte for a commander, could not by force take a drink from the Ohio or make a track on the Blue Ridge in a trial of a thousand years. * * *

"At what point, then, is the danger to be expected? I answer, if it ever reaches us, it must spring up among us. It cannot come from abroad. If destruction be our lot, we must ourselves be its author and finisher. As a nation of freemen, we must live through all time or die by suicide."

It is also significant to know that years before the present war in Europe broke out, Edwin Markham, that prophetic genius and great poet, wrote:

"I fear the vermin that shall undermine
Senate and school and citadel and shrine;
The worm of fraud, the fatted worm of ease,
And all the crawling progeny of these
I fear the vermin that shall honeycomb the towers
And walls of state in unsuspecting hours."

We had better put our own house in order before we attempt to reform the world. We must make our country financially strong and economically sound within as well as invincible to any military attack from without. National defense depends upon morale as well as upon munitions.

The United States of America are many in one. Our life is made interesting by our variety and is made strong by our unity. Our country is big and broad but it is not spacious enough to hold any subversive elements and we do not want any royal refugees making America over. Liberty is not license. It has obligations to assume and duties to perform as well as rights to enjoy. Every man, woman, and child in this country is free to think, speak, and worship as his conscience dictates but no one is free to undermine either openly or surreptitiously our Constitution or to preach the false and foreign philosophy of overthrowing by force our established form of government.

Without pride of power, without lust of ambition, without desire for imperial dominion the United States wants to remain at peace and live in good will with all nations and to form alliances with none. We want to be honest with all the world but we must first make sure that we are honest with our own people and with ourselves. "This above all else, first to thine own self be true and it must follow as the night the day thou canst not then be false to any man." The greatest need in Washington at this hour is more truth and less trickery, more candor and less chicanery, more statesmanship and less showmanship. America must come not only first but also last and all the time. The pristine power and purity of patriotism must be perenially kept undiluted by rejecting all foreign isms and by constant and wholehearted allegiance to the Stars and Stripes. Our attention, thoughts, and prayers should be centered and riveted on our own flag and never diverted to that of any foreign land.

Fellow Americans, we are building two worlds in America today. One world is material with physical comforts—railroads, automobiles, radios, airplanes, and skyscrapers—a world of physical comforts and of scientific progress; a world in which time is annihilated and space is shattered. It is a marvelous world which has shortened distance, reduced time, and added to our comfort and happiness. We must go forward in it because we have reached only the beginning. The United States has not come to the setting of the sun but only arrived at the approaching dawn. Much more remains to be accomplished.

My friends, there is another world—a world which has been overlooked, shunned, sidestepped, and evaded. It is a spiritual world, a world of ideas and ideals, of hopes and of aspirations; a world of faith and brotherhood and cooperation; a world where men live together helping each other instead of destroying each other; a world of moral principles, ethical ideals, and religious convictions. Unless we build this latter world with the same fervor and stability as we do the former, we shall crash and go to pieces on the rocks of might, materialism, and money. If we are true to America, to the teachings of our fathers and our mothers, and set forth by example rather than by force the great goal to which a free Republic is destined, we shall really inherit the earth.

" 'Tis fine to see the Old World, and travel up and down
Among the famous palaces and cities of renown,
To admire the crumbly castles and the statues of the kings—
But now I think I've had enough of antiquated things.

"So it's home again, and home again, America for me!
My heart is turning home again, and there I long to be,
In the land of youth and freedom beyond the ocean bars,
Where the air is full of sunlight and the flag is full of stars."

U. S. O.—Means Your Opportunity to Serve

HON. THOMAS ROLPH

OF CALIFORNIA

EDITORIAL FROM SAN FRANCISCO CALL-BULLETIN

Mr. ROLPH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an editorial from the San Francisco Call-Bulletin, entitled "U. S. O.—Means Your Opportunity to Serve."

[From the San Francisco Call-Bulletin of June 7, 1941]

U. S. O. MEANS YOUR OPPORTUNITY TO SERVE

The American people, including those of us who live in the San Francisco Bay region, are rapidly becoming familiar with a phase of the defense program which will ultimately affect everybody most intimately.

It is somewhat formally called the United Service Organizations for National Defense just now, but is already on most tongues as the U. S. O., an alphabetical combination which will soon be as common as U. S. A.

The purpose of U. S. O. is to provide recreation and entertainment for both men in uniform and workers in defense industries, and since there are millions of people in these categories the magnitude of the project is obvious.

Nationally, the activities of U. S. O. are going to require some $11,000,000 in public contributions as a starter, and an undetermined measure of public support thereafter as long as the emergency lasts.

Locally they are going to need $135,500 to get going, and proportionate contributions thereafter.

We should get the essential facts about this vital enterprise squarely in our minds at the very beginning.

Considering the uniformed services alone we must remember that we have already taken more than a million young men out of their normal environment and put them into training for defense of the Nation.

At the very least these boys are away from home and family and friends and nothing they find in camp makes up for that.

It is up to the communities in which they are stationed to make up for it as far as possible.

This means the expenditure of something more than money.

It means a systematic and perhaps even a sacrificial taking part in the programs and facilities provided.

This is not a charitable enterprise, to which the citizen can contribute a few dollars and consider the work done and forget about it.

It is a human enterprise, into which interest and sympathy and enthusiasm and neighborliness and friendliness must enter, if it is to mean anything at all.

We would much better leave the boys in uniform to their own devices than to set up so-called hospitality centers which the public shuns.

They want to meet people when they are on leave, the same decent, wholesome, friendly kind of people they knew in their home communities.

They want to be accepted into the life and spirit of the community and treated as if they belonged to it, and not as strangers.

The thing it is most important for us to remember is that if we isolate several million young Americans from our natural and normal community life now they may be permanently estranged from it and make this country pay a more disastrous price for defense than even war itself could exact.

If these millions of lonesome, homesick boys should ever get the idea that they have been shunted out of their ordinary relationships with the kind of people they have been accustomed to associating with they will be easy prey to another kind of people—those who substitute commercialized companionship and sordidness and vice for the decent things a responsible community should provide.

The U. S. O. has been conceived and is being established on the principle that the young men put in uniform are not the only ones with an opportunity and obligation to serve their country, but that certain very real and important patriotic duties are the responsibility and privilege of everybody.

That is why the Federal Government is making the support of U. S. O. a public and a voluntary enterprise. It could very easily put more taxes on the people, and thus provide a professional and artificial brand of entertainment and recreation for uniformed services. But that would build a fence between the services and the people which would shame us all, and might harm us all.

The right view of this matter for the American people to take is that when the boys in uniform are on leave the rest of us are on duty.

And in addition to being a patriotic duty, we will find it to be a very pleasant duty, because when the task of making fine, young Americans feel at home is well done it turns out to be a thoroughly cooperative and reciprocal relationship.

Strikes and National Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LELAND M. FORD

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 16, 1941

RADIO ADDRESS OF HON. LELAND M. FORD, OF CALIFORNIA

Mr. LELAND M. FORD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address which I delivered over the radio on June 12, 1941:

Many of us have noted, with great concern, the defiance of the United States Government, its duly authorized representatives, and its authority, by outlawed strikes carried on by communistic outlawed labor leaders, for it is a fact that in many instances these strikes are fomented and agitated by these communistic leaders. It is needless to draw your attention to the recent happenings, and headlines in the papers, where, out on the west coast, such men as O. M. Orton defied representatives of his own union, the O. P. M., the arbitration committee, the Government, and in fact, all authority. Again the same thing occurred under Freytag, of the C. I. O. union in the North American Aviation Corporation strike. There are other instances, outstanding among them the activities and operations of the notorious Harry Bridges.

Defiance of all authority at this time, by such leaders, in my opinion constitutes nothing short of treason, sabotage, and revolution. This is certainly giving aid and comfort to Hitler and his gang. This certainly means partial destruction, or if some of these men have their way, total destruction of the national-defense program of the United States, and if let to go on, destruction of our form of government.

If we have not been misled by the administration on the necessity for national defense, and I believe we have not, then the matter of the time element in production is one of the greatest considerations in our defense plan, particularly with reference to aviation.

What do we now find? We find open war declared upon the United States by these communistic leaders, for on October 24, 1938, the Dies committee identified this man Orton as a Communist from Aberdeen, Wash. Now, Elmer J. Freytag, who is head of the United Automobile Workers Union at the North American plant, admitted under oath, just a short time ago, here in Washington, that he was a registered Communist.

Many of us, day after day, and for months, have cautioned the administration and the country at large against the socialistic, communistic outlaw leadership that has been present in many of the C. I. O. unions. Our protests have been waved aside, but it has now come about that we are proven correct in our statements and that these subversive groups have openly declared their war on the United States Government and its defense program. As I have repeatedly stated, we might just as well recognize that the first war the United States will have is from within, and against these communistic leaders who are promoting treason, and inciting riot, revolution, and war against our Government. Under the leadership of this communistic Freytag and others, in the city of Inglewood, Calif., sound trucks with radios and banners, parades, etc., were used to whip the honest workmen into a frenzy of riot, treason, and revolution, in an attempt to sabotage the defense program. These workmen connected with this were not told the whole truth, but were being passed only the word that the Communist Party line wanted them to receive.

There is no question in my mind but that the rank and file of the workmen are honest, patriotic men, who will do their duty if permitted to do so, the same as all other good Americans. Many of these men have not been led, but misled, not informed, but misinformed. Many have been forced into their positions against their will through threats of personal injury, beatings, broken bodies, and threats of injury to their families. My heart goes out to the honest workman who has been the victim of such conditions, and who has had to pay "through the nose," the price in money and self-respect, for his job, in order that his family might eat and be cared for.

This was only a beginning because it was scheduled to happen in not only all other airplane plants, but in all other industries in the United States, if these treasonable, communistic leaders had their way.

It is my opinion that this is a "fifth-column" activity, that the word has been passed down through these subversive representatives from foreign countries, that specifically the airplane-defense program of this country must be destroyed. They do not care how it is destroyed, what means are used to destroy it, whether it be undercover war in the form of sabotage and destruction, or open war. The program they wish to accomplish is to destroy it by any means.

When we draft the young manhood of this country, pay them $21 a month, restrict every move in their lives, tell them what to eat, when to eat, what to wear, when to get up, when to go to bed, and don't give them any such protection as N. L. R. B. or Wagner Act regulations, and these same young men patriotically accept these conditions, it is a sad commentary to have to make what these subversive groups in this country, who are so treasonable and unpatriotic in their rackets, refuse to furnish these same patriotic men in the Army the means and material to defend their country. That is a sad commentary, but let me tell you that these men in the Army, and the remainder of the 130,000,000 Americans, who are back of them, are not going to stand for any such program and set of conditions. These conditions must be changed immediately, and I believe the start toward that change has come.

There is no question in my mind but that the first war the United States must win is this war against this subversive, communistic group of outlaw leaders.

No one wants American industry or labor to work for a wage that is not a decent living wage, commensurate and adequate with what is known as a high American standard of living, and this is not the fight. Neither is the fight with the rank and file of men who do the real work. The fight is against the socialistic, communistic, racketeering outlaws, who have moved in from their other businesses; the same group who have never done any honest labor themselves, but have always lived off the efforts of those whom they could promote, either legally or illegally, and mislead. This type of traitorous, treasonable, communistic outlaw labor leader should immediately be placed in concentration camps or penitentiaries; and they should feel lucky, when they receive only this penalty, that they are not in some foreign country which would give them that which they have so richly earned and deserve, the firing squad.

What are we going to do about all this? You received part of the answer this week, from the United States Government represented by the President, when the Federal Government had to move into the North American Aviation Co. plant at Inglewood, occupy it and furnish protection to those honest workmen who were willing and asking to work, and whom I believe to be in the majority. I believe the great majority of the American workmen are loyal, patriotic, and willing to do their job.

It is not my desire, nor do I believe it to be the desire of either business or labor, that the Federal Government occupy and permanently operate these plants, or any of our industry in this country. We all saw what happened to France under permanent government ownership and operation, the same that has happened in all countries wherever it has been tried. It failed. But I do believe the permanent solution lies in what would be equivalent to martial law, to take possession and occupy, temporarily, such plants, in order to protect the plants themselves and those who wish to work in them and carry out our defense program.

The reason I make this statement is that, to me, permanent Government occupancy and operation would be the nationalizing of business and labor, and this would be a form of socialism or communism that 90 percent of our people, at least, do not want.

I further believe that the answer to this situation is simple and not at all complicated and can be carried out by the President of the United States telling these communistic outlaw labor leaders, who after all, represent a very small minority, that the day of treason, sabotage, and revolution is over; that while it is recognized, under the Constitution of the United States, that this Government will not put these men to forced labor, by that same Constitution they shall not interfere with the rights of other citizens to work if they want to, and complete the defense program of the United States; and that if it takes the combined forces of the Army, Navy, and Marines, and all that we have, to make these plants safe to work in, safe for the owners, and to consummate our defense program and restore order, the President will use them to do these things. These principles under the Constitution of the United States will then become effective and will be enforced.

I believe that if the Government took over permanently the occupation and operation of these plants, the final results would be, of course, socialism or communism, but in addition to this, that part of industry and business, as well as that part of patriotic labor who have cooperated, would be penalized for their cooperation, and a premium would be given to those communistic outlaw leaders who did not cooperate, because the eventual program of these subversive leaders is to cause this very thing, namely, nationalization of business and Government ownership in the accomplishment of their final program—socialism or communism.

In view of all these things, I hope that this Government will clean out of all Government positions those fellow travelers, Communists, and those who have any connection with the preachment of a doctrine that would destroy this country.

I hope, also, that this Government will clean out those officials occupying high position, who have hidden behind the skirts of moral cowardice when they bowed to, and gave in to, these subversive interests, which, in fact, is acquiescence in their program. It should be pointed out to these officials that there is a vast difference between that which constitutes moral cowardice and that which constitutes real diplomacy. It is now time that all officials do their duty by the 130,000,000 people in this country.

The Interior Department Appropriation Bill for 1942, As Amended by the Senate, Affecting Reclamation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES H. LEAVY

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 16, 1941

Mr. LEAVY. Mr. Speaker, I have been asked to explain amendments by the Senate to the Department of the Interior appropriation bill (H. R. 4590) affecting the Bureau of Reclamation's construction program.

The questions which have been suggested are intelligent, sound, and the House is entitled to a frank and unequivocal outline of the proposals. It is also entitled to know what the conditions are that make this program imperative and what results will follow.

In the interest of brevity I shall take up the major proposals by appropriate groupings.

First. Your attention is directed to the amendments 91 and 97 on pages 90 and 91, which will speed power for vital national-defense industries on the Pacific coast. The Central Valley and Grand Coulee projects are looked to to meet deficiencies which threaten to thwart the country's efforts to protect itself. Power shortages, which the Office of Production Management finds place the Nation in a critical position, can be met only by speeding work on such projects as Shasta Dam, Grand Coulee, and other projects named in this bill and its amendments.

I also point to the contribution Boulder Dam is making to national defense in power supplies for the Pacific southwest as an example of the foresight which has made reclamation the backbone of the first line of our bulwarks in the West—power. We have already provided funds to complete Parker Dam, which will begin producing power in December. We now propose to start Bullshead Dam, already approved by the House for construction, on the Colorado River to further supplement our power needs.

It is not only on the West coast that reclamation power is being called to the colors. The Anderson Ranch project in Idaho and the Colorado-Big Thompson in Colorado (amendments 92, 93, and 102) have power features it is proposed to expedite in order to meet needs in the intermountain region.

This is an appropriate time to give emphasis to the multiple-purpose of reclamation project construction. Central Valley project, for instance, will provide also supplemental water and other service which will benefit 2,000,000 acres. It will provide flood control, navigation benefits, and protect wildlife. Grand Coulee's vast expanse of waste land will be transformed into individual family-size farms which will relieve the pressure on the population of the West.

Anderson Ranch and Colorado-Big Thompson, like Central Valley, will rescue large areas where crop shortages are depressing purchasing power as a result of water shortages. I cite these as examples of the manifold blessings which flow from the program I am laying before you.

One of the strongest arguments for reclamation is that it serves the Nation in normal times as well as in the preparation for defense. Every dollar on power in connection with irrigation developments is an investment for the conservation of our resources. It will be returned many times over in lower power costs, in enhanced purchasing power, self-sustaining homes, and in other permanent results.

The second group of objectives covered by this bill and the Senate amendments revolve around employment and homes where farm and other families, now on relief, can become self-sustaining. The comprehensive report of the committee on interstate migration headed by the distinguished gentleman from California [Mr. TOLAN] focused national attention on the needs for irrigation in the Great Plains, the Intermountain, and the Pacific regions.

You are no doubt familiar with the recommendations of this committee, which has made a distinct contribution to the solution of a problem that is both heart-rending and expensive. This committee urgently recommends irrigation projects of the type proposed in this program which will give maximum employment and at the same time anchor families where they can be permanently self-sustaining.

It is true that in a few cities on the Pacific coast and that in a spot here and there elsewhere in the West, defense industries are absorbing most of the unemployed in their immediate areas. But you can count on the fingers of your two hands the points where work has been made available.

The President recently emphasized that there are sections of the country not reached by defense employment. The great expanse lying west of the one hundredth meridian has fewer industries perhaps than any other section of the country.

The problem of unemployment in this area has been greatly aggravated. The great droughts of the thirties uprooted 350,000 families in the Great Plains and drove them from pillar to post in that region until most of them fled westward. They sought irrigated land or employment for a fresh start. Neither was available. Those who remain in the Plains are confronted by conditions almost as severe as those in the last decade.

A large part of the 2,000,000 increase in population in the Mountain and Pacific

States in the decade was due to migrations of farmless and other families from the Great Plains and other sections. The population expansion, by the way, was twice the national rate and the resultant conditions had national repercussions.

The Federal Government in the 8 years ending June 30 next will have spent nearly $3,000,000,000 in a futile but necessary effort to cope with the problem of unemployment in the 17 States of the arid and semiarid area. I do not suggest that reclamation could have saved all of this huge outlay, but I call attention to the fact that the amount is more than 10 times the total cost of all reclamation projects now in operation over a period of 39 years.

The distressing feature of this situation is that the westward surge of migrants from the Great Plains is not ended. Jewell County, Kans., reports a loss of nearly 200 families from 1940 to 1941. Most of these groups moved westward in the vain hope of a chance to return to the soil.

To aid in stemming the exodus of farm families from the Great Plains and similar areas, Senate amendment 102, on page 94, proposes to increase by $1,500,000 the amount of reimbursable funds for irrigation projects of the Wheeler-Case type. You will recall that these projects provide work for W. P. A. and C. C. C. labor on permanent construction.

To the westward, outside of the few spots where there are defense industries, the situation is even more complicated. Reports show there are perhaps 175,000 families with farm background eking out an existence until they can get permanent settlement opportunities.

An equally critical situation confronts many established agricultural areas confronted by shortages of irrigation water. Here it has been estimated there are 85,000 farm families facing desolation.

The Senate proposals, through amendments on pages 83 and 84, and 90, 91, 92, and 93, seek to speed the day when we can provide effective remedies for the conditions I have sketchily described.

For years we have been trying to complete 20 reclamation projects with appropriations from the so-called reclamation revolving fund. Due to our praiseworthy conservation policy, receipts in this fund from the sale of public land have dwindled, until it is wholly inadequate for the purpose for which it was created. At the present rate of appropriations it will take 15 or 20 years to complete some of these projects.

In the meantime, the Government's investment in these projects of more than $120,000,000 is frozen and not working as it should in the local or national interests. One of these projects was started in 1906, and I insist 35 years is entirely too long for an undertaking of this kind to come into its full usefulness.

To meet these conditions, here is what the Senate proposes to do with these projects:

First. Seven projects are transferred for construction from the reclamation to the general fund. In addition to the amounts approved by this House, the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to incur contract obligations of $7,450,000, which will be in the interest of economy and economical construction.

Among the projects transferred are Colorado-Big Thompson, in Colorado, and Anderson Ranch, in Idaho, which I have previously mentioned in connection with power and supplemental needs. These two projects, with the Provo River project in Utah, will provide supplemental water for nearly 900,000 acres of land and provide security for 12,000 or 15,000 families. Other projects will offer settlement opportunities for migrant and other families already in the West.

Second. The remaining 13 projects will receive increased appropriations from the reclamation fund. All of them are in areas where the population pressure makes it especially desirable that families now on relief be given opportunities to get back on the land.

Since all of these funds are reimbursable, I submit it is nothing more than good business to complete these projects more rapidly. The sooner this is done, the quicker returns will start; the greater will be the permanent reductions in the drain on the Federal Treasury for relief.

All told, from 25,000 to 30,000 families will be benefited by this move. It has been demonstrated that each irrigated farm supports 2 or more families in nearby cities and towns.

The balanced employment, which will follow these speeded activities, will be geared so as not to interfere with defense priorities. More than 60,000 men on an annual basis will be given work in the program as a whole at the sites of construction, and nearly twice that number will receive work in the extraction of raw materials and in the processing and transportation of supplies and equipment.

By this recital I feel I have shown the need for moving the reclamation program forward with all the speed possible. When all of the projects provided for in this bill are completed, the results achieved can be summarized as follows:

Self-sustaining irrigated farms will be provided for 40,000 to 50,000 families on some 2,500,000 acres of land.

Eighty-five thousand farm families now facing water shortages will be made secure and many established communities will be saved.

Twenty thousand to twenty-five thousand farm families in the Great Plains or similar areas, who otherwise will be forced to migrate, will be anchored in their present localities.

In the cities and towns dependent on irrigation developments, employment opportunities for a quarter of a million families will be heightened.

Purchasing power will be created and maintained which will offset to a large extent the loss of foreign markets.

Federal relief expenditures in the benefited areas will be reduced if not entirely eliminated.

Property and taxpaying values, worth many times the amount of reimbursable funds invested, will be created or maintained.

Low-cost hydroelectric power will not only serve defense industries but will be available for development and expansion of the West under normal conditions.

With the achievement of these objectives advanced by this bill as it passed this House and accelerated by the Senate amendments, we might well rest on our oars if times were normal. But we must look ahead.

Some weeks ago the President called attention to the need when the present emergency is over for a reservoir or shelf of public works projects, which can be quickly launched to absorb ex-workers in defense industries and returning soldiers. The Senate proposes to take time by the forelock and provide the Bureau of Reclamation with an additional million dollars for investigations of feasible reclamation projects.

From the record of this organization, we can be assured that it will present no undertaking that does not meet the high standards the Congress has set in existing legislation and which will contribute to the welfare and stability of the West and the Nation at large.

The conference report on the Interior appropriations bill will shortly be filed in this body for appropriate action. I trust the membership will give serious and thoughtful consideration to it, as your conferees have done, and that it will meet with approval. By adopting the conference report, insofar as it affects reclamation, we will place reclamation on a firm basis, where it can move forward at a rate consistent with the national welfare.

We must ever be mindful of the fact that the western half of our great Nation depends for its successful existence upon reclamation. Reclamation is an activity with definite limits fixed by the available water supply, and we will never be able to irrigate more than perhaps 15,000,000 acres of additional lands. All this new work, as well as that in progress, will reimburse the Federal Treasury for all advances, as it has done in the past, and at the same time, insure this Nation in its present and future greatness.

Clarence Streit, False Front for British-Born "Union Now," Admits There Is Danger Ahead

---

OF

HON. PAUL W. SHAFER

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 16, 1941

ARTICLE BY LILLIAN SCOTT TROY IN SAN FRANCISCO LEADER

Mr. SHAFER of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks I include an article, "Union Now Trembles," by Lillian Scott Troy, published April 5, 1941, in the San Francisco Leader:

[From the San Francisco Leader]

"UNION NOW" TREMBLES

(By Lillian Scott Troy)

In addition to using the dubious services of Maggie-Jiggs social luminaries of dim intelligence among the fair sex in sponsoring the British-Carnegie-Rhodes transparent intrigue to obtain signatures of American citizens to be presented to Congress to prove that the citizens of the United States are ashamed of their nationality and their flag and desire to come under the cloak of the British Empire in a "union," the Carnegie Foundation for International Peace stands godfather for one item of the opposite sex in the form of Clarence Streit Rhodes scholar and alleged author of the book Union Now.

According to the Carnegie Yearbook of 1940, the organization admits financing this unfortunate man in regard to investing in hundreds of copies of his book and placing them in public libraries of the United States. To quote from the Carnegie publication indicated above, we find page 57:

"In addition to the copies of the book Union Now, by Clarence Streit, sent to the International Relations Clubs, the division placed 400 copies in public libraries and sent over 1,000 copies to carefully selected editors and newspapers and journalists in the United States and Canada, asking that they review the book upon its merits. The response to the distribution was widespread and gave added impetus to public thought on the subject treated by Mr. Streit."

That the list of editors was carefully selected we have no doubt—and how we would appreciate having an opportunity to peruse that list. Alas!

The headquarters of Union Now as, as may have been expected, at Union House, 445 West Twenty-third Street, New York City, if one is not too inquisitive; but to those on the "inside" of the plot, the real headquarters are in London, England.

It was to these headquarters that Mr. Streit sent a radiogram at the request of Federal Union, London, in which he whistled to keep up his own courage—yet displayed his fear in the following words:

DANGER CANNOT HALT US

What danger is anticipated by Mr. Streit? Not from the British, nor from the New Deal, nor from the Carnegie Foundation for International Peace, nor the committee once headed by Mr. William Allen White to defend the United States by giving all aid to the British. Then wherein lies the danger for this Rhodes scholar among the citizens of the United States if he is living and working in loyalty to this land of ours and our citizens? That he anticipates plenty of trouble we may infer from his further words in the radiogram:

"Nothing shall blow out the candle we have lit. The storm shall make its light only brighter."

Storm is the word, Mr. Streit; and you will learn to know just what a storm is when the American people find out what you and your backers have been up to in this treacherous Union Now, or plot. You will run before it, and the wade-out retreat of your friends from Dunkirk will be but a splash in shallow water compared to your leaps and bounds for the nearest border—when the Americans wake up. That you are afraid is evident, and before many moons you may find yourself in competition with those tall and slender aspens which live in the high places—and quake all their lives.

With the usual brass this man assures his colleagues in London that "Already more than 2,000,000 American voters favor Federal Union with you," etc. But with that unescapable display of fear he says, "We enter now a more dangerous year." Yes, it is danger with a vengeance, and we are glad to know that Mr. Streit and his colleagues in London know just what he is doing—and all about the danger.

In London the official organ of this gang is World Review. This publication is a monthly, and the joint editors are Mr. Vernon Bartlett, Member of Parliament, and an expert on foreign affairs, and a close friend of Mr. Clarence Streit; the other editor is Mr. John Sutro.

To those who knew and respected the late William T. Stead, editor of the English Review of Reviews, who was lost in the Titanic disaster, it is sorrowful to learn that his publication has been absorbed by World Review of the Union Now adventurers. Mr. Stead broke with Cecil Rhodes' foundation when he learned that the basic idea of Rhodes' scheme was the reconquest of the United States as an "integral part of the British Empire," by treason and intrigue, and betrayal. Mr. Stead often spoke to me of his hope that the United States would "come back" to the British Empire; and invariably I told him this was a distasteful suggestion to an American, and that my people would fight any such suggestion as they would any other kind of treason to their country. Mr. Stead edged away from the conspirators when he learned of the inside of the plan. He broke with Cecil Rhodes; and he counseled of the peril to the British Empire were any such foolhardy "exploration" undertaken seriously by the British Government.

When Mr. Stead found that I had come into possession of the schedule of this plot and intended to publish it in the United States in 1909, he took great trouble and pains to convince me that such publication would ruin my reputation in journalism because the schedule was so "absurd." That was true. Who, reading at that remote time that the power of the President of the United States was to be increased, and Congress abolished, would respect the correspondent who claimed that this absurd statement was factual? And who would give heed to another "point" in the schedule that the Supreme Court of the United States was to be packed?

Or that our naval units, such as the 50 destroyers, were to be placed in British possession? And that professors and educators who were known as loyal Americans and honorable men were to be shunted out of one university and college and school, one after the other, to make way for men who would, under the protection of the Carnegie Foundation for International Peace, write new histories of the United States in which even General Washington would be defamed, and other heroes of our grand and wonderful early history be held up to American students as men to be scorned and despised. All this was truly absurd in 1909; but as many of the points of the schedule of destruction for the United States came to my attention in England, where I lived as a journalist for over 10 years, and I began to see the attention given to the project by members of the British Government, I decided to do my best to have the points of this schedule or plan published in 1912; and it was the San Francisco Leader, for which I am writing this article today, that published the whole plot, and the points, in two articles in February of that year—29 long years ago.

All attempts to have this treachery exposed to view by congressional action has failed. After years of effort the Hearst press made a good start, and followed this up with an illuminating editorial in which pertinent reference was made to the destructive work of the "dead hand" of Andrew Carnegie and his anti-American foundation; but, after a bright beginning, the Hearst papers abandoned the fight and retreated into a silence which has not been broken since that time.

Histories, like that of one Bernhard Knollenberg, published this year in New York, cast unworthy slurs on the Father of Our Country and his generals. Washington's weaknesses and failings are held up to view, and Knollenberg claims that it was a trait of Washington's character to "shift responsibility for his errors to others," etc.

Slander, treason, intimidation of people who have stood fast to beat down these hired slanderers, and the employment of such men as Streit—the timorous specimen who feels the danger so keenly in his rabbit soul that he has to send radiograms about it to his colleagues in London—is the shadow-box display of ways and means which the intriguers have selected to destroy the American Nation. To obtain signatures of innocent old ladies and others devoted to peace for all the world, the Streitists have opened over 700 offices all over the United States and placed them, for the most part, in the hands of women for the purpose of obtaining signatures to a petition to Congress to be presented to that body as an evidence of the desires of our citizens for Union Now, as a member of a supergovernment which would bring about universal peace.

It is not to be assumed that the men who have been spending millions to bring about this degradation for the United States would take all of these women into the secret; and the instructions given the women prove that a goodly number of them have no suspicion of the truth. The menial and servile complexes of some of these enthusiasts may be blamed in some measure for their employment in such a venture. Back of each local center for the distribution of the poison petitions may be found a guiding spirit, generally a man who operates from behind the skirts of ignorant Maggie-Jiggs complexed women; and occasionally the bureau is under the direction of a woman.

If it is true that over 2,000,000 American voters are in favor of Union Now, as Mr. Streit has cabled his London office, then each and every voter has a splendid case for action against Streit and his backers for fraudulent representation; and the old ladies at his Union Now offices, collecting American voters' signatures to sell out the United States to Great Britain, also have a sound case against him for misrepresentation to themselves, and another for the ignominy and shame which their connection with this organization will cast upon their descendants for decades to come. Any other organization, person, or group supporting Mr. Streit's fake peace project, and contributing to the degradation of American voters, or volunteers for the furtherance of Union Now, likewise is legally responsible. If some of the sons of the old ladies who are culling signatures from other old ladies for something which is known to be disloyal to the United States would combine to make a test case of Streit's use of their mothers and maiden aunts, some interesting sprinting for other lands might be witnessed which would place the Norwegian and Dunkirk routs in a most inferior rank for pure speed.

The Carnegie Year Book for 1940, a copy of which is generally to be found in our large public libraries, speaks with glee of their "international alcoves" in each library, and the fact that librarians cooperate to lure the public to patronize the books allocated to the alcoves—most of which are on the subject of how fine it would be for this country to join the British Empire; and publications like Mr. Clarence Streit's "Union Now" disclosure. The life of Washington will be found missing from these alcoves, in its place may be found works on what distinguished British officers and English gentlemen think of the States and the people of the States—as our Nation is called by the Britons.

Among them being the lurid America's Peril by P. A. Vaile, who states, "The carrion-eating vulture would have suited Americans quite as well as an emblem of liberty as the eagle."

And with the Right Honorable Winston Churchill still holding on to his control in Great Britain on the "needling" promise to his people of the Americans coming over to save Britain, it is grim to find that the British author's opinion of American manhood has been delineated in the following words: "Men in America are effeminate looking. They are a mixture of poodle dog and girl."

Long live the Republic of the United States.

Wooden Merchant Shipbuilding Imperative

REMARKS

OF

HON. MARTIN F. SMITH

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 16, 1941

Mr. SMITH of Washington. Mr. Speaker, on June 2 I addressed the House in favor of an all-out wooden merchant shipbuilding program to meet the needs of Great Britain and our own coastwise shipping. I pointed out the fact that thus far the United States Maritime Commission and the Bureau of Ships, United States Navy, have limited the program almost entirely to steel construction and that we now face a steel shortage according to the latest report of Mr. Gano Dunn, senior consultant in the production division of the O. P. M. Steel is needed for tooling, machinery, armor plate for battleships, heavy armament, and munitions, and, it now appears, for petroleum pipe lines. This is all the more reason why we should utilize wood for our merchant shipbuilding, of which we have a plentiful supply. If we had started a wooden shipbuilding program a year ago, when I first advocated it to officials in charge, we would not now be suffering so acutely from the lack of bottoms which is a serious handicap to Great Britain and ourselves.

A few days ago Secretary of the Navy Knox said that we need to perform a "miracle" in shipbuilding, so critical is the situation caused by the loss of British shipping. Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether we are capable of performing "miracles"—the record of the past year hardly indicates that—but it is not too late to exercise hard-headed common sense in furthering our shipbuilding program. When I spoke on this subject last week I referred to the achievements in wooden-ship building in the Pacific Northwest in the last World War and drew attention to the fact that our idle wooden-ship yards and ship carpenters and mechanics in that region are ready, able, and willing to do an equally good job to meet the present emergency.

In 1917 President Woodrow Wilson called upon the shipbuilders of the Nation to "span the Atlantic with a bridge of wooden ships." They responded so magnificently to the President's call that historians have declared that the speed and effectiveness with which they acted contributed more than any other single factor to the defeat of Germany in 1918. History can and will repeat itself if our wooden-ship builders are again given the opportunity to serve our country and our democratic allies.

Mr. Speaker, my previous remarks have received wide news and editorial comment throughout the country, and I have also received many interesting and constructive communications. Every expression which has come to my attention has been favorable and I have not seen or heard of any adverse criticism. One of the most illuminating letters which I have received is from my own State and written by an experienced shipbuilder who formerly was located in my own district, Mr. G. F. Matthews, now a resident of Seattle. I quote from Mr. Matthews' air-mail letter to me of June 3:

Representative MARTIN F. SMITH,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SMITH: The local papers have printed several articles in regard to the revival of wood-ship building.

The Seattle Times had an article stating that you had addressed the House June 2, making the prediction that there will be a shortage of steel for shipbuilding, and the Government should construct wood-built vessels, thereby increase ship tonnage.

You remember that I operated a shipyard in your home town, and believe I have an experience that only a few men have; consequently, I will volunteer to explain to you some of my views.

There is no question regarding steel being the most practical and economic material for ship construction, particularly for large vessels. However, the present war has proved that even the greatest type of steel constructed ships are destructible, namely, the Hood and Bismarck. Any amount of ships, airplanes, and oil will be required to stop this world's greatest menace—war.

Several types of wood-constructed vessels could be designed and built that would give valuable service to both England and the Americas during the gigantic struggle to stop this war.

One type would be a vessel for carrying lumber cargoes, which would be practical and serve a special purpose. For instance, I built a number of steam schooners for the coastwise lumber trade. Many of these vessels were successfully operated during the last war in other trades, South America, east coast, Gulf, and West Indies. Cargoes consisted of lumber, nitrates, sugar, hardwoods, ore, coal, and miscellaneous. A number of this type were sold in Europe.

My idea would be to build a number of that type of vessel, modern and with a capacity of 2,000 M feet of fir lumber equipped with twin-screw 750 horsepower Washington Iron Works Diesel engines, a vessel that would be practical and economical to operate in special trades, thereby relieving the steel ship for more important trade routes.

Lumber, cut in British Columbia, is shipped by rail to the Atlantic Coast, then transported to England by steamers. A shortage of vessels creates a bottleneck for those mills and loggers. The vessel I briefly described could transport the lumber cheaper and allow the steel steamers to carry general cargoes.

Another type of motorship could be built for general cargo, capacity 3,000 tons, and would be a very suitable vessel in numerous trades, such as "feeder ships" to domestic ports and the Western Hemisphere countries.

About 1932 the wooden motorship North Star was built here for a supply ship to operate to Alaska, for the Department of the Interior. The Government allowed the vessel to make two trips to the Antarctic for the Byrd expedition, carrying men and supplies. This vessel has been very successful and the Navy is now operating said vessel as a supply ship on the Atlantic Coast. No doubt the Navy could use a number of such vessels if they were available. In the meantime, the Government is compelled to pay existing freight rates to transport supplies to Alaska, also, new bases in both oceans, and will be forced to continue this unless something is done about it.

I, for one, have no desire to see our Government open up on extensive, costly, and wasteful shipbuilding program, like the one established during the other war. However, I believe a conservative program should be started at once, otherwise it may prove to be neglectful.

Every type of vessel is in demand now, and the war demands are increasing beyond all expectations. Less that 2 years ago one of the Government officials visited the west coast and made the remark that we had enough shipyards. His remarks discouraged all possibilities at that time of the establishing of a shipyard then under consideration. His vision was decidedly wrong, little did he realize what the future would bring and the same thing can happen again.

It is not particularly one kind of ship that is so all important now, but the objective is to get the ships, no matter how you get them, and be sure to get enough. That is what is going to count the most before this destructive war is ended.

It is true we have not the number of shipyard mechanics now for building wood ships that we had in 1917 and 1918 and the long timbers are not so plentiful either. However, 8 or 10 modern yards could be established in Washington and Oregon, organizations formed, local sawmills to manufacture the lumber and vessels built. The industry would create an important addition to the defense program now going forward.

In the President's recent address he mentioned the alarm for ships. No doubt the officials responsible for the shipbuilding program will oppose your views in regard to wood-built ships, and may I suggest that your take your plan to President Roosevelt, then you will learn his views.

It is a fact that the enormous amount of wood-ship tonnage constructed in this country during the other war played an important part in the breaking down of the German resistance.

Some of our friends on the harbor have made suggestions to me in regard to establishing a shipyard there. This could be done providing Government work could be awarded. It is impossible to get private capital interested in building vessels for the lumber trade, owing to labor conditions in operating vessels and prevailing uncertainties.

Will be pleased to hear from you when convenient, stating your progress on the wood-ship building program.

With kind personal regards,

Yours very respectfully,

G. F. MATTHEWS.

I will also quote from some of the editorials which have been published in southwest Washington newspapers.

On June 3 the Longview Daily News made this comment:

SMITH SUPPORTED

Here in the timber country we're ready to argue the merits of wood any time, and therefore should back up Congressman SMITH'S assertion that the Government should build some wooden merchant ships, inasmuch as a shortage of steel seems imminent. Wooden-hulled steamers may not be the equal of steel ships in some respects, but they have been sailing the seas for a long time and do a pretty good job. And a steel merchant hull won't stop a torpedo any better than solid planking. Many improvements have been made in methods of preserving wood and in wood construction, so it ought to be possible to build better wooden ships now than ever before.

On the same date the Kelsonian Tribune, of Kelso, said:

SHOULD BUILD WOODEN SHIPS

With the defense needs for steel exceeding the supply and growing enormously every day, construction of wooden cargo vessels appears a logical solution for the shipping problem, which is rapidly becoming acute not only for Great Britain but for coastal areas of the United States.

Congressman MARTIN SMITH has been urging such a program for months but has received little heed in governmental circles, which apparently failed to see the approaching shortages of steel and a good many other materials as clearly as did our district's Congressman.

Wooden ships can be built with great speed, as was shown in World War days, and material will be used that is not required for other defense programs.

They are also cheaper than steel vessels, and the loss would not be as great when a submarine or bomber sends one to the bottom.

As was true of the wooden vessels that were built in World War days, they would probably prove impractical when normal trade conditions are restored after the war, but so will the slow-speed-type cargo vessels to be built in the largest Portland yard and other yards throughout the Nation.

The following editorial appeared in the Aberdeen Daily World on June 5, 1941:

WOODEN SHIPS

Congressman MARTIN F. SMITH said before the House of Representatives the other day, "There is no reason why merchant ships should be constructed exclusively of steel." He urged construction of wooden ships and the utilization of the idle wooden-ship yards of the Pacific Northwest.

If an emergency means the time element is important there is a very good reason why cargo ships should not be built exclusively of steel. Metal ships are slow in building. Wooden ships can be turned out in a fraction of the time. Steel ships drain our already overtaxed steel supply and capacity to supply. Steel is sorely needed in armaments; wood is not. Steel workers are scarce, but every maritime community in the Northwest has old shipwrights skilled in the building of wooden vessels. There are number of yards already available, but if new yards are needed they can be built in a matter of weeks. Machinery for the fashioning of wooden ships is available in any sawmill town. Raw material is on hand in any log boom. Steel must be mined, smelted, rolled, and cast, and prepared for ships in a long, tedious process.

There may be some argument on the size of wooden ships that can be constructed, perhaps some argument on their fuel capacity in relation to cargo capacity, but there are not insurmountable objections. Wooden ships last a long time; surely they would outlast the present emergency. And they would have this advantage, a German submarine commander would think twice before wasting an expensive torpedo on a small wooden vessel slogging her way to England.

Moreover, wooden-ship building has been resumed on a large scale in New England, where old yards have been renovated and new ones built, and all humming with activity. Even the Navy is turning to these yards and a New Orleans plant is turning out fast motor torpedo boats made of wood plastic and plywood. But nowhere is there a section more suited and more ready for wooden ship construction than Grays Harbor. We built them in the last war and should in this.

Mr. R. H. Calkins, marine editor of the Seattle Times, wrote the following article which was published on June 2:

WOODEN-SHIP REVIVAL URGED

Seattle's wooden-ship building industry, which reached its peak during the World War days, may be revived.

Representative MARTIN SMITH, Democrat of Washington, in an address in the House today, reiterated his prediction of a steel shortage and urged construction of wooden merchant ships in yards of the Pacific Northwest, the Associated Press reported.

During the World War wooden freighters were built in Seattle and other Pacific Northwest ports for General Pershing's bridge of ships.

"There is no reason why merchant ships should be constructed exclusively of steel," SMITH said, adding:

"We should immediately utilize the idle wooden-ship yards of the Pacific Northwest, where the raw materials are plentiful and the idle ship carpenters and mechanics are ready to go to work and assist in turning out the ships which are needed so sorely."

"May be decisive factor"

Merchant shipping is becoming even a more important factor in the present war than in the World War and "it may prove the decisive factor," he said.

A year ago, SMITH said, he told officials of the National Defense Council, the Office of Production Management, and the Maritime Commission, that the supply of steel was not adequate for ship construction.

SMITH said his statements "were clearly discounted and I was given to understand that there was no possibility of a steel shortage and no serious thought was being given to any extensive wooden-ship building program."

"The United States Maritime Committee and the Bureau of Ships, United States Navy, have restricted their shipbuilding activity almost entirely to steel construction, and there has been little or no wooden construction," he continued.

Steel demands mount

"In the meantime, the demands for steel for munitions have been enormous—and we are hardly started—until it is now becoming a recognized fact that we will soon be facing a serious shortage of steel, the very condition which I pointed out last summer and last autumn and this spring was likely to occur."

There is "no method of undoing what has already been done," said Smith, "but we can turn around and get headed in the right direction on this shipbuilding program. There is no reason why merchant ships should be constructed exclusively of steel.

"The logical and most effective method of successfully meeting the U-boat challenge and preparing ourselves for the future, is an all-out shipbuilding program."

Mr. Speaker, our duty in regard to this momentous matter is clearly marked. Every sound consideration impels our Government to undertake and encourage at once an all-out wooden-merchant-ship building program in every section of our country in which the necessary lumber and skilled labor await utilization. In my own congressional district we have the communities of Shelton, Longview, Grays Harbor, Vancouver, Willapa Harbar, and Olympia, in which such a program can and should be carried on speedily and vigorously. The Macedonian call is for "ships, ships, and more ships." We can supply them. To hesitate any longer to do so is to betray the very cause to which we stand committed. To further delay the program is to place in jeopardy the very victory over the enemy which we are all so anxious and eager to achieve in the briefest possible period of time.

MEMORANDUM OF RECENT DEVELOPMENTS IN SHIPPING CRISIS

June 3: The German high command reported today that the German Navy and air force destroyed 746,000 tons of British merchant shipping space in May.

By contrast, London Admiralty declared British merchant shipping losses in April totalled 488,124 tons—more than half the German figure.

Since the beginning of the war, German sea and air units have destroyed a total of 11,664,000 tons of British shipping, the Germans claim.

British merchant tonnage at the outset of the war was estimated at about 21,000,000 tons. British figures on Allied shipping losses through April total approximately 6,000,000 tons.

The newspaper Boersen Zietung, commenting on these figures, said Britain thus had lost during 21 months of the war as much shipping as English shipyards were able to construct in 11 years of peace.

Scoffing at the idea Britain's need for ships could be filled by the United States in time to save her from defeat, the paper declared that according to English figures only 27 vessels totaling 221,000 tons were launched in American shipyards during the past 4 months.

The American Bureau of Shipping in New York recently announced figures showing the launching and delivery of 27 vessels of 221,000 tons up to May 1 this year, compared with 16 ships of 107,280 tons in the same period of 1940.

This new construction, it was pointed out, is only one-third of Britain's reported shipping losses for May alone—estimated by the German high command at 746,000 tons. Dienst aus Deutschland, authoritative news commentary, said that since February Britain had lost an average of 730,000 tons monthly.

Adolf Hitler's newspaper, Voelkischer Beobachter, said President Roosevelt failed to state the case when he said in his fireside chat May 27 that "the present rate of Nazi sinkings of merchant ships is more than three times as high as the capacity of British shipyards to replace them." In reality, the paper declared, sinkings during the past few months have been more than 10 times as great as British building capacity.

The records of the United States Maritime Commission show that as of June 1, 88 cargo steel vessels have been delivered under the long range program. Deliveries under the Maritime Commission program are expected to approximate 700,000 tons during the calendar year, which is less than the 746,000 tons of British merchant shipping alleged to have been destroyed in May.

The Defense Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN Z. ANDERSON
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 16, 1941

CORRESPONDENCE OF HON. JOHN Z. ANDERSON, OF CALIFORNIA, AND THE SECRETARY OF THE NAVY

Mr. ANDERSON of California. Mr. Speaker, the country and the Congress are vitally interested in the progress of our defense program. In this regard I desire to extend in the RECORD the following correspondence between the Secretary of the Navy and myself:

MAY 26, 1941.

Hon. FRANK KNOX,
Secretary of the Navy,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: My attention has been called to a statement which you made in your recent press conference with reference to the number of Navy planes that have been delivered since the first of January 1941. According to the newspapers you announced that 996 naval planes had been delivered so far this year. As a member of the Naval Affairs Committee, I am concerned over the fact that we appear to be falling behind schedule in the acquisition of planes.

According to the testimony of Admiral Towers before the Naval Affairs Committee on January 7, 1941, the total number of naval planes to be delivered by May 1 amounted to 1,230. Admiral Towers stated that we would acquire 334 in January, 263 in February, 299 in March, 334 in April.

It appears therefore that with only 996 planes delivered in the first 4 months of 1941 we are presently 234 planes behind scheduled delivery. I would appreciate having your comments as to the reasons for the delay and would like to know if the deficiency will be made up in the near future.

Thanking you for an early reply and with every good wish, I am

Sincerely yours,

J. Z. ANDERSON.

DEPARTMENT OF THE NAVY,
Office of the Secretary,
Washington, June 4, 1941.

MY DEAR MR. ANDERSON: This will acknowledge receipt of your letter of May 26, 1941, inquiring as to the reasons for delays of delivery of airplanes on order for the Navy. Specific inquiry was made as to discrepancies in the number of airplanes scheduled for delivery during the months of January, February, March, and April, as testified by Admiral Towers to the Naval Affairs Committee on January 17, 1941, in comparison to the actual deliveries made to the Navy by various contractors during those months.

Testifying before the Naval Affairs Committee on January 17, 1941, Admiral Towers submitted to the committee the total number of airplanes scheduled to be delivered to the Navy, as follows:

January	334
February	263
March	299
April	334
Total	1,230

Actual deliveries during those months were as follows:

January	297
February	185
March	243
Total	996

The schedules submitted by Admiral Towers were based upon reports submitted by the manufacturers themselves as checked by the inspectors of naval aircraft at the individual plants. Admiral Towers mentioned that deliveries had been falling about 30 percent below schedules and that while it might be expected that deliveries in the early part of the calendar year 1941 would not meet the schedules, based upon British experience, airplane production showed a tendency to exceed schedules during the latter stages of production, and he hoped that the total deliveries for the calendar year 1941 would match the total number of airplanes scheduled for delivery during the year. It is seen that actual deliveries during the first 4 months of calendar year 1941 were approximately 81 percent of the airplanes scheduled for delivery in that period.

Reasons for delay are many. Primarily, manufacturers tend to set schedules which they know are the maximum of their ability to produce. This acts as a goal for their employees, as it is a definite incentive toward maximum production. In many cases manufacturers have been delayed due to shortage of materials, tools, and component parts. Such shortages can be attributed to the fact that the expansion of prime contractors becomes effective prior to the expansion of the subcontractors who supply materials and the component parts.

In order to facilitate the best possible allocation of aircraft material, equipment, and accessories, a scheduling unit has been set up by the Joint Aircraft Committee under the control of the Office of Production Management. This unit is in operation at Wright Field and is utilizing the facilities of the material division of the Army Air Corps. It is hoped that through the supervision of this unit deliveries of aircraft will be expedited and production schedules more closely attained.

The Navy Department, together with all governmental agencies associated with the production of aircraft, is keeping in close touch with airplane deliveries and is exerting every possible effort to expedite those deliveries by relieving bottlenecks, assigning necessary priorities, and in assisting the manufacturers in maintaining production.

Very truly yours,

FRANK KNOX.

Oil Shortage Remedy

REMARKS
OF
HON. EDITH NOURSE ROGERS
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 16, 1941

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, Governor Landon in calling unwarranted any oil shortage or curtailment thereof with respect to gasless Sundays, and so forth, said, in part:

I say a needless loss because first the English companies have not removed their tankers from their private commercial trade to supply their armed forces, yet that is what the American companies are being asked to do.

Governor Landon made a practical suggestion as to how to avoid unnecessary hardships. He goes further and proposes that tank cars not now in use should be used to transport oil to New England. New England will be the hardest hit by this so-called oil shortage.

I also want to bring out the fact, Mr. Speaker, to the Members of the House that if the tank cars are used and there is any curtailment of the use of passenger cars, this will work a great hardship on the traveling public and also a tremendous hardship on the railroad brotherhood unions. Many of them will be put out of employment.

I have a conference arranged with Secretary Ickes tomorrow, and I know the entire membership of the House will aid in seeing that New England does not suffer from any oil shortage.

The article referred to is as follows:

ICKES' THREAT UNWARRANTED, LANDON SAYS—FORMER G. O. P. CANDIDATE OFFERS IDEAS TO CURE SHORTAGE; GIVES OIL MEN'S THOUGHTS

(By Merryle Stanley Rukeyser)

TOPEKA, KANS., June 14.—Alf M. Landon, independent oil operator and Republican candidate for President in 1936, today described the threat by Secretary Ickes of gasless Sundays and other restrictions on oil consumption in the East as unwarranted and unnecessary.

Landon, in a statement to International News Service, expressed what many oil men are thinking, although most of them have been reluctant to discuss the Ickes threat in public.

Landon believes the reason for this reluctance is fear that the new oil Administrator might crack down on those who openly oppose his program.

After pointing to the prospective economic loss incidental to the tentative Ickes plan, Landon suggested constructive alternatives.

SEES GREAT LOSS

"The limiting of petroleum products in the populous Eastern States will cause great loss to those communities," the former two-time Governor of Kansas declared. "It will inflict a needless loss on all business connected with farmers. The threat of not enough oil for winter heating purposes is frightening too many people, and threatens to put them to extra and needless expense and to cause loss of employment in the oil industry."

Then, giving a practical oil operator's proposal of how to avoid such unnecessary hardship, Landon added:

"I say a needless loss because, first, the English companies have not removed their tankers from their private commercial trade to supply their armed forces. Yet that is what American companies are being asked to do.

POINTS WAY TO AID

"Second, in considering the practicality of the artificial shortage of petroleum products for the populous Eastern States—a shortage which the administration created by diverting privately owned American tankers to the English supply—I think there are several things that can be done to help the English, which most of us devoutly desire to do, without at the same time upsetting the economic and home life of the Eastern States:

"(A) One thing would involve cooperation among the oil companies not permitted by the antitrust law. I would imagine that one of the first things Mr. Ickes would have to do is to secure a definite and binding consent from the Department of Justice to this cooperation on the part of the oil companies. This is because the Department of Justice has just finished prosecuting oil companies and oil-company executives for doing what Mr. Ickes asked them to do back in the N. R. A. days. Therefore, obtaining the necessary protection from future prosecution for violating the anti-trust laws, the oil companies, by trading oil and rerouting oil, could do much to increase the delivery of oil through the present pipeline facilities.

"(B) By the use of tank cars not now in use, reversing of the oil stream so that they pump oil eastward instead of westward. Building short pipe-line loops and connecting lines within the already existing system would very considerably increase the delivery of oil immediately."

Is Federal Control of Water-Power Development Incompatible With State Interests?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLYDE T. ELLIS

OF ARKANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 16, 1941

ARTICLE BY HON. JOHN W. SCOTT

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include a discussion of the New River case by Hon. John W. Scott, member of the Federal Power Commission, as carried in the George Washington Law Review, April 1941:

Before discussing the problem posed by the title of this article, I am taking the liberty of sketching in brief outline some of the activities of the Federal Power Commission. I do this because it is felt that too few people have even a general knowledge of the functions and program of this growing Federal agency.

It is well to bear in mind that the Federal Power Commission is in no sense merely a water-power commission. It is true that hydroelectric developments were uppermost in mind when the Federal Water Power Act of 1920 created a board consisting of the Secretaries of War, Agriculture, and the Interior for the purpose of supervising water-power projects to be built under license. In 1930, however, the Commission was given the status of an independent agency, consisting of five members appointed by the President.

By title II of the Public Utility Act of 1935, broad regulatory powers over electric utilities which own or operate facilities for the transmission or sale of electric energy in interstate commerce were conferred upon the Commission. The functions of the Commission were further extended by the Natural Gas Act of 1938, under which the Commission exercises broad regulatory powers over natural-gas companies engaged in the transportation of natural gas in interstate commerce and in the sale in interstate commerce of natural gas for resale.

In carrying out the many regulatory functions delegated to it by Congress, the Commission has borrowed from the principles of preventive medicine and is trying innovations which have as their purpose a speeding up of the regulatory process. Emphasis is being laid upon preventing abuses rather than in correcting them after they have occurred.

One of the important steps in this direction was the prescribing by our Commission (joined in by 27 State commissions) of a uniform system of accounts, requiring electric utilities to record their properties at the original cost. Moreover, the Commission is attempting to eliminate inflation from utility plant accounts, correct haphazard practices with respect to setting up depreciation reserves, and to forestall the issuance of watered securities which eventually would have an inescapably adverse effect upon consumer rates. Comprehensive reports are required from utilities under our regulation, and worthwhile statistics are being published and made available to the public. Anyone desiring to investigate these data may obtain important information concerning the business operations of utilities under our jurisdiction and determine therefrom, in some degree, the effectiveness of regulation.

This article will not permit an extended discussion of the many interesting activities carried on by the Commission. Suffice it to say that our agency endeavors, in passing upon the problems coming before it, to achieve a solution thereof consistent with the public interest.

Stimulated interest in water-power development is evident as a result of the recent Supreme Court decision in the Appalachian Electric Power Co., New River, case. Immediately following the Court's pronouncement it was charged that "every creek in the country" will be under Federal control and "States' rights have been destroyed." The implication effected by these statements is that the interests of the people will most certainly suffer by reason of Federal control of water-power development in and upon the navigable waters of the United States. Let us examine the problem more closely.

Obviously, the decision defines the constitutional power of the United States over navigable waters and clarifies the claims of riparian owners and the States themselves in connection with streams under Federal jurisdiction. Application of the principles announced by the Court in the New River case effects a theoretical impingement upon claimed States' rights but actually the act determined valid by the Court, by express provisions, protects the people in the enjoyment of substantial rights and benefits heretofore considered a sacred States' rights heritage. To merely make this statement raises the question—

Is Federal control of water-power development incompatible with the best interests of the people of the several States?

An intelligent answer to the question requires an examination of the historical background of the Federal Water Power Act, enacted after many years of agitation on the part of farsighted individuals and groups who advocated conservation of the water resources of our country for the use and benefit of all the people.

Conservation of our natural resources was first born in the hearts and brains of those who placed the public good first. When Theodore Roosevelt called the conference of Governors at the White House in 1908, he stated that the meeting was "called to consider the weightiest problem now before the Nation. * * * The natural resources of our country are in danger of exhaustion if we permit the old wasteful methods of exploiting them longer to continue." It was realized then that our great forests were being rapidly denuded, soils impoverished, and our magnificent streams polluted.

Gifford Pinchot, erstwhile Governor of Pennsylvania and former head of our Forest Service, has stated that the "struggle for control of water power began when the United States Forest Service, first among Government organizations, undertook to control and direct the private development of water power within (its) jurisdiction—that is, on streams in the national forests." The venerable forester made the further significant observation that before that fight began "the electric power interests were all for Federal control—because there wasn't any. Now these same interests are all for State control—because for nearly all practical purposes there isn't any."

It was the early practice to secure special authorization from Congress for the development of power sites on streams under Federal jurisdiction. This, however, was abruptly halted by the conservationists under the leadership of Pinchot and Theodore Roosevelt. On January 15, 1909, just before his retirement from office, the latter, in vetoing the James River bill, made this significant statement:

"The great corporations are acting with foresight, singleness of purpose, and vigor to control the water powers of the country. They pay no attention to State boundaries and are not interested in the constitutional law affecting navigable streams except as it affords what has been aptly called a twilight zone from any regulation."

Of the struggle, Kerwin relates:

"It is the old story. When clever legal representatives of rich corporations could fashion their arguments to play upon those prejudices of legislators built upon theories of State sovereignty or of laissez faire, they were all but invincible."

Conservationists never wavered in their support of strong Federal control of the development of the Nation's vast water resources. To them great credit should be given for the passage of the Federal Water Power Act of 1920 which is essentially a conservation measure.

This act created the Federal Power Commission and gave it authority to license, for not more than 50 years, water-power developments located on lands of the United States and waters subject to Federal control. It recognized such hydroelectric developments to be essentially a public business that might be entrusted to private enterprise to the extent it served the predominant public interest in the development of the Nation's water resources in an orderly, comprehensive manner.

The Power Act provides for the right of the United States to take over projects at the end of the license period. The Government may exercise this right of recapture only upon the condition that before taking possession it shall pay the net investment of the licensee in the project or projects taken, not to exceed the fair value of the property. Inflation of project costs through valuations placed on goodwill, going value, prospective revenues, or on water rights and lands in excess of the actual reasonable cost of such properties at the time of acquisition is prohibited.

Let us consider the scope of the Commission's licensing jurisdiction. The authority delegated under the act rests ultimately upon the right of Congress (1) to require its consent before anyone may occupy power sites located on lands of the United States, and (2) to require its consent for the use of waters subject to Federal control under the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution.

Article 1, section 8, clause 3, of the Constitution provides:

"The Congress shall have power * * * to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes."

It is interesting to note that, historically, this power of the Federal Government resulted from the third great compromise of the Constitutional Convention. New England wanted the central government to have control over foreign commerce and over commerce between the States. South Carolina and Georgia wanted that matter left to the States. New England wanted the slave trade abolished at once and slavery abolished in 1808. The two Carolinas would not enter the Union unless the question of slavery was left to the States, but were willing to consent that the slave trade be abolished at the time named by New England. With reference to this compromise, Young, in his "The American Statesman," gives the following account of how the question of Federal control over interstate commerce was settled:

"Thus, by an understanding or, as Gouverneur Morris called it 'a bargain,' between the commercial representatives of the northern States, and the delegates of South Carolina and Georgia, and in spite of the opposition of Maryland and Virginia, the unrestricted power of Congress to pass navigation laws was conceded to the northern merchants, and to the Carolina rice planters, as an equivalent, twenty years' continuance of the African slave-trade."

What is the nature and extent of the Commission's jurisdiction when no public lands are involved and when constitutional authority must rest solely on the commerce clause?

Undoubtedly, the authors of this clause contemplated that the Federal Government would have authority to prevent the States from interfering with the freedom of commercial intercourse between themselves or with foreign nations. The clause itself, however, contains no such limitation. It contains an express grant of power to Congress to regulate commerce.

Chief Justice Marshall, in the early case of Gibbons against Ogden, decided that commerce under the Constitution comprehended navigation, and that "a power to regulate navigation is as expressly granted as if that term had been added to the word 'commerce.'" It followed therefrom that Congress might regulate the navigable waterways as highways of interstate commerce.

Congress has declared in the Federal Water Power Act of 1920, as amended, that it shall be unlawful to construct and operate a hydroelectric development "across, along, or in any of the navigable waters of the United States" without a license issued by the Commission.

Prior to its decision in the New River case, the Supreme Court of the United States, in the Montello case, said that though there had been rapids and falls with carrying places in the Fox River in Wisconsin, the lower court erred in ruling that the stream was not navigable before it was improved, on the ground there were obstructions to unbroken navigation.

In refusing to accept the tests of navigability adopted by the trial court, it further stated:

"for it would exclude many of the great rivers of the country which were so interrupted by rapids as to require artificial means to enable them to be navigated without break. Indeed, there are but few of our fresh-water rivers which did not originally present serious obstructions to an uninterrupted navigation."

And in Economy Light and Power Company v. United States, the highest court in the land stated:

"Navigability, in the sense of the law, is not destroyed because the watercourse is interrupted by occasional natural obstructions or portages; nor need the navigation be open at all seasons of the year, or at all stages of the water."

Moreover, the Supreme Court, in United States v. Rio Grande Dam and Irrigation Company, in construing the Rivers and Harbors Act of 1890 prohibiting "the creation of any obstruction, not affirmatively authorized by law, to the navigable capacity of any waters, in respect of which the United States has jurisdiction," held that Congress could control the erection of structures in nonnavigable tributaries which might affect the navigability of the waters into which the tributaries flow. In addition, Congress, in the Federal Water Power Act of 1920, as amended, defined for the first time "navigable waters of the United States."

It was with this background of judicial pronouncement and congressional declaration that the Supreme Court considered the contentions made with respect to jurisdiction of the Federal Power Commission in the Appalachian Electric Power Co. case. The company (a riparian owner with a State license) had refused to accept a standard license for the construction and operation of its hydroelectric plant on the New River, near Radford, Va., as required by the provisions of the Federal Power Act. It contended, among other things, that the river was not navigable in fact and hence not navigable in law.

It also challenged statutory conditions for a license, among which are included sections 10 (a), requiring that the project be best adapted to a comprehensive plan for improving or developing the waterway for the use or benefit of interstate commerce, for the improvement and utilization of water-power development, and for beneficial public uses, including recreational purposes; 10 (c), requiring the licensee to maintain a project adequately for navigation and for efficient power operation and to maintain depreciation reserves adequate for renewals and replacements; 10 (d), requiring that out of surplus earned after the first 20 years above a specified reasonable rate of return licensee must maintain amortization reserves to be applied in the reduction of net investment; 10 (e), requiring the payment to the United States of reasonable annual charges; and 14, giving the United States the right, upon expiration of the license, to take over and operate the project by paying the licensee the "net investment" as defined, not to exceed the fair value of the property taken.

Forty-one States, through their attorneys general, joined the company in denying the authority of the Commission. Notwithstanding the fact that both lower courts had found in favor of the company, Mr. Justice Reed, speaking for a majority of the Court, in sweeping aside respondent's claims and the contention of the States, stated:

"The power of the United States over its waters * * * arises from the commerce clause of the Constitution. * * * The Federal Government has domination over the waterpower inherent in the flowing stream. It is liable to no one for its use or nonuse. The flow of a navigable stream is in no sense private property. * * * Exclusion of riparian owners from its benefits without compensation is entirely within the Government's discretion. * * * It is quite true that the criticized provisions summarized above are not essential to or even concerned with navigation as such. * * * In our view, it cannot properly be said that the constitutional power of the United States over its waters is limited to control for navigation. * * * Flood protection, watershed development, recovery of the cost of improvements through utilization of power are likewise parts of commerce control. * * * That authority is as broad as the needs of commerce. * * * The license conditions to which objection is made have an obvious relationship to the exercise of the commerce power. * * * In our view, this 'is the price which (respondents) must pay to secure the right to maintain their dam.' * * * Such an acquisition or such an option to acquire is not an invasion of the sovereignty of a State. At the formation of the Union, the States delegated to the Federal Government authority to regulate commerce among the States. So long as the things done within the States by the United States are valid under that power, there can be no interference with the sovereignty of the State."

This pronouncement of the Court will serve as a constitutional beacon light in the field of conservation.

Congress has heretofore recognized, and now the Supreme Court places its imprimatur upon the fundamental concept that the water resources of America—the totality of things inherent in and related to proper watershed development, long illusory—belong to, and may be realized and possessed by, the people of America.

Merely to recite the plain implications of the New River decision makes obvious its tremendous importance. It brushes aside many uncertainties of the past and with refreshing courage brings sound legal reasoning to support the almost evangelical program of the early conservationists that the water resources of the Nation should be conserved and utilized in the public interest.

In my opinion, it excludes any further reasonable doubt that—

1. The plenary Federal power over commerce must develop with the needs of commerce and is as broad as those needs.

2. The constitutional power of the United States over its waters is not limited to control for navigation; navigability is but a part of the whole; flood protection, watershed development, recovery of the cost of improvements through the utilization of power are likewise parts of commerce control.

3. Navigable waters are subject to national planning and control and the broad regulation of commerce granted to the Federal Government.

4. If reasonable improvements, though not made or authorized, will make a river available for interstate traffic, the stream is navigable. This includes consideration of the time element whereby a river not reasonably susceptible to navigation improvements in bygone years may subsequently become so in the light of industrial trends, population growth, or engineering advances.

5. The Federal Government has domination over the water power inherent in the flowing streams.

6. The Federal Government has power to condition a license for the construction of a hydroelectric project.

7. The flow of a navigable stream is in no sense private property and exclusion of riparian owners from its benefits without compensation is entirely within the Government's discretion.

8. The exercise by the United States of authority valid under the Federal Constitution results in no interference with State sovereignty.

9. Since the United States might erect structures in these waters itself, even one equipped for the generation of electric energy, it may constitutionally acquire one already built.

An orderly development of our water resources, however, would appear to require exercise of Federal authority over projects located upon nonnavigable reaches or tributaries of streams wherein such construction and operation will affect the downstream navigable capacity of any river. Otherwise, the benefits accruing from developments under license on the lower waters, in many instances, could be destroyed through the construction and operation of upstream projects; the comprehensive development of a river basin for the maximum possible benefit to the public of the water resources of the region, might be thwarted; and navigation in the lower reaches seriously impaired.

In this regard, attention is invited to the authority and responsibility of the Commission under section 4 (r) of the act, as amended:

"To make investigations and to collect and record data concerning the utilization of the water resources of any region to be developed, the water-power industry and its relation to other industries and to interstate or foreign commerce, and concerning the location, capacity, development costs, and relation to markets of power sites, and whether the power from Government dams can be advantageously used by the United States for its public purposes, and what is a fair value of such power, to the extent the Commission may deem necessary or useful for the purposes of this act" (16 U. S. C. A., sec. 797).

In addition, section 10 (a), as amended, states that all licenses issued under this part will be on the following conditions:

"That the project adopted, including the maps, plans, and specifications, shall be such as in the judgment of the commission will be best adapted to a comprehensive plan for improving or developing a waterway or waterways for the use or benefit of interstate or foreign commerce, for the improvement and utilization of water-power development, and for other beneficial public uses, including recreational purposes; and if necessary in order to secure such plan the Commission shall have authority to require the modification of any project and of the plans and specifications of the project works before approval." (16 U. S. C. A., sec. 803.)

Thus Congress has, with regard to proposed water-power projects to be licensed and regions to be developed, expressed very broad objectives for attainment. To meet these requires a comprehensive study of the entire river basin. This, obviously, is essential to make certain that a proposed development will not only conserve and utilize to the fullest possible extent the power resources of a particular site, but also will be an integral part of a comprehensive plan to conserve and utilize in the public interest all the water resources of the entire river basin. Licensing authority over merely the developments on "navigable waters," defined as we have noted, would appear insufficient if the objectives expressed by Congress are to be attained.

Congress has not so limited its grant of licensing authority. It has provided in section 23 (b) of the act, as amended:

"Any person, association, corporation, State, or municipality intending to construct a dam or other project works across, along, over, or in any stream or part thereof, other than those defined herein as navigable waters, and over which Congress has jurisdiction under its authority to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States shall before such construction file declaration of such intention with the Commission, whereupon the Commission shall cause immediate investigation of such proposed construction to be made, and if upon investigation it shall find that the interests of interstate or foreign commerce would be affected by such proposed construction, such person, association, corporation, State, or municipality shall not construct, maintain, or operate such dam or other project works until it shall have applied for and shall have received a license under the provisions of this act. If the Commission shall not so find, and if no public lands or reservations are affected, permission is hereby granted to construct such dam or other project works in such stream upon compliance with State laws" (16 U. S. C. A., sec. 817).

Under this section of the act the Commission performs a function of jurisdictional fact finding. In this regard it is interesting to note that of the 158 declarations of intention filed since its creation in 1920, the Commission has found in approximately half of them that the construction proposed would not affect the interest of interstate or foreign commerce. By reason of Commission action, therefore, a large number of the proposed projects were not required to be placed under Federal license.

Although the Federal Power Act, validated by the New River decision, asserts the dominant jurisdiction of the Federal Government over the navigable waters of the Nation, the act recognizes the substantive rights of the people to enjoy the use of such water resources on a preferential basis through their States and municipalities. Section 7 (a) of the act requires the Commission to give preference to applications by States and municipalities for a license to construct, operate, and maintain dams, powerhouses, or other project works necessary for the development, transmission, and utilization of electric power across or in any of the streams or other bodies of water over which Congress has jurisdiction or upon any part of the public lands and reservations of the United States. The sole conditions imposed upon the granting of such preference to States and municipalities is that the plans proposed be best adapted to develop, conserve, and utilize in the public interest the water resources of the region and that the applicant is able to carry out the plans.

Upon the filing of an application for a license or a preliminary permit under section 4 of the act, the Commission is required to give written notice at once of such application to any State or municipality likely to be interested in or affected thereby. Any State or municipality likely to be affected is permitted to object thereto and show cause why the license should not be issued, including, for example, the desire of the State or municipality to apply for a license. The Commission is required to allow to a State or municipality applying for a license a reasonable time to cause its plan to be made equally well adapted to the best development of the water resources as the plans of other applicants.

Moreover, section 9 (b) of the act requires the Commission to obtain satisfactory evidence that the applicant has complied with the requirements of the laws of the State or States within which the proposed project is to be located with respect to bed and banks and to the appropriation, diversion, and use of water for power purposes and with respect to the right to engage in the business of developing, transmitting, and distributing power, and in any other business necessary to effect the purposes of a license under the act.

Licenses for the development, transmission, or distribution of electric energy by States or municipalities shall be issued and enjoyed without charge to the extent the power is sold to the public without profit or is used by such State or municipality for State or municipal purposes. Licenses for developments to furnish energy for domestic, mining, or other beneficial use in projects of not more than 100 horsepower installed capacity, shall also be issued without charge unless on tribal lands within Indian reservations in which case the proceeds go to the credit of the Indians of such reservation.

The right of any State or municipality to take over, maintain, and operate any project licensed under the act at any time by condemnation proceedings upon payment of just compensation is expressly reserved under section 14 thereof.

States, likewise, benefit directly from the fees and charges collected annually from licensees for the occupancy and use of national forests and public lands within the boundaries of any State. Of the total receipts from such charges only 12½ percent is retained by the Federal Government. Of the balance, 37½ percent is paid by the Secretary of the Treasury to the State within which the project is located. The remaining 50 percent of such charges is paid into the reclamation fund, created by the Reclamation Act, approved June 17, 1902, which fund benefits the States through reclamation projects. The total of such receipts has amounted to about $1,500,000.

As a condition of every license, the licensee developing, transmitting, or distributing power for sale or use in public service, "shall abide by such reasonable regulation of the services to be rendered to customers or consumers of power, and of rates and charges of payments therefor, as may from time to time be prescribed by any duly constituted agency of the State in which the service is rendered or the rate charged * * *."

It is expressly provided in section 27 of the act that nothing therein shall be construed as affecting or intending to affect or in any way to interfere with the laws of the respective States relating to the control, appropriation, use or distribution of water used in irrigation or for domestic or municipal uses, or any vested rights acquired therein.

In carefully providing for the right of States and municipalities to use the water resources of the Nation and for Federal control of water-power development, Congress recognized the national character of the problem of utilizing and conserving such resources. Nature has no respect for arbitrary State lines. Its blessings are bestowed—rains fall and snows blanket the slopes of our mountains—without regard for political subdivisions. Streams, river basins, and watersheds, which constitute these great natural resources, are unaware of State boundaries, and obviously their proper development in the public interest cannot be so confined.

But notwithstanding the plenary power of the Federal Government over these water resources, Congress in its wisdom has carefully refrained in the Federal Power Act from exercising its maximum constitutional authority over these resources or to limit the enjoyment of them by the people of the several States. Congress has expressly provided, as we have observed, for the preferential use and enjoyment of these resources by the States and municipalities, as well as for their conservation and development for power and other beneficial purposes.

Obviously, with many provisions of the act protecting States and municipalities, no substantial States' rights have been invaded or usurped.

A sound national economy in the years to come would appear to require progressive stream planning and orderly development of the water resources of the country. This can be substantially accomplished under the provisions of the Federal Power Act without doing violence to the best interests of the people of the several States. The act recognizes the fundamental importance of the development of the watershed systems of the Nation, yet protects the people of the States in their enjoyment of the benefits to be derived therefrom. This character of program will ultimately bring to all of our people maximum benefits from multiple-purpose projects combining, where possible, facilities for navigation, flood control, irrigation, recreation, pollution abatement, and the generation of electric energy.

The answer to the question posed by the title of this article, therefore, is in the negative; Federal control and States' rights in water power resources are compatible. The express provisions of the Federal Power Act impel that conclusion.

A Pledge by College Women

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM L. NELSON

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 16, 1941

Mr. NELSON. Mr. Speaker, in my home city, Columbia, Mo., is Stephens

College, with an attendance of more than 1,800 young women, representing every State in the Union and, in addition, a number of foreign countries. A few weeks ago, at commencement time, my attention was attracted to a story appearing in many papers and which referred to a pledge as made by the members of the 1941 graduating class. Greatly interested, I wrote President James M. Wood for further information, and now have a reply, as follows:

About a year ago a message came to the president of our student body from Mr. Bruce Gould, editor of the Ladies' Home Journal. In this message he stated, "In a recent public address, Mr. Archibald MacLeish made the statement that unless America regains its sense of values worth fighting for, we had just as well leave our airplanes unbuilt and our battleships on paper. What, in your judgment and that of your fellow students, are the values in a democracy that are worth fighting for?" Her reply, printed in the April issue of the Ladies' Home Journal, was substantially this: "A democracy to me is a form of political organization where every man, woman, and child is an individual personality. As such he is endowed with certain rights that can be taken from him by no majority, nor minority group, and by no institution, whether it be church or state. Among these rights are the right to think, to act, to speak, and to worship God according to the dictates of his own conscience. I received these as a heritage from my father and my father's fathers. They rest upon my shoulders as a responsibility to pass them on to my children and to my children's childen. If it comes to a choice between passing this heritage on unchanged to them and my own life, my life is a small forfeit to pay."

This question and the reply naturally caused considerable discussion amongst the students on our campus during the past year. About 2 weeks before school closed, the senior class met in a body and appointed a committee of 25 to draw up a statement that would represent the ideals for which they wished to stand. This they had printed in a little booklet, a copy of which I wired my secretary last night to forward you by air mail. This committee also prepared the statement of principles that was placed in your hands. Two days before commencement a committee of the senior class waited upon me and asked that they be given a place on the program on commencement day. They stated neither the objective nor the speaker. On that day they presented to me a scroll signed voluntarily by every member of the class.

The scroll referred to carries pledges and principles as follows:

THIS I WILL DO

1. Fight unwaveringly for the principles of democracy in my town, my State, and my Nation.

2. Fight for the education of women in democratic ideals and democratic realities so that all women, working from the American home, can help to safeguard the spirit of democracy in a world in which democracy is under increasing attack.

3. Fight for the stimulation of increased spiritual faith and spiritual vision without which no democracy can long endure.

4. Fight against all undemocratic forces in American life, whether such forces be foreign-inspired or home-born in the hour of the Nation's stress.

5. Fight those philosophies of government which would reduce men to soulless automatons and women to kitchen slaves and mere incubators for the state.

6. Fight, if war should come, with the same courage and sacrifice with which our American men will fight, so that our lines on the home front, as well as on the battle front, shall prove impregnable.

7. Fight, always and forever, for American justice, tolerance, and freedom so they may stand unhampered and unhindered as the hope and glory of a world.

It is my understanding that it is the hope of those initiating this novel movement of young people that it may find expression in every alumni group of the college, and in fact, throughout the youth of the Nation as a whole.

Radio Program of Veterans of Foreign Wars

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH R. BRYSON

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 16, 1941

RADIO ADDRESS OF HON. JOSEPH R. BRYSON, OF SOUTH CAROLINA, AND MISS BETTY JENSEN

Mr. BRYSON. Mr. Speaker, the Veterans of Foreign Wars presented a program over radio station WWDC last night, June 15, 1941. Under leave to extend my remarks, I include the proceedings of this meeting inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD:

Theme: Star-Spangled Banner (transcription).

Mr. NORMAN REED. "I believe in the United States of America as a Government of the people, by the people, for the people; whose just powers are derived from the consent of the governed; a democracy in a Republic; a sovereign Nation of many sovereign States; a perfect Union, one and inseparable; established upon those principles of freedom, equality, justice, and humanity for which American patriots sacrificed their lives and fortunes. I therefore believe it is my duty to my country to love it, to support its Constitution, to obey its laws, to respect its flag, and to defend it against all enemies."

Announcer GOFF. That was the American's Creed, written by William Tyler Page, which introduces another in the series of programs arranged under the auspices of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, and dedicated to National Civilian Defense.

It is now our pleasure to introduce E. R. Burton, of the publicity committee, Veterans of Foreign Wars, Department of Virginia, who will take charge of tonight's program. Mr. Burton.

Mr. BURTON. Thank you, Mr. Goff.

Good evening, ladies and gentlemen. The Cross of Malta is on the air again. We expect to have a man from the National Civilian Defense Committee on the air in a couple of weeks to answer any questions that any of you might want answered about home defense. If you have any questions that you would like to have answered over the air, write them in to V. F. W. in care of station WWDC, 1000 Connecticut Avenue, Washington, D. C. Write in your comments on this program. We would like to have your comments.

Our first speaker tonight was to have been the Honorable BEN F. JENSEN, United States Congressman from the seventh district of Iowa, one of the best friends the veterans have on Capitol Hill. Last night he received a telegram that one of his World War buddies was dead in Iowa; he took a plane out of Washington to be at the funeral today. His daughter, Miss Betty Jensen, has graciously consented to read her father's message for us tonight. Miss Betty Jensen, now pinch-hitting for her father. Miss Jensen.

Fellow citizens, at the outset of my remarks I wish to pay my respects to the Veterans of Foreign Wars, who are sponsoring these programs for civilian defense in this vicinity under the able leadership of my good friend, E. R. Burton. To WWDC, who are so generously contributing the facilities of their station for this worthy cause, we all owe a debt of gratitude.

While I am one of the great majority of Americans who does not feel an invasion of this country can be made by any foreign nation or combination of nations against a strong national defense here, yet I am aware that he who sows safety reaps happiness. Consequently I propose to cooperate to the fullest extent of the civilian-defense program by acting in a cool, deliberate manner and urge every loyal American to do likewise, without fanning the flames of war fear and hysteria in any way.

How simple our civilian defense program would be if we in America could say and know that all the people of this free land really did appreciate to the fullest the many blessings they enjoy under the protecting furls of Old Glory, the symbol of everything that is fine and pure and good.

So I say to you tonight, my fellow citizens, that unless we can instill that love of country and all true devotion to our flag into the hearts and minds of an overwhelming majority of the people in our land, who will guard our portals against the onslaught of every and all subversive doctrine from within as well as from without, then our efforts in this program will surely come to naught. Our flag, the symbol of liberty and tolerance, that banner of freedom and enlightenment, must mean more to the citizen than it has meant at any time since George Washington and Betsy Ross conceived the design of that revered symbol of our country, or when Abraham Lincoln, with his gaunt figure draped in his shawl, paced the corridors of the White House in the still hours of many nights praying for Divine guidance to keep that flag flying over an unbroken Union. I say that in this hour when the Stars and Stripes float as a banner of hope in a world that is dark with the clouds of war, in a world that is aflame with suspicion and hatred, that flag must mean more to us today than it has in many a generation.

If that flag means to us what it has meant to our forefathers—if it means free government, if it means constitutional liberty and rights, if it means enlightenment and progress, if it means equality of opportunity, if it means the inherent right born in each and every one of us of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness—then that flag will continue to fly from the masthead of a free and invincible Nation.

If it means merely something to be waved by every pressure group that wants special privileges at the hands of a government, if it means merely so much cloth in which demagogs wrap themselves as they make impossible promises to the people, if it means only that paraphernalia of politicians who are willing to destroy the confidence in a nation and in the flag by broken promises and ruined policies, then I say to you there is danger that that revered banner and all it stands for may be made to trail in the dust.

It is time, my fellow citizens, for each one of us to search his heart and honestly, courageously, and sincerely settle in his own mind what that flag really means to him and how he can most effectively defend his home in this hour.

What does the flag mean to us? Does it mean something behind which to hide an un-American purpose? Does it mean something to be invoked when we want to acquire some personal gain? Does it mean something to save merely when we are trying to fool the populace, or does it mean to each one of us here the white purity of purpose which motivated our forefathers when they fought to open up for individual men and women the pathway to higher enlightenment, the pathway to education, the pathway to culture. the pathway to spiritual attainments which must inevitably lead in the end to greater purity of purpose, greater purity of citizenship, and a greater purity of humanity?

Do those red bars mean to us the blood spilled on many a battleground by our forefathers who not only fought and bled and died but who sacrificed, those of them who lived, who denied themselves, who held themselves firm to the high purpose of creating for us and those who are to come after us a rich heritage of this great Nation, with its marvelous resources; with its unparalleled religious and educational institutions; with the highest living levels, the greatest opportunities, the finest systems of transportation, the highest wages, and most modern working conditions ever achieved by anybody since the history of man on earth? Whether we realize it or whether we do not, the red which makes the symbol of freedom what it is, is the red of the blood that was shed by our devoted and consecrated forebears who were willing to die, if need be, that their posterity might live more richly, more intelligently, and reach higher spiritual and cultural attainments than even our forefathers themselves could hope to attain in their day.

Does the blue in that field represent to us the fidelity to our ideal of free government, to the Constitution, to the Bill of Rights, that will cause us to stand fast in the face of all arguments, of all persuasions, of all allurement to forget the way of our fathers and the principles of our forebears? Does that field of blue mean an unswerving constancy to the American way of government and the American way of life which our forefathers sacrificed so much to establish for us?

Do those stars floating in the field of blue represent the fidelity to the purpose of the Infinite, who has seen fit to entrust to the hands of 130,000,000 Americans the trusteeship and the guardianship of the freedom of the world?

Oh, my friends, if Old Glory means that to us, then no power on earth, no combination of dictators and slave-driven peoples can ever tear that glorious banner from its masthead and trail it in the dust of defeat.

If this banner means to us the courage to stand up for the ideals of our forefathers, to stand fast for the ideas for which they were willing to fight and die if need be, then truly Old Glory will never be lowered from the masthead to trail in the dust of defeat.

We are now in this hour at the crossroads of decision. Either we are going to maintain the American way of government and of life in this Nation of ours, or we are going to abandon the American way of government and of life—the way of freedom—under the pressure of aggressions by dictators and their driven slaves.

I wish something that was said recently by someone could be read over the radio to the American people every night before they go to sleep and every morning when they wake up. Let me give you the phrase now, because it is a statement of a fundamental fact: "Slaves were never the masters of free men and never will be." It makes no difference, my friends, whether those slaves be the slaves driven by the dictators, or whether they be the slaves of false belief, mistaken ideas, or designing propaganda.

The question we are discussing here today is the home defense. If the flag does not mean to us those ideals which I have outlined, then there will be little need or little use for home defense.

Three thousand miles of stormy seas separate us on the one hand and six or seven thousand miles on the other, from any potential enemies. Yes, God is good, He made that sea, then He blessed us with America where He willed we should be free. With an enlightened unit of purpose and with confidence in our Government, we have in this Nation an unbounded capacity for producing the blessings of peace. Oh, that we might soon be sending bread, the blessing of peace, to all the enslaved peoples across the sea.

It must be true—it is true—that men fighting willingly and voluntarily for their own liberties and their own hearthstones, will fight more valiantly and more intelligently than men who fight because they are driven to fight by the petty tyrants and despots of dictators.

With what, then, shall our home defense be most concerned at this time?

It must be concerned primarily with defending and preserving the Constitution of the United States.

It must be concerned primarily with the defense and preservation of our constitutional form of government, and our American system of government and of life.

It must be concerned primarily with the defense and the perpetuation of the Bill of Rights.

It must be concerned primarily with vigilance and opposition against those alien doctrines which Communists or Fascists or Nazis or any other minions of absolutism in any form have been so busily spreading among our people.

Make no mistake; any man who opposes free enterprise, or free government, or individual liberty in the United States is an enemy of the people. Any individual or group of individuals who propose to submerge the identity of the American Nation, the American people, and the American flag under any other flag or people is an enemy of the American people.

Anyone who advocates the abandonment of our traditional form of political procedure under the Constitution is an enemy of the people.

Home defense means the defense of American ideals, of the American way of government, of the American way of life, of individual freedom, against the most dangerous subversive influences that have ever assailed this country.

Our home defense in this Nation must need be a defense against the danger of our being buried under the débris of our wrecked ideals much, much more than of any débris of wrecked buildings.

Wrecked buildings may in time be rebuilt, but wrecked ideals are a long time being restored.

How clear was Thomas Jefferson's foresight when he exclaimed, "My God, how little do my countrymen know what precious blessings they are in possession of, and which no other people on earth can enjoy."

"The last hope of human liberty in this world rests on us. We ought for so dear a stake sacrifice every attachment and every enmity. * * * Trusted with the destinies of this Republic * * * the monument of human rights * * * and the depository of the sacred fire of freedom and self-government, whence it is to be lighted up in other regions of the earth, if other regions of the earth shall ever become susceptible of its benign influence * * * to what sacrifices of interest or convenience ought not these considerations to animate us? To what compromises of opinion and inclination, to maintain harmony and union among ourselves, and to preserve from all danger this hallowed ark of human hope and happiness?"

Then you who are listening to my voice might well ask this question: What can I do to be most helpful to my country now? My answer is this, simply and honestly:

Thank God you are an American; then be an American—live it. Love your flag; defend it against all enemies from within and from without. Take part in the civilian defense program; back up the boys who are tenting tonight on the old campground. Pray that peace may soon come to a troubled world and that our boys and our flag may be spared. But never be afraid to say and to do that which your good American conscience tells you is the right, regardless of any force on earth. That is your inherent right and duty as an American citizen. Guard it with all your might.

And now in conclusion let me say that to me civilian defense, or home defense, national defense, and Americanism are synonymous. We cannot have one without the other, and by the same token we must have them all or we have none. That we may have them all we must have that patriotic purpose of mind and heart of working in unison for all we hold dear for that safety and preservation of our American ideals, the bulwark of our great Republic.

Mr. BURTON. Thank you, Miss Betty Jensen, for so ably substiuting for your father.

Ladies and gentlemen, our next speaker is the Honorable JOSEPH RALEIGH BRYSON, United States Congressman from the Fourth District of South Carolina; a veteran and one who has demonstrated by his voting in Congress that he is really a friend of the veterans. Comrade BRYSON.

Mr. BRYSON. Comrade Burton and you, my comrades of the radio audience, it is indeed an honor to have been invited to speak on the program sponsored by the Veterans of Foreign Wars. It is sincerely hoped that when the last of your organization has crossed the Great Divide there will be no more veterans of foreign wars. I am to speak to you briefly on the subject of home defense.

HOME DEFENSE

Modern warfare has produced a new type of brutality—brutality on the home front.

The horrors of warfare conducted on the modern scale soon came to the surface in Britain, where the civilian populations of London, Bristol, Coventry, and other cities were made targets of incessant and merciless bombing attacks. In fact, the tactics and strategy of modern warfare as revealed in Europe and Asia consist in a large measure of subjecting civilian populations and cities to attacks aimed at disruption and destruction to break morale and destroy factories.

America cannot afford to ignore the warning sounded by the appalling and tragic events abroad. Somewhat removed, as we are, from the actual scene of today's war, many may look upon the idea of organizing fire-bomb spotters, air-raid-shelter crews, fire fighters, and the like as farfetched and unnecessary. I would ask those who regard such an eventuality as mythical to recall for a moment what a strange and unbelievable phenomena the digging of trench shelters in London's Hyde Park first seemed. While the need for home defense might not be as imperative or immediate as the production of planes and tanks for American defense and British aid, it is nonetheless as vital and important. We must develop a system of home defense capable of standing up to the demands of any eventuality, if we are to be a nation fully prepared. Mayor La

Guardia offered a practical analysis of the situation when he declared that there existed a 95-percent chance that most of the services created under the home-defense program would never be used and then added that "we cannot afford to take the 5-percent chance." We must be fully prepared to meet any attack on America's home front however remote the possibility of such an attack may seem.

For thousands of Americans, eager to do their part in the present emergency, the way is now open to make a substantial contribution to the strength and security of our Nation. Their aid can be added to the Office of Civilian Defense which was organized for mobilization of every volunteer service available in America.

The program of home defense as projected by the O. C. D. is the boldest thrust in the direction of total preparedness this Nation has ever known. It is a program so vast in scope and magnitude as to require the wholehearted support of a united nation. That the American people will not fail to respond with best possible cooperation is the belief in which the Office of Civilian Defense has assumed its great undertaking.

The American people may differ on the question of foreign policy. Honest differences of opinion are necessary in a democracy. The privilege to entertain, express and contend for different policies and principles is highly proper in a true democracy.

On the question of home defense, however, there is hardly room for any difference of opinion. There are those who strenuously oppose the idea of sending our armed forces to fight on foreign soil as a measure of defense. But no citizen, worthy of the name, hesitates on the question of home defense. In performance of duty may there be no wavering or faltering on the part of any citizen. For the defense of our homes and homeland, let there be pledged our lives, our fortune, and our sacred honor.

It does us well to repeat the lines of Sir Walter Scott:

"Breathes there the man, with soul so dead,
Who never to himself hath said,
This is my own, my native land!
Whose heart hath ne'er within him burn'd
As home his footsteps he hath turn'd,
From wandering on a foreign strand?
If such there breathe, go, mark him well;
For him no minstrel raptures swell;
High though his titles, proud his name,
Boundless his wealth as wish can claim;
Despite those titles, power, and pelf,
The wretch, concentred all in self,
Living, shall forfeit fair renown,
And, doubly dying, shall go down
To the vile dust, from whence he sprung,
Unwept, unhonor'd, and unsung."

Mr. BURTON. Thank you, Comrade BRYSON, for a good talk on Home and National Civilian Defense. Ladies and gentlemen, our speakers next Sunday will be Mr. RAYMOND SPRINGER, Congressman from Indiana, and Congressman GEORGE M. GRANT of Alabama, Past Department Commander of the Department of Alabama, of the American Legion.

Mr. NORMAN REED. This has been a presentation of the public-relations service of station WWDC. The program was another in the series of national-civilian defense programs sponsored by the Veterans of Foreign Wars. The program was in charge of Mr. E. R. Burton of the publicity committee, Veterans of Foreign Wars of the department of Virginia, who acted as master of ceremonies. Listen in again next Sunday at the same time for another program in this series.

Sixth Assembly of the Descendants of the Campaign, Siege, and Defense of Vicksburg

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DAN R. McGEHEE

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 16, 1941

ADDRESS BY HON. JULIAN P. ALEXANDER

Mr. McGEHEE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to submit the address made by Hon. Julian P. Alexander, a member of the Supreme Court of the State of Mississippi, on the occasion of the sixth assembly of the descendants of the campaign, siege, and defense of Vicksburg, on May 25, 1941. The Blue and Grey Society held its meeting in the Vicksburg National Military Park. The address of Col. William Cattron Rigby, who also spoke on the occasion, may be found in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on page A2524.

Judge Alexander's father, the late C. H. Alexander, a leader of the Mississippi bar, lost an eye in fighting the besiegers of the city of Vicksburg, and Mississippians are proud of his record.

Judge Alexander entered into the spirit of the occasion by pleading for the unity of our citizens. The address follows:

It is difficult to translate the spirit of this occasion into words. Its significance inspires sentiment but not speech; it moves the heart but stills the tongue.

I shall not recount to you matters of history with which you are all familiar. Many of these stirring events I learned from one of my own blood, who, as a stripling soldier of 17, fought the besiegers of this beleaguered city in a bitter contest which cost him the sacrifice of an eye. This disfigurement later came to be seen by me as a badge of honor. It is stimulating to one's spirit to recall that there remained to him sufficient sight with which in later years he beheld with pride the glory of a single flag and a heart which beat with pride at its symbolism.

Indeed, the thing which we do here today is in itself a symbol. If this assemblage differs from that which nearly four decades ago occupied these hills, it is only in its outward aspects. The mobilization of minds is not less effective than the regimentation of men. In a gathering such as this the realities of homage and of heroism are made visible.

You are the descendants of an honored people. You sprang from those from whom all earthly wealth had been snatched, yet who left to you a legacy of those eternal and intangible qualities which determine whether there shall be courage or cowardice, loyalty or indifference. Today, we need what they exemplified—courage, patience, and that willingness to sacrifice which is born of a lofty recklessness of devotion which pauses not to count the cost. These your ancestors remind you, as did the chief captain of the host to Paul, "with a great sum obtained I this freedom," to which you were enabled to say with Paul, "I was free born."

Your patriotism has a noble pedigree. You sprang from men who fought not for slavery but for freedom, and in their bequest they sealed their patriotism in the purple testament of bleeding war. It is a sacred trust. You are not only the beneficiaries of the generation which has gone before but trustees for that which is to come. You who are descended from the defenders of Vicksburg have now become the defenders of the faith. The siege laid by apathy and indifference upon the hearts of our people can be just as effective to starve them into the death of patriotism as can beleaguered forces of steel starve bodies into weak attrition.

The time has come when we must accept the truth that no one is a good citizen if he is not a good Mississippian. And no one can be a better Mississippian than he is an American. The character of the Father of our Country has been aptly summarized into a fit and familiar phrase. Washington was first in war because he was first in peace; he was first in the hearts of his countrymen because his country was first in his own heart. It is not a new thought that our development of a scientific progress has given to us modern inventions with which we may speak with a voice heard around the world or travel in a moment to its remotest parts. Washington had none of these things. Today we have them all but do not have Washington. We are reminded that things are not our realities so much as thoughts, and that purposes have more power than people. At a time when public opinion is divided upon the expediency of convoying supplies to a distressed people we should concern ourselves with the necessity for the safe convoy between mind and heart of our thoughts and purposes that they be protected by the armaments of unselfishness and faith. Patriotism is one of our peacetime essentials; it is not to be imported but inspired. Patriotism is one of our undeveloped resources, and without it the industries of peace may not operate and the battles of peace cannot be won. Without it struggle has no purpose, sacrifice no heroism, and victory no glory. If we take from anything everything which makes it something we have nothing.

Wars too often come because men lose the battles of peace. A Chinese philosopher of today has said that if "we should perspire more in peace, we would bleed less in war." The devices of war change with the years. The ingenuity of men's minds and the depravity of their hearts make common cause to devise man's destruction. The paraphernalia of peace remains the same. The reason why swords may be beaten into plowshares and spears into pruning hooks is because they are cast of the same metal. The faithful use of either burnishes their surfaces with a brightness akin to glory; and disuse brings to them that rust which possesses all of the destructive oxidation of indifference. A nation which provides beneficent services to protect our lands against soil erosion falls short of its complete service when it fails to guard them against soul erosion. There should be a Monroe Doctrine of the heart which throws about the sources of our loyalty a protecting insulation secure against the invasion of hostile ideas and false idealism.

Even as Nature has cast its healing mantle of green about the scars which, in times past, have disfigured these noble hills, so have men's hearts become healed from the wounds of those animosities which denied to them the power to think straight and to see clearly. I still believe in the principle of States' rights, but I believe also in national duties. Today, our fight is not for union but for unity. Eighty years ago the stream of liberty and union was beset with storm and vexed with conflicting currents dividing its course. For 4 years these lesser currents fought their meandering way only to converge again into a majestic current which leads its sure course down toward the main of peace and unity, and upon whose proud bosom there ride the golden galleons of greater glory. Today, our concern should be no more with our Bill of Rights than with our bill of duties. Today, there is one flag. There should be one people. Our National Anthem is to be sung as a chorus and not as a solo. It is written in the key of Americanism. It is not a tune so much as a truth. We, who so proudly sing "My Country," should hear the echo thrown back from every mountainside: "My citizen." Is it a mere song which our lips sing that our banner should "long wave over the land of the free and the home of the brave"? Knowing hearts will answer that if it is to wave at all, it must be held aloft in the faithful grasp of a united people. This shall be a land of the free only so long as it is the home of the brave.

We stand amidst the graves of a thousand unknown soldiers bivouacked in the battle abbeys of these templed hills. Their names are to fame unknown, yet we know the hearts of them. They are not silent for their deeds still speak to listening hearts. We honor these who left their homes that they might protect them, who sacrificed their lives that a nation should have life. Not homeless are these who in the twilight of life's glorious day lay down to rest like drowsy children upon the bosom of a kindly mother earth. Mississippi now claims them as her own. She keeps eternal vigil about their sleeping couch. Today, she scatters the blossoms of May about them, and in October, she will draw above them her variegated coverlet in the quilted designs of autumn's leafy patterns, bordered wth forget-me-nots. At evening the old river intones its mournful threnody. Nearby the weeping willow, still disconsolate, mourns its loss, like Rachel weeping for her children, because they are not.

Yet, our heads bow not in tragedy but in triumph, for at the whispered suggestion of the noonday's zephyrs, the reeds and folding grass nod rythmic acquiescence to an ancient truth "except a grain of wheat fall in the ground and die * * *." Fourscore years ago, an overwhelming force took this city but not its spirit. This incident has its lesson. It is that he who ruleth his spirit is greater than he who taketh a city. Loyalty is exhibited by arms and by the devices of destruction, but it springs from about the altars of that shrine we call the hearts of men. Let us therefore keep our hearts with all diligence for out of them are the issues of life. These whom we honor today were not conquered but were more than conquerors, and today we think of Vicksburg in terms of victory.

Through them, their descendants in blood and privilege become each a sovereign. Their hearts shall be their kingdom, unity their power, and liberty shall be their glory forever and forever.

Army Pay

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 16, 1941

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL, OF NEW YORK

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address which I delivered yesterday over the radio:

It is my purpose tonight to discuss H. R. 4944, which I introduced in the House of Representatives on June 3 and which is now before the Committee on Military Affairs. The title of this bill reveals its objective, namely, to increase the monthly base pay of certain enlisted men of the United States Army.

Ever since May 1940, when the President of the United States called the Congress into extraordinary session for the purpose of pointing out to the Nation the vital necessity of embarking upon the most gigantic defense program the world has ever seen, it has been my opportunity to vote for measure after measure designed to carry out this program. Along with the rest of the Congress and the country I felt that it was high time to take these steps necessary to national defense especially because so little had been done before this. While the totalitarian governments of Europe had been steadily strengthening themselves by mass production of weapons of modern warfare, it seemed that the democracies had been enjoying a fateful slumber. Certainly our great Nation, although apparently awake to the dire consequences of a world dominated by Hitler or Stalin, was doing nothing about preventing such a possibility except through lip service. This was the situation in May 1940 when the powerful mechanized German Armies swept most of the remaining free governments from the Continent of Europe. It was a situation which was certainly not encouraging in view of the fact that the United States Government had to start building practically from scratch.

But if the country was slow in realizing its mistake, the Congress was quick to reflect the desires of a revitalized people and as a Member of that Congress I felt it my duty to obey the dictates of my people at home which were substantially to carry out complete national defense with the greatest possible speed.

Probably the most constructive step which was ever taken in the great defense program which is now well under way was the passage of the Selective Service Act of 1940. This measure gradually called to Uncle Sam's protection a million and a half of the finest, most patriotic young men that have ever offered their services to a great cause. I will not attempt to describe my boundless admiration for these boys drawn from every family and from every corner of this broad land. It is sufficient to say that if the development of the fighting forces of the United States continue with the enthusiasm which our boys have already made manifest, you have the right to expect the greatest force for the defense of America that has ever been gathered together under any flag.

But when one praises and acknowledges the splendid patriotism of these young men he must of necessity at the same time take cognizance of the accompanying sacrifices they have made. Need I tell you of the number of farm lads who have left their parents almost without help on their farms in order to make their contribution to this program? Is it necessary to say that thousands of college men and hundreds of thousands of others have given up lucrative positions to join the ranks of this great Army? Or need I tell you of the countless boys who have left their dearly loved homes for the first time in their lives and even at this hour are witnessing the heart-rending pangs of homesickness and nostalgia? Certainly I do not need to point these facts out because they are only too well known by every man and woman who listens to my message tonight. Why are these facts well known about the soldiers of our country, their joys, their sorrows, their sacrifices? The answer is simple enough because their problems are the problems of every family in America. The Selective Service Act has reached into every family of America and has in each case taken, for a time at least, the treasure of that family for the defense of our beloved country. It has brought about all this without a word of audible complaint coming either from the soldier or his people. Certainly this is the apotheosis of the American spirit in our modern crisis.

But let us go back for a moment and describe other phases of this mighty effort to make America invulnerable to attack. I have dwelt at some length, and justly so, upon a description of the unprecedented response of the young manhood of this Nation to a call to patriotic duty. I have extolled them and will continue to extoll them long after their acts have embellished the pages of our noble history. I wish I could praise with equal fervor some of the other forces which are supposedly bent upon the same course of preserving American liberties as our soldiers are. It is not my objective in these remarks to condemn or to castigate any individuals or groups, but I cannot resist calling to their attention the pattern they should follow of devotion to the ideal of the American way that I must confess is best emulated by the young men of the United States.

I listened with rapt interest the other day to some amazing testimony that was borne out by a Member of Congress who had inspected the construction of Army camps and cantonments throughout the country. I was frankly astounded when I heard that two hundred and fifty millions of dollars of the taxpayers' money have been wasted in this construction program alone. These figures were not based on assumption, not based on hearsay, but they were based on cold, hard facts. And if extravagance is so evident in an almost infinitesimal part of the whole program, what figures can be large enough to adequately describe the deliberate waste which is going on in many other parts of this program. I for one deplore this waste, not only because it must be paid by the sweat and the toil of the great rank and file of our American citizenry, but also because it is being countenanced and indulged in by the very men who ought to be above such degrading practices; by men in high places who should be setting the example of distinguished patriotism to the boys in the training camps. Such a comparison is a shameful commentary upon those whose very right to healthy profits should make them all the more mindful of the necessity to use the revenues pouring in for our defense wisely and carefully.

I want to also take this opportunity to tell those communistic elements hiding behind the broad shoulders of patriotic American labor that if the inarticulate public is ever able to lay a hand on those responsible for the strife which has gone a long way to sabotage our defense industries that they will be sorry they ever raised their ugly heads. Upon those communistic elements do I place the blame for the dearth of equipment and weapons of preservation that our glorious American soldiery is witnessing today. The fathers and mothers of these soldiers can never forget that deliberate attempts to stop the flow of arms and tanks and munitions from our great factories will jeopardize not only the effectiveness but the lives of their sons if they are ever called upon to do battle in defense of America.

Taking into consideration the evidence which I have submitted to you this evening of the deliberate waste in certain phases of construction, of the stubborn selfishness of groups of our body politic in the face of the most serious threat to freedom we have ever known, of the complaints, the dissatisfaction, the hindering that have emanated from unpatriotic elements, I have come to the conclusion that the forgotten man of the whole defensive effort is your son, your son, and your son now in training in the great military camps throughout America. And for these very reasons, because I know that excessive profits are being made out of the billions the Congress has appropriated, because I am aware that American labor is receiving for its services at least 5 and perhaps 10 times the compensation which the Army is getting, and because the soldiers of this country are on duty 24 hours a day, 7 days a week, and for at least 1 year, I believe that it is in order at this time to propose that their base pay be raised from $21 a month to $42 a month. Many of these men are sending what money they can scrape together home to their needy families. They are in many cases exhausting this small sum in the very necessities of life at the camps, and at the same time they constitute the very backbone of the protection which Uncle Sam must count upon if and when the far-flung and aggressive forces of the dictators see fit to penetrate the Western Hemisphere. They are deserving of their hire, and it should be the very best that this Nation can possibly provide.

The Inequity of Any Increase in the Federal Gasoline Tax—A Tax Wrong in Principle

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RICHARD M. KLEBERG

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 16, 1941

ARGUMENT RELATIVE TO INCREASE IN FEDERAL TAX ON GASOLINE

Mr. KLEBERG. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following argument with regard to the increase of the Federal tax on gasoline:

There is no compromise with a principle.

Take crime, for example. It is true that a murder is considered a "worse" crime than larceny, and the punishment received by the murderer is considerably more severe than the penalty placed upon thievery. Both the killer and the thief are lawbreakers, and the degree of the crime in no way alters the fact that both are equally guilty of antisocial conduct. A crime is a crime.

Similarly, the rate at which a particular tax is levied may govern the amount of punishment which the tax delivers. But if the tax is inequitable in concept—if it violates fundamental, established principles of sound taxation—the degree of the burden which the tax imposes has nothing whatsoever to do with its undesirability as a violator of principle.

Thus a Federal gasoline tax levied at 2½ cents per gallon would impose a much greater hardship upon those who must consume gasoline in order to earn a living than would a 1½-cent tax. But a Federal gasoline tax levied at any rate- at ½ cent or at 12 cents—imposes an inequitable penalty upon farmers, laborers, truckers, and all other gasoline consumers, because the Federal gasoline tax is wrong in principle.

FEDERAL TAX NOT A ROAD TAX

The Federal gasoline tax is wrong in principle because it is not, and never has been, a tax for roads. The gasoline tax was devised by the States as a special tax paid by motor-vehicle operators for the use of the highways, and it was accepted as an equitable method of raising revenue for road improvement. In contrast, the Federal gasoline tax first was enacted in 1932 as an emergency and temporary tax to provide funds to replace the declining yield from established sources.

No pretense has been made that the Federal gasoline tax is a tax for highways. Farmers who use gasoline in a tractor or stationary engine, for instance, must pay the same amount of tax as the truck driver. Those who use gasoline for other nonhighway purposes pay the Federal tax without exception.

The fact that the Federal gasoline tax has been extended four times, that it was increased 50 percent in 1940, and that it now is being considered as a subject for a further increase, in no way alters the fact that it is a special tax paid by a special class, for costs of general government which should be borne equally by all taxpayers.

FEDERAL INVASION OF STATE TAX FIELD

The Federal gasoline tax is wrong in principle because it constitutes a Federal invasion into a field of taxation which is a keystone of State finances and is a tax which duplicates State gasoline taxes which alone are incomparably burdensome.

States now collect $865,000,000 each year from taxes on gasoline. In the average State this single levy provides more than one-quarter of all the tax revenue collected by the State.

The gasoline tax provides most of the money necessary for the construction and maintenance of our Nation's highway system. Reduce the efficiency of this system by denying roads needed upkeep and improvement and you strike a vital blow at the national-defense effort itself. It is obvious that the gasoline tax must remain an unimpaired source of revenue to the States during the present emergency.

When the Revenue Act of 1932 was in formation, the House Ways and Means Committee considered and rejected the Federal gasoline tax idea. The act, as it passed the House, contained no gasoline tax. The Treasury Department revised upward its estimates of revenue need following this action, however, and the Senate Finance Committee reported out an amendment to the House-approved bill providing for a Federal gasoline tax. In considering the reenactment of the gasoline tax, the Finance Committee's report of May 10, 1933, declared:

"Your committee is of the opinion that the gasoline tax should be reserved to the States. * * * It would be entirely appropriate, therefore, for this committee, which originated the Federal gasoline tax as a temporary expedient, to recommend its repeal."

NOW TAXED AT LUXURY-TAX RATES

The Federal gasoline tax is wrong in principle because it erroneously was considered a nuisance tax on the consumption of a nonessential commodity. It is wrong in principle, furthermore, because it has been imposed at rates so high that they could be justified only upon the grounds that the tax was a tax on a luxury.

Actually, the Federal gasoline tax is a tax on essential transportation. It now is plain that the major proportion of all gasoline is consumed in connection with essential transportation services, and by individuals in pursuit of earning a living. The millions engaged in commercial highway transport, defense workers who must use their private automobiles to get to and from their jobs, traveling salesmen, rural mail carriers, farmers, and the multitude of other highway users, must grin and bear Federal gasoline taxation because no reasonable alternative to the consumption of gasoline is available.

Despite the character of gasoline as an essential, State and Federal tax rates on gasoline during 1940 were equivalent to a sales tax levied at the exorbitant rate of 47 percent on the average retail price. State and Federal retail taxes on gasoline actually were more than 100 percent of the average wholesale price of the product. The 1½-cent Federal levy alone was equal to a 12-percent sales tax.

Compare these rates with the 5-percent levies now being proposed on candy and chewing gum, or with the proposed 10-percent tax on cameras and furs.

BURDEN ON THOSE LEAST ABLE TO PAY

Finally, the Federal gasoline tax is wrong in principle because it bears most heavily upon persons of modest incomes. Truckers, who alone account for more than one-fourth of the Nations gasoline consumption, obviously are persons of modest income. Certainly, it cannot be contended that farmers, who consume another 25 percent of all gasoline, possess any unusual ability to pay taxes. Even the average city-dwelling passenger-car owner, perhaps slightly more prosperous than the farmer, has been found by Federal research to enjoy an income which is between $20 and $30 weekly.

Already, on the average, the motorcar operator must set aside 1 week's wages each year, just to meet his gasoline-tax bill.

Now, to be sure, the amount of an increase in the Federal gasoline tax will make an important difference to the taxpayer, because it will govern the number of additional days' wages which will be required to foot the bill.

But a ½-cent Federal gasoline tax is just as wrong in principle as a 12-cent Federal gasoline tax, and no amount of tax reduction and no amount of compromise, short of actual tax elimination, can change this situation.

Shipment of Oil to Japan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PHILIP A. TRAYNOR

OF DELAWARE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 16, 1941

LETTER FROM CONSTITUENT

Mr. TRAYNOR. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter:

WILMINGTON, DEL., June 12, 1941.

Hon. PHILIP A. TRAYNOR,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

HONORABLE SIR: As an American, I view with indignant amazement the reported shipment of 800,000 or more barrels of oil monthly from this country to Japan. My amazement surpasses understanding when I try to reconcile this disquieting fact with the prospect of gasless Sundays and chilled homes in America.

What reason does the administration have for permitting this anomalous situation to exist? Whatever it may be, the people have a right to know.

It has been reported, perhaps as a surmise, that the United States is supplying Japan with oil in order to dissuade her from seizing or attempting to seize the rich oil fields of the Dutch East Indies. Assuming that this report is founded in truth, are we not pursuing a policy of appeasement toward the Nipponese aggressors, a policy we are supposed to have renounced and denounced as worse than futile?

Why have embargoes been impressed on shipments of implements of war and other materials and supplies to Japan and none to speak of on oil? It seems to me—and I am confident I reflect the views of many fellow Americans—that an embargo on oil shipments to Japan would serve three very vital purposes: First, it would materially aid China in her life-and-death struggle with the Nippon invader; second, it would permit conservation in this country of millions of gallons of oil; and, third, it would permit return to the American flag of tankers now being used to transport the oil across the Pacific, which are reported sorely needed to move oil from Texas and Gulf ports to New York and Baltimore, and to Canada and Great Britain.

In view of the foregoing, I am writing you as my Representative in Congress to use your good office to have all oil shipments to Japan halted. I make this request of you because I deem such a step imperative and in the best interest of our beloved country.

Because of the growing interest being manifested by the people of Delaware in the situation above discussed, I am forwarding a copy of this letter to the press.

Respectfully yours,

VICTOR J. COLOMBO.

Two Hundred and Forty Dollars per Year Increase for Selectees and Others Serving During Emergency To Be Paid 2 Years After Service

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WRIGHT PATMAN

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 17, 1941

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I have introduced H. R. 5063, which provides for an increase of pay to those who serve in the armed forces during the present emergency. If the trainees are permitted to receive as much as the minimum wage under the Fair Labor Standards Act, passed by Congress, it will be necessary for their present pay to be supplemented by at least $20 per month.

The bill, H. R. 5063, Seventy-seventh Congress, first session, introduced June 16, 1941, and referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, may be cited as the "Service Compensation Act."

It is a bill to increase the compensation of the members of the armed forces; to make intangible property bear its fair share of the cost of national defense; to provide for the proper administration of this act; to provide penalties for the violation of this act; and for other purposes.

Declaration of policy is in section 2 (a) and 2 (b) of the bill, and is as follows:

SEC. 2. (a) Congress hereby finds (1) that the greater skill, training, and ability required of the modern soldier together with an increased cost of living entitles him to an increased wage; (2) that wartime inflation and post-war deflation makes it desirable in the public interest and to the advantage of the soldier that payment of some of his compensation be deferred; (3) that property owners often avoid taxes by investing their wealth in intangible property and secreting it in other States; (4) that by reason of its transitory and elusive nature, the several States are unable to tax intangible property at more than a small fraction of the tax on farms, homes, and other property, real and personal; (5) that intangible property can be effectively taxed only by the National Government.

(b) It is hereby declared that the purpose of this act is to increase the compensation of the members of the armed forces and to enable intangible property to bear its fair share of the cost of national defense.

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 3. When used in this act—

(a) "Intangible property" means and shall include stocks, bonds, choses in action, unrecorded conveyances, gold and silver coin, Treasury notes, bank notes, and other forms of currency in common use, every claim and demand for money or other valuable thing, every annuity or sum of money, due or to become due, cash surrender or reserve value of all insurance, whichever is the highest, and all claims and demands secured by deed or mortgage.

(b) "Tax" means the excise, tax, or duty imposed on intangible property under this act.

(c) "Taxpayer" means and shall include the person who owns or is entitled to the income of the intangible property on the last day of the taxable year; it shall include all trusts and estates, both the trustee and the beneficiary of the trust being considered separate taxpayers each liable for the full amount of the tax. Trusts established by the same settlor or settlors shall be considered the same trust in taxing the trustee. It shall also include domestic corporations, members of partnerships, insurance companies, nonresident alien individuals, and foreign corporations whose property is within the power of the United States, individual citizens of any possession of the United States who are not otherwise citizens of the United States and who are not residents of the United States, individual citizens of the United States regardless of their place of residence, and China Trade Act corporations. A charitable corporation or charitable trust shall be exempt from taxation of intangibles owned by it. There shall be no other exemptions of any person, individual, trust, corporation, or organization.

(d) "Value" means the true and full value of all intangible property assessed in money. In determining such value the assessor shall not adopt a lower or different standard of value because the same is to serve as a basis of taxation, nor shall he adopt as a criterion of value the price for which the said property would sell at auction or at a forced sale, or in the aggregate with all other property; but he shall value each article or description of property by itself, and at such sum or price as he believes the same to be fairly worth in money which valuation shall not be less than the value on the market thereof Money, whether in possession or on deposit, shall be entered in the statement at the full amount thereof. Every credit for a sum certain, payable either in money, property of any kind, labor, or services, shall be valued at the full price of the sums so payable; if for a specific article, or for a specified number or quantity of any article or property, or for a certain amount of labor, or for services of any kind, it shall be valued at the current price of such property, or for such labor or services, at the place where payable.

(e) The "Secretary of the Treasury" or "Secretary" means the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States

(f) The "Commissioner" means the Commissioner of Internal Revenue of the United States.

(g) "United States," when used in a geographical sense, means and includes the several States, the District of Columbia, the Territories, and all possessions.

SERVICE CERTIFICATES

SEC. 4. Every month each person serving in the armed forces of the United States shall receive a service certificate or bond redeemable by such person for the sum of $20 after 2 years from the date thereof. Said service certificates or bonds shall be nontransferable, shall bear annual interest after maturity at the rate of 3 percent, and must be redeemed within 10 years after the date thereof or they shall be null and void.

SPECIAL FUND

SEC. 5. The revenue collected under the excise tax or duty levied by this act shall be paid into a special fund which shall be designated as the "Service Compensation Fund." This fund shall be used to pay the service certificates or bonds issued under this act. Any surplus in such fund at the end of the fiscal year shall be paid into the general revenue fund and any deficit shall be filed from the general revenue fund.

EXCISE TAX OR DUTY

SEC. 6. There is hereby levied, in addition to all other taxes, an excise tax or duty of 2 mills, or one-fifth of 1 percent, per annum of the value over $50,000 of holdings of intangible property owned legally or equitably by any taxpayer. The tax shall be paid by the taxpayer with his regular income tax to the Commissioner and shall be based on the intangible property of the taxpayer as of the last day of December of each year.

RETURNS

SEC. 7. All returns for the excise, tax, or duty imposed by this act shall be made by the taxpayer with his regular income-tax return. The filing of the return required under this section shall be deemed an assessment, subject to revision, of the tax shown due on the basis of such return and shall be payable forthwith. The Commissioner shall, as soon as practicable after the return is filed, examine the same and make such investigation as he deems necessary for determining the correctness of the return. The tax computed by him on the basis of such examination and investigation shall be the tax to be paid by such taxpayer.

WHO SHALL FILE A RETURN

SEC. 8. Returns shall be necessary only from taxpayers owning over $50,000 in intangible property. Within his discretion the Commissioner may require taxpayers owning over $30,000 in intangibles to file a return.

OTHER PROVISIONS

Section 9 of the bill relates to forms and regulations, and is purely administrative.

Section 10 relates to supplemental reports and is administrative.

Section 11 (a) and (b) relates to penalties for failure to comply with the law and is administrative, as well as subsection (c) and (d) of section 11.

Sections 12, 13, 14, and 15 are administrative and relate to refunds, public records, and conflicting laws.

Section 16, the last, provides "this act shall take effect upon its enactment."

MAIN PROVISIONS

It will be noticed that the main provisions are as follows:

1. To pay those who serve $240 a year, or $20 per month, more than they are now receiving;
2. The payment to be made 2 years after completion of service;
3. The money to be provided by a tax upon intangible property; the tax rate being two-fifths of 1 percent, which means 20 cents on the $100 of property per year;
4. No one will pay a tax on intangible property who owns less than $50,000 worth.

It should not be overlooked that the owners of intangible property are not paying one penny on our preparedness program. If intangible property earns a profit, the owner pays an income tax on the profit only but does not pay anything on the property itself.

There is between $300,000,000,000 and $500,000,000,000 worth of intangible property in this country that goes practically tax-free.

If this bill passes, this intangible property will pay the cost, and it will not be burdensome on anyone, since the tax rate is only 20 cents on the $100 property valuation each year.

If this question is not settled now by treating the trainees fairly and justly, it will come up in the future with increasing difficulties.

Now is the time to settle this problem by paying these trainees a fair amount for their services.

This group—the trainees—is making the greatest sacrifice in our national-defense program, and because they are not organized and therefore do not possess bargaining power, they should not be overlooked, but for that reason alone Congress should make a special effort to see that they are dealt with fairly and equitably.

MEMORIAL PREPARED BY ATTORNEY FRANK GRIFFIN, OF IDAHO

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I submit for inclusion in the RECORD excerpts from a memorial prepared by Attorney Frank Griffin, of Kellogg, Idaho, for the North Idaho Wildlife Federation on the occasion of the death of Mike Bottinelli, one of its members, who had formerly been fish and game commissioner of the State of Idaho. At the time of his passing, this respected citizen was president of the Shoshone County Sportsmen's Association. He had been a man whose useful service to his community and State will be deeply missed:

IN MEMORIAM, MIKE BOTTINELLI

In the year 1890 there came to Kellogg, a young man, in whose heart burned a brightly lighted adoration for the works of creation, and whose entire being was vibrant with an impelling desire to be of service to mankind. He came from a far country. But the distance that he traveled, the place of his birth, is of small moment now. Important for our purposes are the testamentary remembrances, evidenced principally in the form of inspirational legacies, that he bequeathed to us as a result of a life richly endowed and constructively employed. This young man came to Kellogg not as most young men do, merely for gainful getting; he came to generously and graciously give. His was destined to be a life of useful service to the people of the community in which he chose to live. In the sphere of business he commenced as a chore boy, and rose, by dint of his own efforts, to a position of high station in the electrical department of the Bunker Hill and Sullivan Mining & Concentrating Co., which by the way, is one of the great industrial organizations of America.

In the field of social service he started as an unknown, and proceeded at once to distinguish himself by reason of his untiring devotion to the interests of his fellows, until there had been reposed in him such confidence and conferred upon him such honors, that he was called to occupy the positions and offices of secretary of the Odd Fellows at Kellogg, exalted ruler of the Elks at Wallace, district deputy of the Elks for the State of Idaho. He was also an active and practical Mason, one who looked out upon life with a merry smile and a magnificent heart. He exemplified the teachings of that great fraternal order by meeting his fellowmen on the level and parting with them on the square.

The State of Idaho recognized his abilities and worth by making him an athletic commissioner, and later, and of possibly greater importance to us, a fish and game commissioner. He was President of the Shoshone County Sportsmen's Association at the time that he departed to clasp hands with the great legion of sportsmen who have preceded him "to the happy hunting grounds." At the time of his presidency he, with the assistance of an earnest group of wildlife enthusiasts, erected the Hale Fish Hatchery, near Shosone County Park, just outside the beautiful city of Mullan. This hatchery, a private enterprise established wholly for the public good, represents an investment of approximately $40,000, and stands today as a monument to the labor, industry, faith, vision, and public spiritedness of Mike Bottinelli and his associates. Mike, as all good sportsmen should endeavor to be, was a kind husband, a devoted father, a helpful relative, and a loyal friend. He was beloved by all—the successful and the unsuccessful, the fortunate and the unfortunate. The Bunker Hill and Sullivan Mining & Concentrating Co., in dedicating an electric substation to his memory, caused to be inscribed in bronze these words:

"In appreciation of his 37 years of unselfish leadership, loyalty, and service."

We can pay no loftier tribute to our absent friend than was paid to him by one of his fellow fish and game commissioners who, shortly after the passing of Mike, voiced these sentiments: 'God may have made other men as good as Mike Bottinelli, but of this I am certain. He never made one any better."

Hitlerism in Congress

EDITORIAL FROM THE CHATTANOOGA NEWS-FREE PRESS

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Chattanooga News-Free Press of June 7, 1941:

[From the Chattanooga News-Free Press of June 7, 1941]

HITLERISM IN CONGRESS

The most shocking event of the week in the United States was the outbreak of anti-Semitism-Hitlerism on the floor of the House of Representatives which caused the sudden death of Representative Edelstein, of New York. It is alarming to know that, as the United States girds for its struggle with totalitarianism, there exists such a totalitarian spirit within its national legislative halls. It is disconcerting for this section to realize also that the venom came from the lips of a southerner, Representative RANKIN of Mississippi, T. V. A. enthusiast and usually a consistent Rooseveltian. There is no place in a democracy for anti-Semitism or any radical or religious prejudice. Those who give vent to such bigotry lack that much of being good Americans. Especially at this critical period is the planting of this basic Hitler principle a menace to the national unity which is essential to the progress of the Republic.

Save Our Democracy

REMARKS

OF

HON. J. HARRY McGREGOR

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 17, 1941

Mr. McGREGOR. Mr. Speaker, may I respectfully call your attention to what, in my opinion, is one of the most dangerous pieces of legislation that has ever been brought before any Congress. I have reference to H. R. 4949, known as the seizure-property bill. I would title it the final step of the goose step.

May I quote you a small part of this bill:

That during any period of national emergency proclaimed by the President the President is authorized, when he deems it in the interest of national defense, (a) to requisition and take over, either temporarily or permanently, property of any kind or character, whether real or personal, tangible or intangible, or any part thereof, or any right or interest therein or with respect thereto, whether by virtue of contract, patent, license, or otherwise.

In my opinion, the dictators whom we have been taught to hate do not have the power which would be granted under this proposal. There is no doubt that some drastic action is needed to shock the public into a realization of the task before the country and to eliminate some of the bottlenecks which are retarding our defense program. However, this bill, H. R. 4949, would give the President the authority to take over the property of any individual or corporation that he, in his judgment, might declare essential for defense purposes, and payment for which would be determined by the Government officials.

It certainly seems to me that it is not necessary, in the name of national defense, to place the property of every individual—his home, his automobile, his personal possessions, including his savings—into the hands of any individual or group. Under this bill the Government could take anything, from a sack of sugar to an airplane or railroad. If it is necessary to adopt such dictatorial measures in order to protect our democracy, we would have no democracy left, and, therefore, nothing left to fight for.

The possession of this power would furnish unscrupulous politicians with the opportunity to wreak vengeance and ruin upon those who are not in accord with their ideas. The President's explanation is that he needs this power in order to take over plants where strikes are stopping the defense effort. The fact is he already possesses this authority under provisions of the Draft Act, and he has demonstrated this authority in the sending of troops to stop a strike at a plant in California.

If there are specific things the President deems necessary to have further authority to achieve, he should say what these things are, and I am sure Congress would immediately remove all obstacles which are hindering our defense program without this all-inclusive measure, which would pave the way for persecution and one-man rule of 132,000,000 free-born Americans.

This bill threatens to destroy with one blow all those liberties which for years we have defended, and I, therefore, call upon Congress to defeat this measure and thus preserve our democracy.

British Propaganda Promoting Union Now

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. STEPHEN A. DAY

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 17, 1941

ARTICLE FROM THE WASHINGTON TIMES-HERALD

Mr. DAY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Washington Times-Herald of June 17, 1941:

[From the Washington Times-Herald of June 17, 1941]

BRITISH PROPAGANDA PROMOTING UNION NOW

Miss Cathrine Curtis, chairman of a national committee of women voters, recently issued a statement in Washington.

It appears that her important organization undertook a test poll to discover what proportion of the women voters of the United States favored involvement in the war.

Also what, if any, proportion favored common citizenship with England as proposed by the Union Now movement in the United States and by the eminent British statesman, Hore-Belisha, in the British House of Commons.

It is an amazing fact that some American citizens do approve of joining the United States to the British Empire and making American citizens British subjects in an amalgamation of the two peoples.

It had been previously alleged that those most interested in the Union Now movement are the international financiers and their associates and dependents.

Furthermore, that an almost equally important and influential group favoring the union is the socially prominent elements in the large eastern cities who find the satisfaction of their social ambitions in the high society of London and in the glamor of royal courts.

Whether or not this be the case it is significant that more than three-quarters of the vote cast in favor of common British and American citizenship came from the eastern seaboard States.

Some of these States were Tory in 1776 and labored for continued domination by England during the Revolutionary War.

Apparently they are to a degree Tory still.

To be sure, this Tory vote was not large.

It was only about 5 percent of the total vote.

That is to say, approximately 95 percent of those who answered the questionnaire voted against common British citizenship, while only about 5 percent voted for it.

But to your columnist the surprising fact is that 5 percent of the women of this great country (according to the figures Miss Curtis divulges) want the United States to return to British domination, and want the free citizens of the United States to abandon their independent citizenship and become subjects of the British Empire.

To what is this sycophantic sentiment due?

It cannot be entirely due to the interrelation of the great British and American financial interests.

It cannot be wholly attributable to the socially ambitious elements of the eastern cities.

It must be in part due to a temporary hysteria developed by the flood of shrewd British propaganda which has overwhelmed our country, and to a certain extent drowned out in weaker minds and less loyal hearts the spirit of American patriotism and independence.

Nevertheless, there is some encouragement to be found in the fact that three-fourths of that 5 percent voting for submersion of the United States in and under the British Empire came from the narrow strip which constituted the original English colonies, while less than one-fourth of this snobbish 5 percent voting for common citizenship came from the great territory west of the Allegheny Mountains which constitutes the truer America.

The poll of Miss Curtis' women's national committee seems to have been very comprehensive and thorough.

An enormous number of special polling blanks were sent to women everywhere—to housewives, nurses, college graduates and members of college faculties, school teachers, society women, business and professional women, women doctors, women lawyers, and others in every State of the Union.

The question of whether the recipient of the voting blank would oppose or favor a common citizenship with England was definitely asked.

Miss Curtis declares that her organization did not demand that those voting sign their names on the polling blanks but, nevertheless, made conspicuous provision in specified spaces for signature and address in case those voting wished so to identify themselves.

According to Miss Curtis, it was interesting to note that approximately nine-tenths of those voting against common British citizenship definitely identified themselves by writing in their names and addresses, while less than half of those voting in favor of common citizenship so identified themselves.

Apparently those who voted to make the United States again part of the British Empire were not very proud of their ballot and did not want their names and addresses known.

Possibly, too, not all the votes for common British citizenship were genuine, since in so many cases signatufes and addresses were not appended.

Let us take some consolation in that belief.

And perhaps, too, some of the ballots were cast by women who are in this country taking every advantage of its liberties and opportunities, but who are not American citizens.

There are many English who have been in America for years and still render their allegiance to the land of their birth.

This everlasting loyalty to England is especially characteristic of the British subject, and is admirable enough in those who are British subjects.

Some of these confirmed British may have been among the unsigned ballots which favored common citizenship.

If so, the situation is not so bad, but it is still an astounding circumstance that on the eastern seaboard of the United States nearly 10 percent of the population apparently is in favor of abandoning the independence of the United States and in making our people a part of the citizenry of the British Empire.

The type of British propaganda which incites such disloyalty to America and American institutions is distinctly not admirable.

It is just as dangerous to American unity and American integrity as the Communist propaganda which demands first loyalty of American citizens to Moscow.

All such propaganda to mislead our citizens and abate their loyalty to their own land and their own institutions should be branded as subversive.

Propaganda to lead us into war in the interests of alien lands is bad enough, but the attempt to make us sacrifice not only our welfare but our independence for the benefit of any foreign nation should not be tolerated by a self-respecting people.

Organized Labor and Unemployment

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LELAND M. FORD

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 17, 1941

LETTER FROM PHILIP MURRAY, PRESIDENT OF THE CONGRESS OF INDUSTRIAL ORGANIZATIONS, AND REPLY BY HON. LELAND M. FORD, OF CALIFORNIA

Mr. LELAND M. FORD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter received by me from Mr. Philip Murray, president of the C. I. O., and my reply thereto:

Mr. PHILIP MURRAY,
President, Congress of Industrial Organizations,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. MURRAY: This will acknowledge receipt of your letter of June 9, addressed to me and calling my attention to the situation of many millions of Americans who are now unemployed.

I note, in the third paragraph of your letter, you state that your C. I. O. economists estimate that there are nearly 9,000,000 unemployed. I note, also, in the fourth paragraph, you say it would take between two and two and one-half billion dollars to take care of these people; and I note in the last paragraph of your letter you say it seems to you to be the patriotic duty to provide work for our unemployed and to make certain that this Nation prove to its working people that their welfare is a first concern.

To me this is a very peculiar request coming from you, or at least it seems peculiar to me in the light of some of the things that the C. I. O. leaders (not the men) have done in my district and on the west coast. I refer to such leaders at Harry Bridges, Freytag, Orton, and others. It is my opinion that such leadership as I have come in contact with has never had the welfare of either the unemployed at heart or the welfare of the employed at heart. The main objective of these leaders, so far as I believe it to be true, is, first, to instill in the workers the belief in socialistic, communistic party-line doctrine; and, second, to promote them for their own financial welfare. In order to do this they have consistently kept the rank and file so far as they could do so, stirred up by agitation and riot, to cause as many strikes as possible, and thereby create a tremendous loss to both the men and the industry, sabotage the defense program, and create a tremendous amount of unemployment.

In view of all the strikes that the C. I. O. have called, it seems to me that you were not necessarily concerned with getting men back to work so much as you were with creating unemployment. Whether this is your objective or not, your group of leaders have not only done this, but they have seriously injured this country in carrying out its program of national defense, and further than that, many of these leaders have carried on the preachment of a doctrine that would eventually destroy this country.

I have never been opposed to constructive labor when properly led. As one example of this, I would mention Andrew Furuseth. I think this man was a real labor leader. He certainly worked for the interest and welfare of his men along constructive lines, but unfortunately, we have not had this type of leadership from your recent leaders. Whether you are responsible for this I do not know, but in your position, it is your duty to see that this type of leadership does not occur.

Taking a long-range view of this, I do not see how any labor leaders could ever countenance the thought of carrying on such a program as would destroy business or industry, or any part of it, for when this is done, if the results in other nations are any criterion, it will be found that nationalization of industry and business is a form of socialism and was quickly followed by a socialistic regime, a communistic regime, or a fascist regime. In every single instance, every labor union, as well as every business, was wiped out, as well as all rights of laboring men and all rights of ownership.

I am measuring these things not by what men profess at all, but by that which they actually accomplish. When we sum these actions up, these labor leaders will never be able to explain away the deplorable conditions that have existed on the Pacific coast, and particularly, that in the past week, which has just happened at the North American aviation plant at Inglewood, the lumber industry all along the coast, and for years the results accomplished by Harry Bridges in the shipping industry.

Will you tell me why any man who is a fellow traveler, or a Communist, should represent labor in collective bargaining? Will you also tell me why a man, like the alien, Harry Bridges and other alien communistic leaders, should come into this country and tell either business or the workingman who is a citizen, what to do?

I hope you are really serious in your solicitation for the unemployed, but I think one of the biggest helps you could be to this country today would be to cease causing unemployment by strikes, and particularly, in the face of the fact that millions of our young manhood are going to be drafted at $21 a month and are going to accept it, and in view of the further fact that many of the men who patriotically accept this draft are leaving their one-man businesses to serve the country, and are leaving salaries and earnings which are much higher than many of your skilled mechanics get.

Again, you should be cognizant of the fact that for every dollar that this defense program costs this country, it is going to cost the taxpayer a corresponding dollar and that he must replace it, and that a great part of this is going to come out of labor, and if you do not believe this you had better investigate the fact that a pair of shoes now bears 126 different taxes, a bar of soap 154, a pair of overalls 148, a cotton dress 125, a loaf of bread 52, and a bottle of milk 64. Labor had better recognize this, and in that recognition realize that in all these demands that are being made, in the long run it is going to come right back home. Then, also, look back about 2 years and remember that this country was doing its level best, through W. P. A. and otherwise, to keep men from going hungry, and paying $55 a month in my State on many jobs that did not do any particular good but were just created in order that payments could be made to preserve the self-respect by not accepting charity money. Now, when men can get necessary work the C. I. O. leaders on the west coast say they shall not work. Now then, check that up with many of the demands that are now being made and see if it squares out.

Then remember that this country already has a debt of sixty billions, ninety billions is being contemplated, and, if the country goes to war, it is said perhaps one hundred and fifty billions. What is going to be the final result of all this? Where will the employer be? Where will labor be? Where will the general public be if a break-down in the financial structure of this Government occurs? I will answer these questions and say that if history provides any precedent, it will lead to socialism, fascism, or communism, and no workman, no employer, and none of the public at large will benefit thereby, but, as a matter of fact, they will all lose all the benefits of American government and certainly what we have known up to this time as individual liberty.

Then, again, some day, some time, peace will come and war will cease. How do you suppose this country is going to compete with the forced labor conditions and low standard of living in Europe? What is going to happen to the American standard of living? It is high time that your group seriously considered some of these things and attempted to find the answer.

Very truly yours.

CONGRESS OF INDUSTRIAL ORGANIZATIONS,
Washington, D. C., June 9, 1941.

Hon. LELAND M. FORD,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN FORD: I want most earnestly to call to your attention the serious situation of many millions of Americans who are as yet unemployed.

According to available Government reports and to reports from our own affiliates, the situation of the unemployed is worse now than it has been at any time since the W. P. A. was started. Within the past year both local relief provisions and Federal Government work programs have fallen off much more rapidly than has unemployment.

Our C. I. O. economists estimate that there are nearly 9,000,000 unemployed. At the very best this number will be reduced by an average of only 2,000,000 during the next year. This will leave an average of 7,000,000 unemployed who are able and willing to work for the coming year. Certainly at least 3,000,000 of these will be very seriously in need.

To take care of this number would take between two and two and one-half billion dollars. Even to maintain the average of the past year would require at least $1,250,000,000.

It is my understanding that Congressman JOSEPH E. CASEY, of Massachusetts, has introduced an amendment providing for such increase to the 1941–42 appropriation. I want to urge in all sincerity your support of this increase. It certainly is a minimum amount.

It seems to me a patriotic duty to provide work for our unemployed and to make certain that this Nation shall prove to its working people that their welfare is a first concern.

Sincerely yours,

PHILIP S. MURRAY,
President, C. I. O.

Pensions for Dependent Widows and Children of Deceased World War Veterans

---

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS A. JENKINS
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 16, 1941

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, once more Congress, by a vote that was almost unanimous, has passed a bill providing for pension for the dependent widows and children of deceased World War veterans. I have been supporting measures of this kind for years. I think that the first bill of this kind ever introduced in Congress was a bill which I introduced back about 1926 or 1928. That bill carried provisions very similar to the present bill.

Congress has been making some minor changes in these bills from year to year, and it would seem that the bill that we have just been considering has been drawn in a very good form. I hope the President will not veto this bill. It has been unfortunate in the past that President Roosevelt has been vetoing these bills. I cannot understand why the President would be so liberal even to extravagance in the spending of billions upon billions of dollars while at the same time he has never been able to appreciate the situation of these World War widows who have been struggling to keep their little families together. I know of many instances in my district, and I am proud to say that I have done the very best I could by them, and have done what I could to provide them with support from every other possible source. Not long ago a World War veteran in my district died and left a wife with eight small children. The oldest of these children had not developed mentally or physically and was a tremendous care and responsibility to the mother. These children ranged in age from 17 years down to 1 year. The veteran died leaving them practically penniless. They lived far out in the country and far away from any opportunity where the older children could work and help their mother. This widow was unable to gain assistance from the provisions of the Social Security law, which provides aid for dependent children because she lived in a poor county that was unable to match the provisions of the Social Security Act. For several years that mother has been struggling along and has been living principally by reason of the charity of the neighbors, many of whom have not been able to divide their scanty hoard with her and her helpless brood.

There are many cases of this kind in the country. There are many other cases where the children have grown up but are still in school and still need many things that can come only as the result of sufficient finances.

This pension would go a long ways toward bringing aid and some degree of comfort to these families which have suffered because of the death of the breadwinner of the family.

The various veterans organizations of the country have for years supported this program. They realize that the finest demonstration of appreciation for military service loyally rendered to the Government would be for the Government to help give relief to the family of a veteran who was ready and willing to give his services and his life for his country.

It is not necessary for me to make a long address on this subject because practically every Congressman agrees with my views and I have spoken on this subject before this House on many occasions.

I am glad the bill is passed, and I am glad that I was in a position to assist with its passage.

The New Justices

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM G. STRATTON

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 17, 1941

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an editorial, The New Justices, published June 13, 1941, in the Freeport (Ill.) Journal-Standard:

[From the Freeport (Ill.) Journal-Standard of June 17, 1941]

THE NEW JUSTICES

The missing seats in the Supreme Court are now filled, and the complexion of the tribunal is at last what President Roosevelt long ago wanted it to be. Seven of the nine justices have been appointed by him, and an eighth, Chief Justice Stone, has been elevated from the post of Associate to Chief Justice. In other words, many things come to him who waits, even if he has been impatient about the waiting. To be sure, any President of the United States who succeeds in being elected for a third term has a good deal more chance of getting whatever he wants in the way of a Supreme Court than the average incumbent who serves only 4 or 8 years, and it is not remarkable that Mr. Roosevelt has been able to name seven justices to the Supreme Bench, a record surpassed by none of his predecessors save George Washington.

No longer is it correct to speak of the Supreme Court as "nine old men." The average age is now fifty-something, and the constitutional law which this Court will make will fill more volumes than one likes to think of. American constitutional history is in their hands for a good many years to come, and only a great optimist could feel certain that it is now in the very best of hands. Two of the present Court, Frankfurter and Murphy, have failed to show the Supreme Court stature or temperament that their previous records suggested. None of the other present justices except Stone can be thought to rank with Holmes, Hughes, Brandeis, or Cardozo.

This criticism would appear most unseemly to the retiring Chief Justice Hughes, who deplored any deprecatory attitude toward the high Court of the land. But if one cannot now help thinking of the new justices without thinking also of their political leanings and affiliations, it is not the fault of the public, but of Mr. Roosevelt himself, whose comments before and during the Court-packing fight emphasized those leanings.

RESOLUTION OF THE WOMEN'S GENERAL MISSIONARY SOCIETY OF THE UNITED PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I desire to include a resolution that was unanimously adopted by the General Missionary Society of the United Presbyterian Church of North America at its convention held in Washington June 6–10, 1941.

It is entitled to the earnest consideration of the membership of this House.

Resolved, That the Women's General Missionary Society of the United Presbyterian Church of North America, in convention assembled in the city of Washington, representing 35,000 women and young women, earnestly petitions the Members of the Senate and of the House of Representatives in considering legislation regarding the health and morals of the young men in military camps to take favorable action to prohibit the sale of all alcoholic beverages within the camps and in the vicinity of them, as well as commercial vice.

Therefore this organization strongly urges the passage of H. R. 2475, as amended, to include the Sheppard bill.

The Automobile in National Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE A. DONDERO

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 17, 1941

ARTICLE OF NATIONAL AUTOMOBILE DEALERS' ASSOCIATION

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, under permission granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to again bring to the attention of the House the part the automobile is to play in national defense. The motor transport opens a direct line to food supply, which produce must be brought to the Army, and it is by this means that the farmer moves to market the things which he raises and upon which the centers of population are dependent.

The article follows:

MOTOR TRANSPORT OPENS DIRECT LINE TO FOOD SUPPLY

"The Army moves on its stomach" has been a common military axiom since the time of Hannibal and Alexander the Great. In plain language, it means that an Army must eat to face the hardships of war.

But, first of all, the food must be brought to the Army, and that calls for speedy and efficient transportation, the National Automobile Dealers' Association points out in the seventh of its analyses showing the necessity of the motorcar in national defense and national economy.

Use of motor vehicles by farmers in moving produce to market has been one of the big developments of modern transportation. It has not only opened larger markets to agriculture, but it has raised the standard of living by providing the consuming public with fresh food in large quantities.

The greater expansion of markets has made the farmer wholly dependent on his car and his truck. Surveys which have been made show that more than 40 percent of the motor vehicles now in operation are owned by farmers and residents in rural communities under 2,500 population.

A survey made by the Michigan State Highway Department showed that of cars used by farmers, 92 percent are used in necessary functions of travel. In rural districts, according to the United States Public Roads Administration, 64 percent of the mileage covered by motor vehicles is for business purposes.

The largest concentration of automobiles on farms and in villages under 2,500 population is in the agricultural section known as the north central part of the United States, with approximately 5,000,000 motor vehicles registered in that area. In Iowa, which is one of the North Central States, the highways constitute the only transportation link between one-fourth of the communities and towns in the State.

A survey made by a private agency covering the States of Illinois, Iowa, Nebraska, Kansas, and Missouri, brought out the information that slightly above 1 percent of the farmers in that area bought passenger cars for pleasure only. Outside of that exception, all farmers replying to the questionnaire bought their automobiles for use in carrying on farm operations, using their cars for pleasure only as a combined convenience.

American farmers own and operate 1,000,000 trucks. According to the United States Department of Agriculture, 53 percent of the livestock, 27 percent of butter, 65 percent of the live poultry, and 40 percent of fruits and vegetables are moved from farm to market by truck.

Special studies made in 10 States indicate that 65 percent of all rural dwellings are within 1 mile of a surfaced road and 77.5 percent within 2 miles, which means that farmers have linked their operations with the availability of transportation.

Aside from making the business of professional farming more profitable, the development of motorized transportation has stimulated the back-to-the-farm movement and relieved the congestion of large cities. A factor in this movement is the small farms utilized by the factory worker to stabilize his income. With his motorcar this type of workman operates a direct line between factory job and his small farm, making him entirely dependent on personal transportation.

The population trend away from urban centers has also created thousands of completely motorized communities, where an automobile is as essential as a home. It is hardly conceivable that all of the inhabitants make their living in these motorized communities. Rather, they are employed in the industrial centers, and their entire mode of living has been organized on the assurance that they can travel to and from their jobs on schedule.

In national defense, the role of the farmer has become increasingly important, because of the lines of communication between his source of supply and the civilian population and the Army camps.

Defense Doom Comes to Small Manufacturer—Another Case History of the Plight of the Little Fellow

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. VINCENT F. HARRINGTON

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 11, 1941

LETTER FROM MASTER REFRIGERATED LOCKER SYSTEMS, INC., OF SIOUX CITY, IOWA

Mr. HARRINGTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include herein a letter from Mr. W. W. Wilson, president of the Master Refrigerated Locker Systems, Inc., of Sioux City, Iowa, giving another case history of the plight of the small manufacturer.

Here is a modern, well-equipped small manufacturing plant that has been trying for more than 6 months to obtain a defense contract or subcontract but without success. They sent a man to Washington to try and figure on some of this work. They ask for a chance to bid on Government work but the bid blanks are not furnished until it is too late to submit an offer. This has happened not once but many times to the small manufacturers of my district. They are always excluded from bidding by some technicality or other. Most of the time they cannot even get the bid blanks and specifications.

Having failed to get in on any defense work, these little manufacturers now face the likelihood of being shut off from their sources of raw materials. This will mean closing down the plants and throwing their employees out of work. Thus the defense program will bring doom rather than boom to the small manufacturer, who is entirely overlooked, ignored, rejected, and discriminated against by the present policy of placing defense orders.

Why do we not use our existing machine-tool facilities before spending the money and taking the time to build new plants?

The letter follows:

MASTER REFRIGERATED LOCKER SYSTEMS, INC.,
Sioux City, Iowa, June 5, 1941.

Hon. VINCENT F. HARRINGTON,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR VINCE: As you no doubt know, we have sent a list of our equipment to every procurement office of the United States. We have also sent in on several different occasions for bid forms on different articles that we are in a position to manufacture; however, something always comes up every time so it is impossible for us to make the bid. For example, on May 27 I wrote to the Navy Bureau of Supplies and Accounts to receive bid blanks on 8,000 steel dust pans. These bids were to be opened on June 3. The information I requested was received here at the office on June 3, so it was impossible for me to even try and place a bid. This has not only happened once but several times, and in talking it over with Leo Dailey, the secretary of the Chamber of Commerce of Sioux City, he has asked me to write you explaining the situation.

I realize that I am only 1 small manufacturer out of possibly 10,000 in the United States that is facing the same problem. As you know, we manufacture steel lockers for use in food-storage locker plants, and in the past 4½ years, we have furnished locker equipment for over 1,200 of these plants in the United States. At the present time, there are over 3,500 locker plants operating in the United States with an approximate 700,000 lockers; in other words, there are 700,000 families that are being served out of cold-storage locker plants, which means that there is over 14,000,000 pounds of meat and vegetables stored in locker plants by conservative families who are storing their foodstuffs for the economy that the locker plant presents.

Now we are faced with the problem of trying to get material to manufacture these steel lockers. Owing to the fact that we do not have a priority rating, certain manufacturers are not accepting orders from us for such material as bolts, etc., which means unless we can get some type of war contracts or subcontracts that we will have to close our plant and forget all about the locker business during the duration of the armament program, which also means that we will have 51 men to lay off, and lose our complete distributing organization that we have set up over the United States.

The National Locker Association, which is an association organized by the associations of every State in the Union, feel that they should be entitled to a priority number, owing to the place that the lockers hold in serving the communities in which they are established. The Government is talking conservation, and I know of no better way of conserving food products than through the locker-plant set-up.

Yours very truly,

MASTER REFRIGERATED LOCKER SYSTEMS, INC.,
By W. W. WILSON, President.

We Are All Trustees of Our Rich Inheritance of American Citizenship

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM H. LARRABEE

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 17, 1941

RADIO ADDRESS OF HON. MILO J. WARNER, NATIONAL COMMANDER OF THE AMERICAN LEGION

Mr. LARRABEE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to call to the attention of my colleagues, who may not have heard the message, the address made on the afternoon of May 18, 1941, by Hon. Milo J. Warner, national commander of the American Legion, from San Francisco, Calif., as a part of the National Citizenship Recognition Day ceremonies.

Mr. Warner's address, on that occasion, was directed specifically to thousands who have newly acquired citizenship by naturalization. In listening to his address I was moved to the realization that all of us would benefit by hearing, or reading his remarks, which challenged our realization that we are all trustees of our rich inheritance of American citizenship.

I submit herewith Mr. Warner's inspiring address:

Throughout America today community gatherings are being held to celebrate the coming to political citizenship of some two millions of young Americans. Honored with these young men and women are scores of thousands who have newly acquired citizenship by naturalization. As national commander of the American Legion I am proud to participate in such an occasion.

This beautiful Golden Gate Park in one of America's truly great cities in a State of magnificent splendor and wealth, of great natural resources and strength of American citizenship and character, provides a most fitting setting for this ceremony.

In such a place and on such an occasion one recalls the sturdy, stalwart men and women of America who fought their way to this great place of scenic beauty and virile strength of land and sea. They came through the deserts and mountains, they fought their way through hurricane at sea and storm on land, they came over almost impassable and insurmountable obstacles. As a result of their efforts we are here today.

To both of these groups—the native-born and the naturalized new citizens—I extend the salute of a representative group of mature Americans. We have been told that "a nation is a thing that lives and acts like a man, and men are the particles of which it is composed." We come then to consider whether this Nation has been generous and kind in making provision for your entry into the privileges and duties of adult citizenship.

I am confident that in this group of new Americans there is general acceptance of the basic concept of citizenship, which is the duty of the individual to give loyal service to the community, the State, and the Nation, in return for which he receives the protection of the whole people.

You are taking your place as citizens of this country at a critical time in the history of the world. Bloody war is raging throughout most of Europe and large parts of Asia and Africa. There is a clarion challenge issued to the democratic nations to prove themselves capable of surviving.

Your new status as political citizens of this country—superimposed on your former status as residents of this Nation—brings you within the orbit of that challenge. The manner of your acceptance of the challenge may determine the issue. I believe fully in your realization of the necessity to do all that must be done to preserve America inviolate, without a long black-out of all the freedoms we have inherited from the past.

This, as never before, is a time to strike bitterness and prejudice from our hearts, and look to the facts with such wisdom as we can muster. You come, fellow citizens, to join with the rest of us in a trying hour. Bring to our councils a mind free of old hates and fears, a mind fresh tuned to the task of this, our land. Coming to us in that way, you will bring strength to this, your country, when this strength is needed.

Following such a course, we will bring added strength to the pool of citizenship in which lies our greatest hope to come through to our ultimate destiny. It is even possible that our responsibilities for citizenship participation may call upon us to make anew the sacrifices that once a generation are called forth in the preservation of the civil, political, and religious liberties on which all our precious freedoms are based.

Remember that America belongs alike to all of us, whether our ancestors were linked to the Mayflower's voyage, or came in the later flood of immigration.

All the history of the United States, all the glory of its past, all of the service and sacrifice which gave it birth, are partly yours. We all have our share of it.

We belong to a people sprung from many races and many lands, a people big enough in heart and long enough in head to recognize that liberty and human rights belong to all men, and to welcome all true men to our participation in the blessings we cherish here.

Our new citizens today are of two groups now welded as one with sharing in the responsibilities and privileges of American citizenship.

The one group, the larger, embraces some 2,000,000 young Americans, who, born to the rights of American citizenship, now come into their priceless heritage upon arriving at the established age of full manhood and womanhood.

The other group, the smaller, made up, however, of scores of thousands, has voluntarily chosen to assume the responsibilities and duties of citizenship. Born in other lands and coming to our shores, they have elected to become citizen partners with us.

We are too apt at times to take for granted those things which come to us without voluntary effort on our part, without full recognition of their priceless values.

On the other hand, by toilful effort and painful experience, we have learned and have had branded indelibly on our own minds and consciences, sometimes by actual scars on our bodies, the value of those things reached and accomplished by our own volition and endeavor.

We who live in the United States believe this is the best and happiest country in the world. We must believe that because those who have brought it to its present enviable position in the world came to its shores of their own free will and accord and asked to become a part of it.

What makes it good? What makes it happy? What can keep it that way? We have a rare combination of natural resources and political freedom to insure this as the land of promise—a land where there still are new frontiers to cross.

We are vexed and confused now because the vast miasma of racial and ideological conflicts in the Old World impinges upon our national conscienciousness and issues a challenge to us—as a Nation—to determine whether our form of government can survive the terrific conflict in which world economic and military forces have pitted every element of their strength.

To refer to these world conflicts is to bring home to all of us the necessity for making definite, daily contributions to the support of our American citizenship. We must accommodate ourselves to the thought that we cannot gain something for nothing by being American citizens. We cannot continue to enjoy all of the abundant riches Nature has bestowed upon us; we cannot continue to enjoy all of the inheritance of free citizenship unless all of us are willing to do something as trustees of the rich inheritance of citizenship in the United States.

A good cow is a nice thing to own, but she will dry up if you don't milk her, starve if you don't feed her, get sick if you do not keep her in a clean barn.

A hive of bees is a nice thing to own, but you will not have the bees long if you do not house and care for them and watch out for them when they are ready to swarm.

The United States of America long has been called a land flowing with milk and honey. Compared to many other parts of the world it is all of that. We who are here have an equality before the law to share in the fruits of our citizenship. But there is a correlative need to consider whether we shall long maintain such a privilege if we neglect the duty to care for the cows and bees.

That is a simple way of saying that citizenship carries its duties and responsibilities. It is a statement whose every implication carries meaning to those among us who live in the United States. Here the land is rich in nature's goods. A high share of the potential future development of the United States of America lies here.

We recognize there is such a thing as destiny or fate, or that which bespeaks some invincible force controlling human life in the operations of the universe, and, on the other hand, we recognize the philosophy of self-determination as so bravely expressed by the poet Henley in the lines:

"It matters not how strait the gate,
How charged with punishments the scroll,
I am the master of my fate:
I am the captain of my soul."

We know that there is an all-prevailing power which rises above the individual will or movements of mere man. We also know that there lies within the power of man the privilege and the inherent duty of self-determination in many matters. Where lies the line of demarcation is the problem.

As a Nation we are now at the crossing of the ways. As a Nation we have before us a destiny and a decision. While there are many factors and dimensions directing our destiny over which we have no control, much still rests with our self-determination as individuals and as a Nation.

In one direction there lies an even road which woos the follower of the easy way and is the loiterer's course, but which leads to a morass and wilderness; to the darkness of the jungle and to the slavery of soul and spirit. In the other direction there lies ahead a difficult road—rough and rugged, bestrewn with obstacles and pits over which the travel is hard, and progress is at the price of travail and pain, of blood and sacrifice, but it leads to fertile valleys of prosperity and progress, and to vaulted mountain tops of freedom—freedom of soul and of body.

We, as a Nation, have come to the crossing of those ways. We have a decision to make. We must determine which road to take. The one is smooth—yes; smooth for a way, and then that smoothness levels into the bog of servitude, over which hangs the suffocating lethal gas of fear and oppression. The other way is rough and difficult, but it leads to the heights, while the vitalizing, invigorating air of freedom envelops and sweeps its length.

Down which road do we take the flag of our country? While we must choose which way to go, we cannot choose the smooth road and reach the destiny and goal at the end of the rough road.

Once again the world is faced with a raging conflict between two opposing forces, one endeavoring to drive us back to the Dark Ages, the other striving to preserve our progress and advance toward a fuller, richer, better life; the one representing devouring despotism, the other political forces supporting self-government and individual freedom for all.

As a great Nation and as the only Nation with the reserve power essential to stem the encroaching tide of despotism, we cannot ignore the world conflict now raging, the titanic struggle between despotism and liberty. It is a destiny from which we cannot flinch.

The issue between totalitarianism and Americanism is clearly and sharply defined. It is for us to determine whether Americanism will survive; should totalitarianism prevail over a great portion of the world, there is grave question whether our Government could truly live.

In meeting the problems ahead as individual citizens and as a Nation, it would be well for us to keep foremost fundamental principles—rules which are consistent with our tradition of living and government. May I suggest five basics which I feel all American citizens may well hold fast to in time of world storm.

1. We should at all times consider the interests of the United States, first, last, and always, and do nothing to destroy the national integrity or identity of our own country.

2. In the preparation of our national defenses and in our fight against those things that are threatening our country let us at all times maintain and preserve the fundamental, basic concepts of our form of government, a constitutional democracy so created as not only to express but also to make effective the desires of the majority and at all times preserve the fundamental rights of the minorities.

3. The present-day problems of national defense lie above all questions of partisanship, personal prejudices, or selfish interests. We must shuck off and cast aside all partisan and selfish viewpoints and motives.

4. We should be absolutely loyal to those whom we have placed in public office in our communities, our States, and in our Nation, for upon their shoulders in this time of emergency rests the official responsibility for our national-defense efforts, and we should support them. We have given them the job. Let every one of us assist them in the doing of it.

5. We should face the facts as they are, not as we should like to have them. We must be realistic, even though doing so gives us many a twinge. We must face the facts as they are today, not as they were yesterday, or yesteryear, nor even as we might like to have them tomorrow, or in the future, although we must, of course, plan and look ahead to the future. We must face conditions and facts as they are today, even though we might not like some of the milestones of the road over which we have traveled in arriving at the place where we are today.

The better things of life—abundance of life in soul and body, the richer existence in spirit and physical being—come through travail and pain, work and struggle. They are reached after trial and tribulation, after pluck and perseverance.

The splendor and beauty, the resources and riches of California, were found and reached, developed, and enjoyed, only after much sacrifice and struggle. And so it is with the privileges and inspiring strength of American citizenship. Its most refreshing waters are found in the deepest wells of service to the community, State, and Nation. Those who give the most get the most.

I like the motto of Kansas, one of our great Middle Western States—ad astra per aspera—"to the stars through hardships," declaring the creed of the courageous pioneer who, while literally hitching his wagon to oxen, however, in daring and driving spirit hitched his wagon to a star.

In terms of the future development of our country we should remember that the United States did not become great solely because Nature had so richly endowed the land in which we live. The flowering of our greatness came because man took the tools of Nature and, shaping them to his own use, developed a citizenry in harmony with all the freedoms we cherish.

Blood and sweat and toil and trouble is a phrase that occurs often to us now, as we see the great-hearted efforts of nations whose concept of citizenship most nearly approaches ours in their fight to beat down the forces of oppression and suppression. But every element of that phrase has been used by man in our own country in winning through to the greatness that is ours as a Nation today.

The back-breaking efforts of the families who crossed the prairies and mountains by covered wagon encompass a journey that is scarcely matched by any people in history in their efforts to realize a dream.

James Truslow Adams ably draws a word picture of that dream in The Epic of America, when he writes: "The American dream—that dream of a land where life may be richer and fuller for everyone according to his ability or achievement. It is not a dream of a land of motorcars and high wages merely, but of a social order where each man and each woman can attain to the fullest stature of which they are innately capable and recognized by others for what they are, regardless of the fortuitous circumstances of birth or position."

Such as that is our goal and endeavor. We in the United States have gone furthest toward it. It is reached by trial and perseverance and by united national integrity. It is reached by depth of purpose and character in performance by each of us as individual American citizens.

That great exponent and advocate of freedom, Thomas Jefferson, said a century and a half ago, "We are not to expect to be translated from despotism to liberty in a feather bed. Freedom is something that men must fight for; otherwise there would have been no need for them to pledge to each other their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor. What they regarded as priceless was not peace, but liberty."

He also said, "When we reflect that the eyes of the virtuous all over the earth are turned with anxiety on us, as the only depositories of the sacred fire of liberty, and that our falling into anarchy would decide forever the destinies of mankind, and seal the political heresy that man is incapable of self-government, the only contest between divided friends should be, who will dare farthest into the ranks of the common enemy."

As a Nation we must be willing to fight for our liberty and not to flinch from that fight ere it is too late.

Together as a Nation of courageous men and women, let us go bravely in a solid phalanx along the rugged road to the heights and our great destiny, in a way befitting the words of Dryden:

"Gladness in every face express'd,
Their eyes before their tongues confess'd,
Men meet each other with erected look,
Their steps were higher that they took."

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BERNARD J. GEHRMANN

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 17, 1941

RADIO ADDRESS OF HON. BERNARD J. GEHRMANN, OF WISCONSIN

Mr. GEHRMANN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address I am making over the radio this evening:

Apparently it has become high treason to suggest the full commercial development of the Nation. To those who want to hide the bright future of this country behind the smoked goggles of selfish interest, to those who are steeped in sectional and antisocial thinking, I suggest you turn your dials to a more pleasant program.

To those who believe in progress, good evening.

The world has been too well populated with "little men." By that I mean those individuals who have acquired little minds, who have lost their inherent foresight, and with it courage. Thank Heaven, these myopic "little people" are in the minority—but shame be it that they make the most noise.

This country did not grow great on milk-toast courage. To borrow the phrase of the Chief Executive, "The only thing we have to fear is fear itself." What if the buckskin-clad men who scaled the heights of the Appalachians and, after looking into the green forests in the valleys of the Middle West, had said, "The land is a jungle of trees; we cannot live there." What if Lincoln had said, "We cannot hold this Nation united; we are permanently divided by discordant interests." Fine courage, my friends, and unselfishness, but there were "little men" in those times, too.

I would like to turn back the pages of time to show you what the minority of "little people" have accomplished. For recorded ages they have hung a millstone about the neck of progress. It is 1721 and Thomas Steers has proposed the Manchester Ship Canal to bring food and commerce to the interior of England. The selfish interests and their stooges are militantly opposing it—Liverpool is fighting it bitterly.

Year after year, decade after decade, the narrow selfish group of "little men" fought the idea and succeeded in keeping progress at bay for 173 years. Finally after much strife, the courageous and socially minded succeeded in securing the completion of this shipway. But hark, this ridiculous story could now be a tragedy, for the Manchester Ship Canal is keeping a huge share of the English people from starvation this very minute. But the loud little minority had thought only of Liverpool—and not of England. We have a fine parallel in the opposition to the St. Lawrence seaway today.

To return to our story, Liverpool did not vanish, her commerce was not destroyed—she became the greater. Thousands of workers built homes in the Manchester area, coming in from the hinterlands. Thousands of new families traded in the Liverpool district. New industries were established all along the canal, and the section became great industrially.

New York and Buffalo are the Liverpools of this Nation. They are opposing the seaway on the same groundless fears, but let them take a lesson from this narrative, for as surely and as inevitably, the seaway as a full-fledged ship canal is certain to be built, and better now than later.

The inspiring thing about history is the lesson it brings—that progress can be halted but never stopped.

In the pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORDS of the late years of the old century and the first of the new, we find the same clique opposing the Panama Canal that now oppose the seaway. These stooges of the opposition were drooling with pretty flourishes of oratory, motivated by a desire to serve vested interests. When the issue became one of national defense, the transportation groups no longer found their position tenable—they knew they could not sabotage defense efforts and keep face.

Returning to the musty pages yellowed with time, we see in 1902 a Member of the Senate opposing the Canal and insisting that the only reason America wished to undertake the project was to show off to the rest of the world, and more particularly to show up the French, who had failed.

The stated reasons for lobbying against the Canal ran the entire gamut of the human imagination. Waving the flag and piously droning about economy, they pleaded that the hard-headed, sensible, and conscientious people knew there was not, and never could be, an economic justification for digging the ditch. One Member direly prophesied that volcanic action in the Caribbean region would make the maintenance of the Canal unfeasible—if, indeed, it ever could be completed.

This all sounds insane now, but for years these insincere rantings kept the Panama Canal from completion. Had they had their way, we might now be facing a tragedy with the international checker game moving as it is. But the loud little minority thought only of their selfish and sectional interests and not of America.

Old Glory has 48 stars. All the 48 States represented in that beloved blue field are knit together in a common purpose—to make a great, united Nation. When a decision faces this country, it follows that all the States' interests shall be considered. No State, because of the numerical advantage of representation, should attempt to block the economic progress of her sister States. This is more true today than ever, when we are struggling in one mighty effort to keep our place in the sun.

Friends in the East, your economic position is not threatened by the completion of the seaway. Great additional electric-power sources will provide for a new expansion of industry in New York and her sister States of the New England group. In the territory served by the inland ports of this waterway will be built a great empire—the purchasing power of these people will be reflected in orders to industries on the east coast. To the consumers in this region will come great savings in foodstuffs from the grain belts of the Middle West. The coastal cities of the Atlantic will find undreamed of markets within the borders of their own land.

Friends of the South, your surpluses of cotton can be utilized by consumers in the Lake States. They can trade their cars and manufactured goods for your grapefruit, oranges, oil, tobacco, and other products.

We will all find new standards of living by the interchange of commercial goods.

The benefits of the production of wealth in the Mississippi Valley will spread in every direction and enrich every nook and corner of the Nation.

To California we can truthfully say that the principal market for the products of its people—their oranges, grapes, and figs—is now and always will be in the midcontinent of America; to our friends from Georgia we can say that the market for peaches, peanuts, and pecans would soon be doubled if the seaway were built; to the people of Connecticut we can say that their market for dollar watches and nutmegs would increase by leaps and bounds; to the people of Louisiana that they would sell more rice and that the port of New Orleans would do more business if the empire to the north of them were fully developed.

People of all the Nation, we cannot afford great waste—not now. The race for economic supremacy calls for the planned and intelligent use of every part of America. In his recent message to Congress, President Roosevelt said, and I quote, "I know of no single project of this nature more important to this country's future in peace or war. Its authorization will demonstrate to the enemies of democracy that, however long the effort, we intend to outstrip them in the race of production. In the modern world that race determines the rise or fall of nations."

We have all been called upon to subsidize agriculture. The reason for this has been the fact that the farmer could not, because of high transportation costs, deliver to markets profitably. Huge piles of grain lay rotting on the fertile soil of the West, while much of the Nation goes hungry for bread. Some of the States have lost population year after year—because farming was a poor business. With the completion of the seaway we restore farming as a great industry—the Okies can come back to the land. Now most of the farms in the great agricultural region are mortgaged and over half of the farmsteads are operated by tenant farmers. Keep the benefits of the seaway from them much longer and we will have the land abandoned—we will have created a great arid inland desert. The railroads serving them will become streaks of rust.

Much organized opposition has come from the railroad unions. This is motivated by the fear that the seaway will injure the roads. I have constantly maintained that this has no basis in fact.

To support my contention, I offer in evidence the fact that many of the presidents of the railroads of the Nation have openly supported the project. The roll includes Ralph Budd, of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy, who is now transportation expert on the defense organization for President Roosevelt; also Hale Holden, who is with the Southern Pacific, and many others. This is an imposing array of names from the most progressive systems, and who favored the seaway 7 years ago. It should serve to lull into security the fears of the employees. If they felt that the seaway would injure their business rather than help it, they would be opposing it with all the resources at their command.

I have always worked in the interests of the railroad employees and the laboring man and, if in my judgment the project would adversely affect their interests, I would oppose it, too.

The opposition has expressed the fear that an influx of cheap foreign goods and foreign labor will be attendant upon the opening of the seaway. To them, I say, foreign goods cannot be shipped into this country via the St. Lawrence any differently than they could enter from our ocean ports, as long as we protect our markets with tariff regulations. Foreign labor cannot stay here to compete with us as long as alien registration and immigration laws are kept in effect.

These statements have about as much foundation in fact as the other claims of the enemies of the shipway—that we will sacrifice the sovereignty of Lake Michigan—that the project bears no relation to national defense.

To those of all political faiths, the seaway was not conceived by, nor has it been fostered by, one political party. President after President, Republican and Democrat alike, have urged the building of the route from Superior to the sea. They have all, conservative and liberal, seen the need, the wisdom, and the economic justification for the project both as a source of power and as a transportation aid. Our President has called for the completion of the St. Lawrence waterway as vital to our present national-defense efforts.

Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Knox, has called for a miracle in shipbuilding. In the shipyards of the Great Lakes, many of them now idle and rusting, lies a part of that miracle, while the shipyards of the rest of the Nation are choked with orders.

Wake up, America! Wake up! This is a task that everyone might well dedicate himself to doing. In the days ahead we will hear the old, old stories that have kept the seaway a paper project for a quarter of a century and more. It is the loud little minority again failing to think of America. I urge every civic-minded person, the far-sighted people, in all the Nation to assist. This is your country, your Government, and the project is your cause. You—everyone listening to my voice—can help build the seaway by building support behind your Senators and Representatives. Let this not be his choice alone; write, wire, send petitions and letters; don't let up until the task is done. A united, determined people can and will tear out the barriers to progress and make a route to one of our greatest assets that we have negligently left undeveloped—America's inland sea.

Farmers Burdened With High Freight Rates Demand St. Lawrence Seaway

REMARKS

OF

HON. R. T. BUCKLER

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 17, 1941

Mr. BUCKLER of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, having been a wheat farmer in the Red River Valley of Minnesota for 37 years, I was amazed by the argument of my Nebraska colleague [Mr. COPELAND] some days ago against the St. Lawrence seaway. He quotes figures to show that Canadian rail rates from the prairie provinces to Lake Superior are lower than corresponding rates in our Western States, and from these facts makes an awkward and futile effort to show that the seaway would do harm to our agriculture. Just how lower rates from lake ports to our own eastern population and to world markets can by any possibility hurt a prairie wheat farmer is not disclosed.

We, who during a life struggle on western farms for a bare existence have been subjected to arbitrary and burdensome rail rates to deep water, are eager to secure the benefit of low rates from any lake port to the sea. And the rail rates in Canada cannot by any sophistry be made to detract from such benefit.

Red River farmers are not unfamiliar with the economic factors that have entered into the development of the West on both sides of the border. We are fully aware of the arrangements made by the Canadian Government and the Canadian railways a generation ago for cheap, long-haul grain rates in order to lure settlers to the remote areas of their marvelous prairie empire. In return their railways received certain gratuities. Our Government also made vast grants to our western roads, but with no stipulation as to grain rates, and the few privileges stipulated to the Government have been largely surrendered. For a time our grain carriers made rates that were partly but not fully competitive in the border area. These concessions were abandoned in 1935, by permission of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and rates are now higher than ever before since the earliest settlement of the West. We are, therefore, in more need of the seaway now than when the treaty was rejected by the Senate 7 years ago. However, it then received an affirmative vote of 46 to 42, showing that a majority of that body, after extended hearings and long deliberation, favored the project even before the President raised the issue of defense.

My colleague finally turns from the seaway to the inland rivers for farm relief. He says, and I quote his words:

> The hope of the farmer of the Middle West to reach world markets lies, not in a seaway through Canada, but in low barge service to the Gulf and out to the sea upon the Illinois, Mississippi, Missouri, and Ohio Rivers and their tributaries.

I am for all possible river improvements and wish these inland waterways Godspeed in bringing relief to the Mississippi Valley farmers. But how a Great Lakes 27-foot seaway with ocean craft can hurt me and the farmers of my area while a 9-foot river channel can help me, is a mystery to me and to all who heard the gentleman from Nebraska address this body. He thinks that 9 feet of water with flatboats, is just right and helpful, but three times that depth with great cargo carriers is destructive. He reminds me of the colored valet who was given a bottle of liquor by his master. A few days later the master inquired how he liked the gift. "Jess right," was the reply. Asked what he meant by "jess right," he said, "If it had been any worse it would have killed me, and if any better you wouldn't give it to me."

Opponents of the seaway try to arouse national prejudice by calling it a canal through Canada. I live too near the border and know the Canadian people too well to entertain such feeling.

Early in this century, nearly 40 years ago, there was a strong movement for a 20-foot channel from Chicago to the Gulf. The State of Illinois espoused the cause, and much time and money were spent in exploration. It was proposed to divert 14,000 cubic second-feet of water from Lake Michigan to float the expected commerce, and there was much enthusiasm throughout the Midwest for the project. All our hopes were for its consummation. However, the most efficient engineers finally declared the project impracticable, as the cost of maintenance of so deep a channel in such a silt-bearing stream as the Mississippi was forbidding. The 9-foot depth was recommended and has been standardized on the Ohio, the Illinois, and the Father of Waters. I urge all such internal waterway improvements, not only for the farmer but for all lines of industry, and rejoice in the prosperity not only of my fellow farmers, but my fellow citizens of all occupations everywhere. At some future time, I shall take up other features of this groundless, gratuitous, and malignant attack on the only outlet for my people to the sea. Suffice it now to say that whatever may be the sentiment of other States or other areas of our country, the Red River Valley of Minnesota stands for the United States, and will have the support of my vote for any measure that will serve the welfare of the remotest section of our country or the humblest groups of our people.

David Lawrence Proposes Planning for a Peace After the War as an Effective Program of Defeating Hitler and His Axis Partners

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KARL E. MUNDT

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 17, 1941

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Speaker, what course of action is best for America? It is this question, sir, which Americans throughout the length and breadth of our great Republic are now searching their souls to answer. Upon the ability of the collective thinking of America to find the right answer to that question depends the future of our way of life in our sphere of influence. This has truly become the most important question ever to face the self-governing people of a free republic.

Mr. Speaker, I am not one of those who feels that in the answering of a question affecting the destiny of every American and which will provide joy or promote sorrow in every home of our land, the defining of the ultimate answer to such a question should be the exclusive right of any man, or group of men, nor should it be confined to citizens of any section of this country, geographically, nor to any segment of our population from the standpoint of their occupation.

The question, What course of action is best for America? is one which probes into the lives of all the people of America and it is manifestly one which the entire cross section of public sentiment should help to answer. In this we differ from the practice of the unfortunate people of Germany, or Italy, or Russia, where a single leader asks and answers all the questions and the rights of the people begin and end with the ancient formula "ours but to do or die." America is great because its people through their collective judgment and energies have made it great. It is not great because a few outstanding men have told its people what to do; it is today the greatest Nation in the world because the joint judgment of its people, through the years, have counseled with their great leaders in formulating public policies which have best served the public weal. The formula of freedom which has built America will protect and preserve America if it is not forsaken for methods made of shoddier stuff.

AMERICA AT THE CROSSROADS

It is therefore both important and inspiring that as America stands at the crossroads today, searching for the correct answer to the question, What is best for America? the people of America both in and out of Government are analyzing their thoughts as never before. This is not a question to be answered by the President. It is not a question to be determined, alone, by Cabinet officers and Executive appointees. Nor is it a question to which Congress alone can assume the princely right to make reply. It is a question for men and women in all walks of life to discuss and consider; it is a question which mothers and fathers, together with their sons in the military services, have a right and a duty to help to decide. It is a question for farmers to argue as much as it is a question for lawyers to discuss. It is a question for men of all parties, all creeds, all colors. It—the most important question of our era—is a question which editors and preachers, housewives and statesmen, store clerks and big business executives, laborers and capitalists, youngsters and oldsters in all walks of life should analyze, study, discuss, consider, and decide. It is thus that our Republic truly functions: it is thus that the formula for freedom operates where men are free and where self-government is a reality. For, in America, the people are the government.

When the people speak, so speaks the Government. Here in America, under God the people rule. Our Constitution provides the specific framework through which the people of America can express their convictions to their representatives in Congress and in the executive departments and through these representatives, in turn, implement the people's desires into established Government policy. And once, such policy is established, by the people through their constitutional means, Americans have always joined ranks to promote their country's interests. So, too, it must always be.

On the gravest question now confronting our beloved Republic—war or peace—the people have not spoken and discussion of the question continues as we search for the formula which will answer the problem, "What is best for America?" We are a united people on many aspects of that formula. We unite in supporting a program of all possible aid short of war to Britain and on this Congress and the people have spoken. We unite in developing an impregnable defense for this country and this hemisphere. On this the Congress and the people have also spoken. We are united in our determination to rid this Republic of subversive agents of the poisonous creeds of the Nazis, Communists, and Fascists, and to protect America against infestation from within or from without by these disciples of totalitarianism. On this, too, the Congress and the people have spoken.

AMERICA SEEKS GUIDE FOR FUTURE ACTION

Only on steps beyond the three foregoing established policies of America today does debate continue and do people still search for the best course of action to best serve America. Beyond this the people and the Congress have not spoken except through unofficial polls registering them some 80 percent against involvement in war, or by their election of candidates pledged not to send American boys to fight across the seas. America still seeks prayerfully for a guiding star to light our course of action beyond the points upon which we already stand united.

Mr. Speaker, I think America is today united on another point but it is an objective rather than a course of action. America is united in a desire to see Hitler defeated in this war and to see nazi-ism, communism, and fascism foiled in any dreams of world conquest which may be cherished by their leaders as a possible result of either military might or subversive tactics. Americans hate tyranny. In a speech on the floor of the House on June 18, 1940, in which I advocated stronger defense collaboration between North and South America I made the following statement which I subscribe to today, with even greater vigor than I did a year ago:

> Mr. Chairman, I have fought Hitlerism, Stalinism, and Mussolini-ism in and out of Congress. I began the fight in my own State nearly 7 years ago in speeches before high-school commencement audiences, service clubs, community groups, and wherever I could find an audience. In 1936 I devoted the better part of a whole political campaign to fighting subversive influences in America and, although defeated and accused of setting up "straw men" at which to shoot, I have never stopped the fight, and I shall never stop it until America is rid of these "peddlers of piffle" who would import alien ideas of government into America to becloud our great ideal of a fair chance for a free people through self-government. I have probably given more speeches against these pagan philosophies of European "isms" by two times over than any other individual in my State, and among my proudest votes in Congress are those which I cast to continue the Dies committee so that sufficient evidence could be unearthed to forever expose and exclude nazi-ism, fascism, and communism from America. Therefore, I venture to insist today that we do more than pass a resolution. I hope we may rededicate ourselves fervently to a crusade against these foreign "isms," both in North and South America.

How then can America best govern its actions to protect its own way of life in its own sphere of influence and to register its mighty will to bring defeat to Hitler and his Axis partners? Some sincere Americans advocate that the best procedure to follow is for this country to enter the war, to send her sons across the tractless oceans once again to fight the legions of Germany, Italy, Japan, and perhaps Russia, and even France, on whatever foreign continent or ocean that we can establish contact with them. Too few of such people, however, go far enough to point out what they would have follow the fighting. Should America, following such a war, become the policeman of the world, enforcing by our might of arms our policies throughout the world, maintaining the boundary lines we deem appropriate in Africa and Europe and Asia? Should we insist with military might an international code of conduct in conformity with our ideals? If so, at what a cost? And with what chances of success? And with what results to the internal economy and political freedom of our own people here at home? Unless such questions are answered honestly and accurately, and in our American interests, in advance of our joining the fighting, it would seem to be both foolhardy and futile to send our boys across the seas to make the supreme sacrifice again. Such unplanned procedure might do more to contribute to the decay of the America which we have known than to protect and defend the America we cherish.

OTHER CHOICES THAN WAR OPEN TO AMERICA

Mr. Speaker, there are other choices open to America. There are other possible answers to the question, What course of action is best for America? We should consider carefully all these alternatives, too, before permitting haste, hysteria, sentiment, or propaganda to push us beyond the point from which there is no turning back and to plunge us into a war for which we are very sadly unprepared. One such possible answer is to prepare ourselves so well and to fortify our outlying bases so strongly that war cannot come to America unless America goes to the war. Hanson Baldwin, military expert for the New York Times, in his book, United We Stand, has outlined the feasibility and strength of such a course of action. And those who now contend that we are today prepared to go forth to whip the world cannot seriously contend that we are not making mighty progress in the business of protecting ourselves against the world, if need be, here in the Western Hemisphere.

Another possible course of action is to exert the great strength of America in an effort to end this war rather than in expanding it to other countries. This course of action would aim at a defeat of Hitler just as definitely as a course of action requiring the sending of countless numbers of American soldiers, sailors, and airmen to fight and die on foreign fighting fronts. Our strength in peace might count as heavily in the scales of justice as our strength in war. If we can help develop, with the aid of a conference of other nonbelligerent countries or by ourselves, a pattern for the world after the war which will restore the independence of liberty-loving people now under the aggressor's heel, and which will provide economic justice and political privileges to people everywhere, we shall have offered the people of every belligerent country something to hope for which may well overshadow the sordid goals which dictators hold up as something to fight for. If we do this, we accomplish the break-down of home morale in the dictatorial countries, and such a collapse will do more to bring victory for freedom than the winning of dozens of battles or the slaughter of hundreds of thousands of men, women, and children. Woodrow Wilson's 14 points during the World War did more to end that conflict than a whole series of military victories because it helped precipitate mutiny and discontent at home which the whole junker military establishment could not counteract. It might be worth trying again. It can cost America nothing. It might earn humanity much.

NOT AN APPEASER'S PEACE

In all events, such an effort would not be a negotiated peace nor an appeaser's armistice. Far from it. It would be an effort to provide the mighty influence of the United States in promoting a just and equitable peace of a lasting nature. Its terms would of necessity provide the elimination of the sources of unrest and the leaders of tyranny who are now bringing so much heartache to the entire world. If it succeeded, such an effort would revive the hope of all humanity. If it failed, it would at least strike a mighty blow at the home front of the dictatorial countries whose leaders refused to accept principles of justice and equity as the basis for bringing an end to the war. And, if after the effort were made, it finally became necessary for the United States to enter the war and the people and the Congress so decreed, we would at least have the satisfaction defined by Miss Dorothy Thompson in a recent letter to me when she concluded her argument that we should start now to plan for a world after the war by stating:

> Then if we have to fight, we shall at least know what we are fighting for.

We have made some isolated, individual steps in the direction of thinking toward peace, but they are few in number and unsupported as yet by governmental approval. Secretary Hull on May 18 suggested a five-point program. Senator CONNALLY, Congressmen RANKIN, VORYS, and LUDLOW have proposed possible courses of action. Others have offered their answers to the question, What is best for America? Let us hope that the collective intelligence of America may yet develop a course of action which will prevent the necessity of the collective manpower of America being thrown into the cauldron of blood and sweat and tears and toil which is now ravaging so much of the world in the sordid slaughter of war.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I offer the editorial from the June 20 issue of the United States News, from the pen of David Lawrence, who is recognized as anything but an isolationist or an appeaser, but whose zeal for the best interests of America compels him to propose an interesting suggestion for a course of action which this country might pursue while preparing itself to the hilt to defend all that all of us hold most dear:

[From the United States News of June 20, 1941]

A BILLION FOR PEACE

(By David Lawrence)

The talk is of war and more war.

Our national-defense program is a war program.

Our strategy is to help win the war for democracy.

Meanwhile there is no leadership for peace, the very goal we all seek in the end.

It is no answer to say that peace must come by the sword, that nations must be brought to their knees and then there will be peace. For peace does not last when it comes in a spirit of vengeance and passion. It can endure only when it is based on principles of live and let live, of fairness, equity, and human understanding.

We are spending $40,000,000,000 on a war program. We are not spending a cent on a program of peace.

But preparedness for peace is as essential as preparedness for war. We entered the last war and spent billions and then in the 1920's we ignored the causes of the war and the forces of instability which ultimately brought on the second World War. To prepare for peace now is to prevent the wars of the future.

How can it be done? Where there is a will to peace, peace can be achieved. We do not today sufficiently recognize peace itself as a problem of immediate concern. Yet peace must be made eventually and with the very nations against which we are lined up today.

The paramount necessity is communication. We must begin to communicate with the German and Italian peoples. We must start talking to them. We must then begin to listen to them, too. We must draw a distinction between the misguided rulers, who do not believe in human understanding but only in murder, and the 80,000,000 persons who are victims of misrule.

THE WILL TO PEACE NOW IS UNIVERSAL

Nobody, it will be said, will begrudge a billion dollars for peace, if the movement can get anywhere. Who, on the other hand, can assure us that the tanks we are building will get anywhere? The tonnage to transport them overseas must be built. The battle-front where they can be used is yet to be selected. And still we build tanks and contract to build more tanks. The reason is that we have faith that such machine power ultimately will be needed somewhere in our war program. Can we not apply the same spirit of faith to peace? Can we not assume that some day there will have to be a peace conference, and that some day the public opinion of the world will have to be mobilized behind such a conference so as to bring a lasting peace?

In our hearts is a will to peace. In the hearts of Britons is a will to peace. In the hearts of the German and Italian peoples is a will to peace. We need not for a moment doubt it just because we know there exists at the same time a will to defend, a will to perish, if need be, in defense of what each believes is a just cause.

RADIO STATIONS COULD FURTHER PEACE PLANS

There is nothing irreconcilable between a willingness to fight and a willingness to make peace. The object of all war is to compel a peace. The object of a preparedness program for peace is to shorten war and to make a better peace than can come from a mere truce of arms.

We lack today in America an understanding of the needs of a preparedness program for peace. Our leadership is wholly absorbed in defense plans which may at any moment become war plans. It requires, to be sure, a delicate piece of national management which can at one time urge the people on to war and concurrently urge them to prepare their minds for peace. The conflict is considerable, but it is not insurmountable. Conflict is the essence of the human problem in a crowded world. We meet it on every side, in our States and cities, in our neighborhoods. We meet war on the labor front every day. We seek through mediation to find the answers to such conflict. It is hard to handle. The tasks of peace making in industry are beset with passion and pride as well as with greed and selfishness. But undaunted we seek just the same to solve such conflicts by the processes of reason.

Shall it be said that 130,000,000 Americans are incapable of setting in motion their will to international peace, that 80,000,000 Germans and 48,000,000 Britons will not listen to equitable and fair plans for the making of world peace?

What man can do in making war he can do in making peace. The challenge to human ingenuity is not less in seeking to make the world safe for decent citizens who want to live in peace than it is in making the world safe from the ravages of some dread disease. We can try to isolate the germs of war and treat them by common endeavor. We may make peace, not tomorrow, not next week, but perhaps by Christmas 1941 if we start now. Why wait till 1942 and 1943?

The first prerequisite to a peace program is the establishment of a number of powerful short-wave radio stations both in this country and in Europe, in Africa, and in Asia. The United States can buy or lease stations in British territory. It should be as easy to do as the lending or leasing of a naval destroyer.

Such radio stations should be entirely in the control of the United States so that all the world will know they are disconnected from any other government.

The American Government should appoint a peace commission to be composed of representative American citizens who are as versed in the problems of economic friction and trade in the world as the admirals are in naval strategy. Such a commission should formulate at the earliest possible moment the bases for a new world order—first for discussion and ultimately for the adherence of peoples.

But primarily the German people as well as the British people and the peoples of the subjugated countries must be assured of the good faith and fundamental disinterestedness of the American Government's peace mission. It will not be so received at the outset but it will gradually be apparent as the pronouncements by a disinterested peace body become known.

Once it is made clear that the idea of crushing the German people and making them slaves is furthest from the thoughts of the peoples of the democratic countries, the principal prop beneath the Hitler regime will disappear in central Europe.

GERMAN PEOPLE SHOW APATHY TOWARD WAR

Recently former Ambassador John Cudahy, on returning from Germany where he interviewed Hitler, told reporters in Jersey City that the people of Germany were not elated about the victories of their armies, but seemed strangely apathetic. This is understandable. What enthusiasm can there be among the German people for a war that may not end in a permanent peace? Germans know all too well, if they will but admit it, that the sword never brings a satisfactory peace. They of Germany, just as we of America and the people of Britain are yearning for a peace that somehow never becomes articulate. We want a peace in which the great Christian ideal shall permeate the relations of human beings. We want a peace in which man shall live up to the highest and not the lowest impulses that are within him. We want a peace that makes it possible for us to extend to those who were once against us the hand of fellowship and good will. We want a peace in which, paradoxically enough, we shall share with others what really doesn't belong to us—the property or savings that God permits us to possess for a brief span of years.

WAR MUST END IN A VICTORY FOR REASON

We know what we want. We want mankind to rise to a civilized status—to a recognition of the fact that all men are created equal and that they all have a right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, that there can be no such thing as racial superiority or inferiority, and that there must be no suppression of human freedom by any force inside or outside of government anywhere in the world.

These ideals are not difficult to express. What is difficult is to transmit them. We must begin to speak to those who are alined against us and those who are ranged alongside of us. We must speak of a new world order in terms of hope and a willingness to sacrifice even of our goods and chattels so that the world may become peaceful again. How paltry do tariffs and selfish economic advantages in trade seem today as mandatory priorities upset business and as taxes grow to unbearable heights.

Who now shall say that we cannot bring economic peace when we of the democracies control the raw materials and national resources and the gold of the world? Our weapons of peace are legion. The sinews of peacemaking are all around us. Instrumentalities for expression lie idle. Can we not start making use of them?

It takes a long time to persuade others that we sincerely mean to befriend them. Our initial step must be to show by example that we have a humane spirit within us which wants peace—but peace at a price. That price must be the withdrawal of the yoke of subjugation from all nations and individuals. The German people must sooner or later come to understand that the way to our deliverance from war is the way of their deliverance. This war must end not in victory for brute force but in a victory for reason.

Let the Government of the United States spend a billion dollars now on a crusade of reason. Let our program be based on an honest acceptance by all of us of the principles of human brotherhood. And let us in this world of sorrow and hate speak with a voice of kindliness—a voice that dares to urge the reconstruction of the human spirit itself in the relations of peoples and governments.

The History of the American Flag

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JENNINGS RANDOLPH

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 17, 1941

ADDRESS OF SEFTON DARR, FORMER PRESIDENT OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA BAR ASSOCIATION

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, it was my privilege Sunday evening to address the Flag Day exercises, sponsored in Washington by the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks. There were some 24 participating organizations.

I enjoyed all phases of the program, and was especially impressed by the speech of Sefton Darr, former president of the District of Columbia Bar Association, who told of the history of our flag. As he told of the steps leading to each new design, a flag bearer would carry that specific emblem to the front of Sylvan Theater platform, near the base of Washington Monument, until all flags up to the present pattern were massed before the audience of some 2,000.

I include Mr. Darr's address at this point:

Heraldry is as old as the human race. The carrying of banners has been the habit of barbarian and civilized in all ages. These banners usually contain some concept of the life of government of those who fashion them.

The evolution of the American flag is as interesting as the evolution of the American Government. Its original instability is now matched by a peerless immobility. During the period of its growth and lack of finality it embraced parts of the banners of other countries—sometimes showing even shrubs and serpents and being devoid of originality.

This period of instability of the form and coloring of our flag ceased with the definite fixing of the Government it represented. When nationality became assured, when State independence and State interdependence were exactly measured, when responsibility and international place were no longer open for debate, then, and not until then, the flag became definite.

When John Cabot landed at Labrador in 1497, 5 years after Columbus' discovery of America, he planted on that North American soil the red cross of England, the flag of King Henry VII.

From the landing of the Mayflower in 1620 until 1775 the flag of England was our flag. In 1606 the field of the English flag had been changed from white to blue, and the white cross of St. Andrew was placed thereon by order of King James I, and the banner was called the union of the King's Colors.

In 1607 the color of the flag was changed from blue to crimson, and the two crosses on a blue field were placed in the upper corner.

The Colonies recognized this change and placed a pine tree on a white field in lieu of the crosses.

In 1775 the pine-tree flag was adopted for all colonial vessels, and this banner was carried by the Americans in the Battle of Bunker Hill.

The southern colonies from 1776 to 1777 used the snake flag.

In the latter part of 1775 a committee was appointed by the Continental Congress to consider the question of a single flag for the Thirteen Colonies. That committee recommended that the design should be 13 alternate stripes of red and white in the upper corner of which would be an azure field bearing the red cross of St. George and the white cross of St. Andrew. John Paul Jones, the senior lieutenant of the flagship Alfred, hoisted this flag to the masthead on December 3, 1775; 1 month later it was raised over the headquarters of Gen. George Washington at Cambridge, Mass., "in compliment," as he wrote, "to the United Colonies."

This flag, which was called the Congress Colors and the Grand Union Flag, was never carried in the field by the Continental land forces, but it was used by the Navy as its exclusive ensign, and was the first American flag to receive a foreign salute of honor. The Fort of Orange, on the island of St. Eustatius, Dutch West Indies, fired a salute of 11 guns in acknowledgment of a similar salute from the Andrew Doria, under command of Capt. Isaiah Robinson; an act for which the Governor of the island was recalled by the Republic of the Netherlands, in deference to the protest of the English Government.

There was much dissatisfaction with this flag because it bore, as a part thereof, a design so distinctive of the flag of England; and in response to a general demand for a banner more specifically representative of our own country, on June 14, 1777, the Congress provided:

"That the flag of the United States be 13 stripes of alternating red and white; and that the union be 13 stars, white on a blue field, representing a new constellation."

Whether Betsy Ross, a Philadelphia Quakeress, had the honor of making the first United States flag is a debated question. It is generally believed that in May or June of 1776 a committee consisting of George Washington, Robert Morris, and George Ross called on her and commissioned her to make a flag from a rough design they brought with them. It is said that she suggested that the stars should have five points rather than six.

This banner of starry beauty received its baptism of fire at Fort Schuyler, N. Y., on August 3, 1777, during an attack by British and Indians. The flag was made on the spot. Soldiers' shirts furnished the cloth for the white stars and stripes; the red stripes were made from a red petticoat belonging to the wife of one of the privates; and Capt. Abraham Swartout's blue cloth coat was used for the blue field.

All Americans will recall that the first official salute to the Stars and Stripes was given on February 14, 1778, by France. This occurred in Quiberon Bay, on the French coast, when the Ranger, under command of John Paul Jones, was saluted by the French Fleet under Admiral LaMotte Picquet.

The Ranger's flag was made by the girls of Portsmouth, N. H., from slices of their best silk gowns. The white stripes were cut from her bridal gown by a bride of only a few months.

Some writers claim that the Ranger's flag was the same flag that afterward flew from the Bon Homme Richard, in the most thrilling sea fight of history. The conflict was between the frigate Serapis and Jones' ship, the Richard. The battle by moonlight, which continued until both ships were in a sinking condition and the Serapis finally struck her colors, insured the immortality of John Paul Jones, the intrepid defender of the youthful Republic.

The original 13 stars and 13 stripes were intended, of ccurse, to represent the Original Thirteen Colonies. In 1795, 2 additional stars and 2 additional stripes were added to the flag to represent Vermont and Kentucky, which had been admitted to the Union, and the War of 1812 was fought under this banner. It was the flag of 15 stars and 15 stripes, flying over Fort McHenry, on September 14, 1814, which inspired Francis Scott Key to write the Star-Spangled Banner, our national anthem.

Miss Margaret Young, who cut the stars for this particular flag, subsequently became the mother of Henry Sanderson, who was elected Grand Exalted Ruler of the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks in 1884.

The admission of additional States into the Union required the enlargement of the flag and an essential altering of its design, and to prevent this, the Congress, on April 14, 1818, adopted a resolution providing that from and after July 4, 1818, the stripes should be 13 and the blue field should carry 1 star for each of the 20 States then in the Union and that a new star should be added for each State thereafter admitted. Today the flag bears 48 stars.

It is at once a history, a declaration, and a prophecy. It represents the American Nation as it was at its birth; it speaks for what it is today; and it holds the opportunity for the future to add other stars to the glorious constellation.

In July 1908, the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, in Grand Lodge assembled, at Dallas, Tex., provided for the observance of Flag Day on June 14, and the observance of that day has been made mandatory upon each subordinate lodge of the order. Thus, the Order of Elks was the first, and as yet, the only fraternal organization which requires the celebration of this event.

Of all the flags of history the American flag is the oldest. To us it is the most beautiful. Sporting in the breeze, it is a mosaic of ribboned loveliness; dropping in softer airs, the staff is transformed into a maypole of festal delight.

It is an honest flag; a righteous flag.

During the long years of its life our country has engaged in a number of wars, yet its flag has never rippled in support of an unworthy cause, and has never known defeat. It has no taint of scandal—no spot of dishonor.

In the War of 1776 it won our independence as a nation. In 1812 it established the freedom of the seas and the rights of American seamen on those seas. In 1846 it vindicated our national dignity and our sovereignty which had been flouted by arrogant Mexico. In 1861 it preserved the Union. Union—nationality—was necessary to the championing of freedom throughout the world. In 1898 it freed struggling Cuba from tyranny and oppression. Again victorious in the great World War, it flies triumphantly, a beauteous, incomparable emblem of liberty and freedom to all the peoples of the earth.

In Memoriam

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

OF

HON. MARTIN F. SMITH

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

Mr. SMITH of Washington. Mr. Speaker, death has taken a heavy toll in the Halls of Congress—nine House Members and four Senate Members have gone to their eternal rest since we last held memorial services. The Seventy-sixth and Seventy-seventh Congresses are setting a new record for duration of continuous sessions. The Seventy-seventh Congress has now completed 5 months of steady and arduous labor since we convened on January 3. Congress has been in constant session now for 533 days—366 days remaining of the Seventy-sixth Congress last year, the longest continuous session in our history, and 167 days of the Seventy-seventh Congress this year. The physical and mental str. * is proving too much for many of our colleagues, who are dying heroically at their post of duty in the most crucial period of our national history, perhaps the most crucial period in the world's history.

We are living, we are dwelling,
In a grand and awful time,
In an age of ages telling;
To be living is sublime.

Hark, the waking up of nations,
Gog and Magog to the fray;
Hark, what soundeth?
Is creation groaning for its latter day?

Worlds are charging, heaven beholding,
Thou hast but an hour to fight;
Now the blazoned cross unfolding,
On, right onward, for the right.

On, let all the soul within you
For the truth's sake, go abroad;
Strike, let every nerve and sinew
Tell on ages, tell for God.

Eloquent tribute could, and doubtless will, be rendered to every one of our distinguished departed colleagues who died as martyrs to public duty in the truest sense. I shall be able to mention by name only a few of them whom I "loved and lost awhile."

SPEAKER WILLIAM B. BANKHEAD

Mr. Speaker, as evidence of the heavy toll by death in our ranks to which I have already alluded, it is worthy of mention that those of us who became Members of this body at the commencement of the first administration of President Franklin D. Roosevelt in 1933 have already served under four Speakers—Rainey, Byrns, and Bankhead, and yourself, Mr. Speaker, whom we all hope will long continue to serve your country in your present high position. This rate of mortality in our Speakers is very unusual and without precedent in our history. I have on previous occasions expressed my tribute to the memories of Speakers Rainey and Byrns, who were both outstanding Speakers and great Americans, and my personal friends.

Speaker BANKHEAD was one of the most kindly and gracious men whom I have ever known. He was a scholar in politics and his mind was enriched with the treasures of classical literature. He had a deeply religious nature. Our Chaplain, Dr. Montgomery, has told me of the crucifix which Speaker BANKHEAD showed him and which he carried reverently in his pocket. In more than one of his public utterances he expressed the fervent belief that the practical application of the teachings of Jesus Christ was the only solution for the Nation's ills. Speaker BANKHEAD will long be remembered with affection by those who had the privilege of serving with him in the Congress of the United States.

SENATOR ERNEST LUNDEEN

I served with Senator LUNDEEN in the House for several terms before he was elected to the Senate. We were frequently associated together in support of legislation in the interests of the veterans of our wars, whose friend and champion he ever was. We appeared on the same platform at a number of meetings arranged by veterans' organizations and I thereby came to appreciate Senator LUNDEEN's forceful, convincing, and sincere manner of delivery. He was courageous and outspoken at all times and never left any of his auditors in doubt as to his views upon the public questions of the day. I did not always agree with him, particularly in regard to some of the opinions which he espoused in regard to the present crisis facing America, but I respected his high ideals and his character as a man. Such men as he are sorely needed and America is poorer for his leaving.

SAM C. MASSINGALE

SAM MASSINGALE was a sturdy, genuine type who understood the problems of the toiling millions who produce the wealth of the Nation in field and factory. He was a deep student of human nature and very sociable in his relations with his fellows. He possessed a keen sense of humor and was an entertaining companion. He hated sham and pretense and delighted to expose these weaknesses without rancor or spleen.

SAM MASSINGALE was a good lawyer and was more concerned with the equities than the cold letter of the law which is often allowed to defeat the ends of justice. He had served as a county judge and in that position had learned to appraise the warp and woof of life as it is lived in the average communities of America. Some of the finest men whom I have ever known have served on the nisi prius bench and from there gone fully panoplied to higher but not more important public office. It was from his contacts and experiences as a practicing lawyer on the circuit in the county courts that Abraham Lincoln developed his sterling character and fine intellect. The highest tribute I can pay to our departed colleague is to cite the fact that he possessed some of these homespun qualities.

GEORGE N. SEGER

It was my privilege to serve on the Rivers and Harbors Committee with GEORGE N. SEGER, of New Jersey, and to come in somewhat intimate contact with him. As long as his health permitted, he was punctual and faithful in his attendance upon meetings of the committee and he contributed much to the discussions and deliberations. He was well informed in regard to the waterways of the Nation and a firm believer in the value and importance of navigation and its rich contribution to national progress.

Congressman SEGER was broadminded and not intensely partisan, although steadfast in his loyalty to the principles and tenets of the Republican Party, of which he was one of the most distinguished members in his State and the Nation. He and I frequently rode on the streetcars together on our way to our offices in the morning, and I came more than ever to respect him highly on account of his broad, wholesome outlook on life.

CONCLUSION

Mr. Speaker, as I think tenderly of these colleagues and how they bravely trod their way on life's pathway to the house of life, often misnamed the house of death, I am reassured in affirming anew the faith and philosophy of the poet:

> Afraid? Of whom am I afraid?
> Not Death; for who is he?
> The porter of my Father's lodge.

William Brockman Bankhead

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

OF

HON. SAMUEL DICKSTEIN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. WILLIAM BROCKMAN BANKHEAD, late a Representative from the State of Alabama

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, WILLIAM B. BANKHEAD was a member of a family which has given to this country several prominent statesmen. There have been Senators, Representatives, Governors, and other executive legislative officials of the United States from that family, and the history of this country since the Civil War would not be complete without the mention of the members of the Bankhead family, who have been in the forefront of American government in the last six or more decades.

WILLIAM B. BANKHEAD, a Speaker of the House, endeared himself to everyone who came in contact with him. He was always patient, attentive, and never too busy to transact the many details which fell to his lot by reason of his official position, and the fact that the many friends he made in the House continually called upon him for advice and assistance. Speaker BANKHEAD was a fountain of learning, a perfect scholar, and a thorough master of parliamentary law. Intricate problems which came to the attention of the Speaker during his term of office and which called for the exercise of extreme skill and thorough learning were a daily pabulum of Speaker BANKHEAD. No problem was too difficult for him, and no problem was too unimportant for him to handle. With his best courtesy and tact he presided over the destinies of this House with dignity, grace and decorum.

He was a sick man when he took the gavel of the last session of Congress and began the final term as a Speaker of this House. Those who knew him dreaded that the ordeal of this office might prove too much for him and that he would not be able to complete his term. The Grim Reaper took him from our midst while the session was still in progress and it was necessary to select a Speaker at almost the conclusion of Speaker BANKHEAD'S term.

We mourn the loss of a true friend, a great American, and one of the greatest Speakers ever to preside over the House of Representatives.

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

OF

HON. MICHAEL J. KENNEDY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. M. MICHAEL EDELSTEIN, late a Representative from the State of New York

Mr. MICHAEL J. KENNEDY. Mr. Speaker, words are a very small tribute to commemorate the passing of our distinguished colleague and my dear friend of many years, MICHAEL EDELSTEIN, who gave his life, like the Christian martyrs of old, defending the honor of his race and his creed.

MIKE EDELSTEIN was an outstanding member of public life in the city and State of New York, revered and loved by all who had the happy privilege of knowing him. He represented in the Halls of Congress a district peopled by many different races and creeds, to all of whom he gave the same patient consideration and assistance many might give to a member of their own family. He was one of the most able members of the legal profession our city has produced, and this gave him manifold opportunities to render great service to the poor and the unfortunate who had neither funds nor the inclination to seek counsel.

The passing of MIKE EDELSTEIN is a great loss to this House at a time in our national history when crusaders and patriots are sorely needed; it is a still greater loss to the thousands in his district who were so dependent upon his kindly benefaction.

Samuel Chapman Massingale

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

OF

HON. EARL C. MICHENER

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. SAMUEL CHAPMAN MASSINGALE, late a Representative from the State of Oklahoma

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, I rise to pay my tribute of love, honor, and respect to our late colleague, Representative SAM MASSINGALE, of Oklahoma. It was my privilege to know SAM MASSINGALE well. Together we served on the Committee on the Judiciary. We did not always agree as to legislative policy, but there was always a common-sense reason and homespun philosophy behind any position taken by Mr. MASSINGALE affecting legislation. No man in these Halls was more devoted to his constituency. He was an inherent friend of the farmer and no important legislation directly affecting agriculture during his service in Congress ever escaped his analysis and vocal approval or disapproval. When SAM MASSINGALE was called away, the farmer of the Nation lost a true and tried friend.

He had a good legal mind developed in the practice of the law in a rural community. With pride he called himself "a country lawyer." By reason of this training and experience he was an especially valuable member of the Committee on the Judiciary. By the same token, the form of many a statute was influenced and changed by this man's knowledge and wisdom. He was not spectacular and did not seek the limelight. He believed in accomplishment rather than publicity. He was gentle and considerate to a fault, yet he was always resolute and firm. He was a man of strong convictions, and with courage and vigor proclaimed those convictions. He was especially interested in what he called the common man. In his going the Seventh District of Oklahoma lost a good Representative in Congress, his State lost a distinguished citizen, and his Nation lost a worth-while statesman.

M. Michael Edelstein

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

OF

HON. SAMUEL DICKSTEIN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. M. MICHAEL EDELSTEIN, late a Representative from the State of New York

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, if ever there was a man whose political career was cut short at its height, it was my late colleague from New York, Representative M. MICHAEL EDELSTEIN. He died at the beginning of his career in this body and at a time when every Member of this House felt that here was a real leader of men and one whose future looked extremely promising.

Just turning 50, EDELSTEIN was elected to this House to fill a vacancy caused by the death of another friend of mine, Representative Sirovich. He came to this House well trained by ability and experience to perform the duties of the important office to which his constituents elected him. He was a lawyer of standing, a political leader, a student of Government, and a scholar in every sense of the word. During the many years of his practice before the bar he always took care of the underprivileged and those who could not afford to pay substantial fees to lawyers. His office was open to all types of people, and he represented a constituency which are among the least privileged in this country.

Men and women of all walks of life would come to MIKE EDELSTEIN for assistance and help, and he was a father confessor to them. They opened their hearts to him and poured out the troubles of their humble daily lives to this sympathetic and attentive person who never turned anyone away who needed his help. MIKE EDELSTEIN was a true man, one who never withheld his assistance, and one whose counsel, help, and aid were ready for anyone who applied for it.

Being the leader of the Democratic Party of his own district, he was, of course, continuously consulted on matters of party politics, and on the welfare of his constituents. In both capacities he rendered yeoman service. The Democratic Party of the city and State of New York owes a great deal of its success to the sane and sage counsel which EDELSTEIN gave it.

The humble constituents of EDELSTEIN'S district have been the recipients of attention and favor in large and profuse measures since their leader, MIKE EDELSTEIN, was their friend and benefactor.

Speaking on the floor of the House on June 4, he was stricken after concluding an address in which he nailed the lie of those who were the detractors of his race and the defamers of his people. It was on this occasion when he rose to the greatest height to which any man can possibly aspire. He became like an ancient prophet of Israel who denounced the enemies of his people for what they were worth. His speech coming at the time it did aroused in all of our colleagues the feeling of resentment against those forces of evil which ever threaten to engulf American democracy, and which our American democracy forever struggles to rid itself from.

MIKE EDELSTEIN'S death was not in vain. His sincerity and devotion have shown their metal in the career of this noble American.

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

OF

HON. EARL C. MICHENER

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. WILLIAM BROCKMAN BANKHEAD, late a Representative from the State of Alabama

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, when I came to Congress in 1919 the late Speaker WILLIAM B. BANKHEAD had already served one term. As I think in retrospect, I visualize a handsome, erect, alert, rather reserved yet at all times a courteous gentleman. The son of an illustrious father, the name Bankhead carried with it prestige even in the far northland from whence I came. When I first met Mr. BANKHEAD, I expected to meet an accomplished southern gentleman exemplifying the traditions of the Old South as we understood them in our part of the country. I was not disappointed. As the years passed, this casual and formal acquaintance ripened into one of the finest friendships I have enjoyed down through the years.

We both entered Congress at a time when it was the custom, if not the rule, for new Members to refrain from active participation in debate on the floor unless the new Member was especially qualified to speak on the particular subject under discussion. Mr. BANKHEAD followed this custom meticulously. The result was that when he did participate in discussion he had the closest attention of the House and always contributed to the information of the House. A born orator, trained in the art, he was one of the most effective speakers with whom I have served in Congress. As time went on, he advanced until, when the final summons came, he had reached the pinnacle of fame and power in this great deliberative body. By a vote of the House, he held the highest office within the gift of the House. In this position he was a worthy successor of a distinguished group of predecessors. He was temperamentally as well as otherwise qualified to be Speaker. A learned parliamentarian, a splendid lawyer, an experienced legislator with a judicial mind, his decisions were in keeping with the legal precedents. He spoke in understandable language.

He was a strong Democrat of the old school. He believed in the two-party system. He has said from the Speaker's chair that he agreed with former Speaker Longworth that the functions and duties of the Speakership divide themselves into two general classes—the one parliamentary, the other political. The first he administered with rigid impartiality. He was in accord with Mr. Longworth's statement that—

> The political side, to my mind, involves a question of party service. I believe it to be the duty of the Speaker, standing squarely on the platform of his party, to assist insofar as he properly can the enactment of legislation in accordance with the declared principles and policies of his party and, by the same token, to resist the enactment of legislation in violation thereof.

That is, he believed in responsible party government and attempted to effectuate such a policy. In these days he found this a most difficult assignment.

In short, his rulings as Speaker were never unfriendly to his party, yet the dignity of the House and the general interests of his country were always paramount. The minority never had occasion to question his sincerity, his honesty, and his integrity as our presiding officer.

For a number of years I served with Mr. BANKHEAD on the Rules Committee. If there is a political committee in the House, the Rules Committee is the one. I served with him on that committee when my party was in power as well as when his party was in power. In such circumstances Members become well acquainted. While we did not always agree as to the procedure to be adopted, yet I feel sure that we were not often far apart on the fundamentals. He was at heart a conservative Jeffersonian Democrat. His political philosophy was deep-rooted. He yielded reluctantly to expediency.

High position and authority did not turn his head. Speaker WILLIAM B. BANKHEAD was in all respects the same WILL BANKHEAD who served as a private in the ranks of the Sixty-fifth Congress. He was stricken down in the heyday of his usefulness, but he leaves behind a splendid heritage. This country is a better country because he lived in it. History will record him as one of the great who presided over this body.

Ernest Lundeen

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

OF

HON. HAROLD KNUTSON

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life, character, and public service of Hon ERNEST LUNDEEN, late a Senator from the State of Minnesota

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, Minnesota mourns the passing of ERNEST LUNDEEN, late junior Senator from that

State, and the tragic manner in which the end came makes our grief the more poignant.

Senator LUNDEEN had a long and distinguished record of public service. In whatever capacity he served he gave to the State and Nation loyal, honest, and effective service. A veteran of the Spanish-American War, our departed friend early turned to law, later entering politics as a member of Minnesota's Legislature, where he served several terms. In 1916 he was elected to Congress and entered upon his duties on April 2, 1917. Four days later he voted against America's entrance into the World War, which was an unpopular position to take during a period of hysteria, when our people had been lashed into fury by false tales of cruel atrocities which we later learned had been spread for the purpose of drawing America into the conflict.

Mr. LUNDEEN retired to private life the following year, but in 1932 he was again elected to Congress by a substantial majority, and 2 years later reelected. In 1936 ERNEST LUNDEEN was elected to the Senate of the United States to suceed the late Senator Thomas D. Schall, who also had met a violent end 4 years earlier.

A grateful people mourn Senator LUNDEEN'S passing. An able and fearless legislator, a true and loyal friend, a loving and devoted husband and father, he is sadly missed by former colleagues, friends, and family. His memory is a radiant light that will long be cherished by those who knew him for his many able and sterling qualities. Peace to his ashes.

Kenneth Farrand Simpson

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

OF

HON. JOSEPH CLARK BALDWIN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. KENNETH FARRAND SIMPSON, late a Representative from the State of New York

Mr. BALDWIN. Mr. Speaker, to say that our community and our party suffered an irreparable loss in the recent and untimely death of KENNETH F. SIMPSON would be to deny the vigor of the leadership he provided for so many years. The whole aim of his activities was to provide in the community and in the party a force for good Government and progress dependent upon no single individual and beholden to no one man or woman.

And yet his death has left a void which even the most enthusiastic of his followers cannot help but contemplate with dismay. Courage there is amongst us, and willing hearts and minds, and our grief is profound and sincere. But the experience and inspiration and unceasing devotion which he contributed to the welfare of his community cannot be replaced overnight.

His was not only a well-fought fight, it was a long one, with its beginning back in the youthful years, working his way through college, serving his country in war as well as in peace, constantly working for his friends and his neighborhood.

KENNETH F. SIMPSON was born in 1895 in the very district which he served so ably and so long. He went to Hill School and Yale University. During his freshman year at college, his father died and from then on KENNETH SIMPSON was on his own, working his way through the three remaining years as well as through Harvard Law, earning money by such activities as tutoring and editing the Yale News. At Yale he made Phi Beta Kappa, and was the "last man tapped for Bones" and became head of the senior council.

As early as 1916 he became interested in active politics, attending the Progressive Republican Convention at Chicago which nominated Theodore Roosevelt.

That same summer, with war clouds gathering over Mexico, he helped to organize a group of Yale students into a New Haven Field Artillery unit in the Connecticut National Guard. They were not sent to Mexico, but later, when the United States entered the World War, SIMPSON was commissioned a captain of Field Artillery at the Plattsburg Training Camp and was assigned to the Three Hundred and Second Field Artillery, with which regiment he saw active service in France.

After the war, continuing his interest in politics, KENNETH SIMPSON worked actively as an election district captain in the fifteenth assembly district, his home district, where he was married and where his four children were born. From then on, ably aided by his wife, Helen Porter Simpson, he never let up in his fight for good progressive government, serving successively as president of the district club, as assistant United States attorney for the southern district of New York, as leader of the Fifteenth District, as national committeeman, and finally as Congressman from the Seventeenth Congressional District, which includes the fifteenth.

It was KENNETH SIMPSON more than any single individual who finally broke up the forces of misrule which had controlled New York City for so many years. He backed Fusion in 1933 with LaGuardia as candidate for mayor, and 4 years after that successful fight prevailed upon the party again to back LaGuardia and upon LaGuardia to accept a Republican ticket. This second victory brought Tammany Hall permanently to its knees, and brought before the community such outstanding Republicans as Thomas E. Dewey, Newbold Morris, Stanley Isacs, and Bruce Barton.

KENNETH SIMPSON'S fight for the same cause of sound, progressive government in the wider field of national politics is too recent and too well known to require more than passing comment here. His backing of Wendell Willkie and Mr. Willkie's gallant campaign and increasing popularity are evidence enough of KENNETH SIMPSON'S brilliant leadership and vision.

When he was elected to Congress the press of the Nation commented with enthusiasm, and he went to Washington to carry his everlasting fight for good government into this broader field with all the courage and vigor he had always displayed.

His premature death could be a stunning blow to the party and the cause for which he fought. But to those many of us who loved and admired him he has left such a shining example of courage and vision that we would be poor stuff, indeed, if, inspired by that example, we failed to seize the torch and carry on.

That we will do so goes without saying, and no higher tribute could be paid to KENNETH SIMPSON.

Alonzo Dillard Folger

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

OF

HON. ALFRED L. BULWINKLE

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. ALONZO DILLARD FOLGER, late a Representative from the State of North Carolina

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Speaker, the memorial service held each year in the Chamber of the House of Representatives is a solemn occasion, for it is then that we pay tribute to the memory of our colleagues who have died within the past year.

Death visited the North Carolina delegation within the last few weeks, and we who are Representatives from that State are, like many thousands of North Carolinians, sorely grieved because of the untimely death of Hon. ALONZO DILLARD FOLGER, the Representative from the Fifth Congressional District of North Carolina.

LON FOLGER as he was affectionately known by many thousand North Carolinians, was a descendent of the New England family of Folgers. He was born at Dobson, N. C., on July 9, 1888, and was unfortunately injured in an automobile accident in his home city of Mount Airy, N. C., and died on the 1st day of May 1941. He attended and was graduated from the University of North Carolina, and also completed his law course at the university. Shortly thereafter he was admitted to the bar of the State of North Carolina and was immediately recognized as an able and outstanding lawyer. On account of his legal knowledge and attainments, he was appointed a judge of the superior court by the Governor of the State, and although his tenure of office was short on the bench, his judicial temperament and his legal knowledge caused him to be recognized as a great judge.

During his entire lifetime LON FOLGER was very much interested in government and this brought him actively into the political field. He was county chairman of the executive committee in his county, a member of the State executive committee, and later on he was a member of the Democratic National Committee, and in these capacities he rendered loyal and unselfish service in his county and the Nation to his party.

As a great American and a great North Carolinian interested in government and the welfare of the people, Judge FOLGER was elected to the Seventy-sixth Congress and was renominated by his party without opposition in the primary in 1940 and reelected to the Seventy-seventh Congress. As a Member of Congress, he rendered valuable service on the Committee on Banking and Currency, of which he became a member upon entering Congress. His ability, high character, integrity, and honesty, as well as his lovable qualities, endeared him to all that he came in contact with. It was my privilege nearly every day that the House was in session to sit with him and discuss the matters of legislation, as well as other matters affecting the State and Nation. This personal contact with him increased my admiration and high regard for him.

His family life was happy, and very often he spoke to me about his wife and two sons.

And so, Mr. Speaker, we in Congress, as well as his family and many friends in North Carolina, are sorely grieved on account of his death; but I realize that his influence will be felt for years to come in his county and in his State, as well as here with us, because his life was a life devoted to the welfare of the American people and was an example of noble courage, a sense of duty, and a great love for his country.

M. Michael Edelstein

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

OF

HON. MARTIN J. KENNEDY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. M. MICHAEL EDELSTEIN, late a Representative from the State of New York

Mr. MARTIN J. KENNEDY. Mr. Speaker, as we assemble in this Chamber to pay tribute to the memories of our departed colleagues, we become conscious of the value of their associations and services and of the responsibilities and duties left by them to us. We apprise and appreciate the dead, free from the grosser attributes of human nature. In death all are equal—prince and mendicant, sultan and slave, sage and simple—all march to the same music through that grim and ghostly cordon beyond which we may well all meet when the sun goes down.

Death is a true and pure democracy. In the democracy of the dead all men at last are equal. There is neither rank, station, nor prerogative in the republic of the grave. At this fatal threshold the philosopher ceases to be wise, and the song of the poet is silent. The poor man is as rich as the richest, and the rich man is as poor as the pauper. There the proud man surrenders his dignities; the statesman, his honors; the worldling, his pleasures; the invalid, his rack; and the laborer rests from unrequited toil.

It therefore becomes my sad duty today to recall briefly the life, character, and accomplishments of him who, as a Member of this great body, I had the privilege of knowing intimately and well, M. MICHAEL EDELSTEIN.

Born in Poland in 1888, he was brought to this country as a small child and continued to live in New York City, where he attended our public schools, Cooper Union, and the Brooklyn Law School. In 1910 he was admitted to the practice of the law.

Throughout that long period of our friendship I greatly admired Michael for his many fine qualities of manhood. He was a kindly person, a devoted son, and a loyal adherent to the ancient faith of Israel.

Alert to opportunity, self-reliant, facile, and warm-hearted, he made his own way, owing his success to his tireless persistence and his unquenchable ardor in living. He belonged to the aristocracy of the plain people of this country.

His passing is a great personal loss to me, and I know I express the sentiments of my delegation when I say that we have lost a true friend, his district a model Representative, and the country a splendid citizen.

His family life was an example and inspiration to those favored with the opportunity to observe it. While our hearts go out in sympathy and sorrow to his mother, sisters, and brothers, we would remind them that he left behind a memory of fidelity and love which as time goes on will become as sweet as the fragrance of a perfumed flower. Truly he has left footprints on the sands of time.

He added to the sum of human joy; and were everyone to whom he did some loving service to bring a blossom to his grave, he would sleep tonight beneath a wilderness of flowers.

William Devereux Byron

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

OF

HON. WILLIAM P. COLE, JR.

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. WILLIAM DEVEREUX BYRON, late a Representative from the State of Maryland

Mr. COLE of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, the tragic death of our late colleague, WILLIAM D. BYRON, of Maryland, removed from conspicuous public service and from the membership of this House a young, vigorous, able, and popular gentleman. On the morning of February 27, 1941, when the airplane crashed within a short distance of Atlanta, Ga., I was in Macon, Ga., and immediately upon hearing of the collision hastened to the scene. I shall never forget that experience. The first shock was, of course, to find my colleague, BILL BYRON, apparently killed instantly, and the huge plane in which he was riding a mass of debris, including many mangled bodies.

Possibly the best estimate of Congressman BYRON'S strength in the district he represented can be drawn from the fact that normally the Sixth District of Maryland is Republican, possessing a large labor vote. Congressman BYRON, comfortable financially and an employer of men himself, apparently enjoyed the friendly support of labor because it was his privilege and distinction never to be defeated for any office he sought. He served in the State Senate of Maryland in an elective position. A little later, he was appointed by the late Governor Albert C. Ritchie to membership on the State road commission. Finally, he became a Member of Congress.

It is a source of great satisfaction to find his devoted widow succeeding him as a Member of this House. This daily reminder of our friendship for Congressman BYRON will serve to mitigate to some extent the loss his death occasioned, but we shall always remember him as a real gentleman, a devoted father, a man proud of the traditions of the great State he represented, and a public servant who enjoyed life and gave most of it to the service of the country for which he fought as a real soldier, and for the future welfare of which he demanded every preparation against those who would destroy it.

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

OF

HON. WILLIAM T. PHEIFFER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. KENNETH FARRAND SIMPSON, late a Representative from the State of New York

Mr. WILLIAM T. PHEIFFER. Mr. Speaker, well may we honor the memory of our departed colleague, KENNETH FARRAND SIMPSON, today. But mere words of eulogy are no more needed to illumine the earthly record of such a great and good man than is needed an incandescent light to illumine the sun at high noon.

We who had the rare good fortune to know KENNETH SIMPSON intimately and to work shoulder to shoulder with him in many righteous causes came to regard him as an exemplar of real American manhood and the things that count most in life, as truly he was. As a soldier, as a lawyer, as Republican national committeeman for the State of New York, and as Republican chairman of the county of New York, he carved for himself a permanent niche in the structure of the city and State of New York, and his fame as one of the really great men of our Nation will never be dimmed. A Divine Providence closed the portals on his life at a time when he was standing on the threshold of what undoubtedly would have been a notable and brilliant career in the Congress of the United States. Although his voice, which always rang out for the right, is now muted, he will live forever in our minds and hearts. With Longfellow, we can truly say, "Dead he is not, but departed"; for the great in spirit never die. The great spirit of KENNETH SIMPSON will ever abide with us and be a guide and inspiration in charting the course of the Nation and the courses of our own lives.

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

OF

HON. EARL C. MICHENER

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. GEORGE NICHOLAS SEGER, late a Representative from the State of New Jersey

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, it is with a heavy heart that I pay this tribute to the life, character, and memory of our late colleague, Representative GEORGE N. SEGER, of New Jersey. Mr. SEGER was more to me than a colleague and contemporary Member of Congress. He was my friend. In fact, it can be truly said that his friends were limited only by his acquaintances.

He was a retiring man, modest to a degree, but behind his apparent reticence there was a most friendly personality. He was in no sense a showman. He was genuine and real in every way. He abhorred the superficial and judged people for their true worth and not for what they feigned to be. He was mindful of the responsibility which membership in this body carries with it. He took his duties seriously. He was not a hit-and-miss voter. His votes were always based on logic, common sense, and an understanding of what he was doing. He was a man of unimpeachable integrity and rugged courage. He had the confidence of his colleagues, and, I am sure, never betrayed that confidence. His district appreciated the manner of man he was and year after year returned him to the House. Preceding his service in Congress, he had acquitted himself well as mayor of his home city. He climbed the ladder of success one rung at a time and each promotion was the reward for a task well done. Political preferment, such as accorded GEORGE SEGER, does not just happen. It is not accidental. One's constituents are fair critics. Every 2 years, on election day, there is a reappraisement of the record of Members of Congress. GEORGE SEGER met this test time after time, and usually with increasing majority. He possessed in abundance the qualities essential to a real representative of the people in this great deliberative body. The memory of this good man will linger with us long.

Ernest Lundeen

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

OF

HON. JEANNETTE RANKIN

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. ERNEST LUNDEEN, late a Senator from the State of Minnesota

Miss RANKIN of Montana. Mr. Speaker, a great pleasure I looked forward to in returning to Congress was serving again with the Honorable ERNEST LUNDEEN. There was a dark shadow over that pleasure when he was not here.

My first meeting with ERNEST LUNDEEN was during my first week in Congress, in 1917, when he came to me and said: "You are a woman; you can vote against war. I have been a soldier. I know what war is." His earnest sincerity and deep emotion over our responsibility made me realize the seriousness of my position. I knew then if men had the courage to fight in war, women should have the courage to prevent war, and the first woman should accept the first opportunity to protest against it. I have always been grateful for his help.

ERNEST LUNDEEN'S habit of seeing the long-distant future gave him the same understanding of military questions that he had of social relationships. He was the first to advocate military bases in the Caribbean that would give the United States adequate protection against any nation or combination of nations. He was suspicious of all foreign intrigues, and he wished the United States to be independent of any foreign power.

He protested our entrance into the Old World hatreds of Europe and saw clearly their effect on the United States. His life was devoted to the building of human liberties at home.

He was untiring in his research and in his contemplation. He was cautious in taking steps to advance his ideals, but when he took a step it was because his deep conviction and clear thinking compelled him to put all his ability behind the program he felt was essential. He was willing to remain in the background and let others have the credit for his ideas if he felt in that way the ideals could be advanced.

Senator ERNEST LUNDEEN, in the days of the first war, knew that the greatest permanent protection a nation could have was through the use of democratic processes. He was the first to carry on in his district a poll regarding war, and before his vote against it he had received from those who answered an overwhelming protest against our entry. He spoke and voted and did everything in his power to keep this Nation from making the disastrous mistake of 1917.

War propagandists did all in their power to destroy those who voted against war. Certain things could be used against a woman that could not be used against a man. There were other things they could do against a man that would not be tolerated against a woman. There was nothing low and underhanded and despicable that could be used against a man that was not attempted to destroy ERNEST LUNDEEN. They could not get him down.

He never lacked in fortitude, for he realized that it took more stamina to stand for the right than it did to knuckle to the really subversive interests in the country; he always stood, with valiant courage, for the things he knew were right.

This held true in all his fundamental principles regarding the rights of the people. He knew that as long as there was poverty, misery, and suffering among the people our country could not permanently prosper.

Everyone knew that ERNEST LUNDEEN would take his stand on the side of human liberties. If he were living today, he would understand the war interests that so cowardly attacked him, and he would have less rancor in his heart for the injustices done him than his friends have, for he had the understanding and the good will that protected his soul from hatred.

Senator LUNDEEN'S personal life was already a fulfillment of the highest ideals as a husband and father, and as a friend, but he was just beginning his career as a Senator.

His contribution to his country as a lawmaker foretold his potential worth as a Senator. His death was a tragic loss to his friends and to our country, but his memory is a precious heritage.

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

OF

HON. CARL T. DURHAM

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. ALONZO DILLARD FOLGER, late a Representative from the State of North Carolina

Mr. DURHAM. Mr. Speaker, those who knew LON FOLGER will always remember his fine intellectual gifts, which were so often manifested here and in our State affairs in North Carolina, and his capacity for winning the warm and unshaken friendship of supporters and opponents alike. I shall always think of him as a man in whose life the uprightness of character predominated. My relations with him were exceedingly close and intimate, and I know he never harbored unkind feelings or resentment against anyone. He was sympathetic, tender, and was one of the truest of friends, notwithstanding the time required by public service to his country and State. He was devoted to his family and his wife. He had a fine home, which is the glory and guardian of American life and civilization. He was my friend.

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

OF

HON. EARL C. MICHENER

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. WILLIS BENJAMIN GIBBS, late a Representative from the State of Georgia

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, as a Member of the House, and especially as a member of the Committee on the Judiciary, our late friend, Representative W. BEN GIBBS, of Georgia, acquitted himself well. Although his service in the House was of short duration, yet during that period he endeared himself to all who came in contact with him. A splendid conversationalist, a courteous gentleman, as a student of the problems of the day, he faced a promising future in the Halls of Congress. We who knew him best loved him most. His service was of too short a duration to make it possible for all to measure his true value as a legislator. In this respect his committee had the advantage. His sudden death was a shock to all of us. A splendid and a profitable life was cut short all too soon. But who are we to criticize?

We shall all miss him.

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

OF

HON. ROSS RIZLEY

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. SAMUEL CHAPMAN MASSINGALE, late a Representative from the State of Oklahoma

Mr. RIZLEY. Mr. Speaker, while I only had the pleasure and opportunity of serving in this body for a few short weeks with our departed colleague, SAM MASSINGALE, it was my good fortune to know him quite well for more than 15 years.

I knew him as a citizen; I knew him as a lawyer; I knew him as a public servant of the people of Oklahoma. While he officially represented the Seventh Oklahoma District he served not only that district ably and well, but the people of the whole State and the whole Nation.

He was a modest, unassuming man, simple in his daily life and habits. Loyal and gentle and ever thoughtful for the members of his family, which he cherished with a zeal and pride surpassed by no one.

I can say without modesty of my departed colleague and friend that no man who has served in this great body has, or had, a more burning desire to help the little fellow than did SAM MASSINGALE. He was able to meet and greet the man who felt he was down and out and leave him with a better outlook for the future. The man who had concluded that life held nothing in store for him, that hopes and aspirations were gone, that life was fruitless, and that misery and woe were his only lot would have his heart gladdened and his soul refreshed by the words of friendship and affection, the handclasp and smile of recognition given him by our late friend. With this philosophy of life, which was so actively expressed, by his every thought and action, if I may be permitted to borrow the words of the great commoner, William Jennings Bryan, "I shall not believe that even now his light has been extinguished."

The memory of the life he lived will each day be a living inspiration to all of us who were privileged to know him.

M. Michael Edelstein

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

OF

HON. ALFRED F. BEITER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. M. MICHAEL EDELSTEIN, late a Representative from the State of New York

Mr. BEITER. Mr. Speaker, in the death of MICHAEL EDELSTEIN the House of Representatives and the State of New York have lost a respected public official and one who has served his country well. I know of no man who had greater courage and a more earnest enthusiasm for the principles in which he believed than this colleague who literally gave his life in the service of his constituency.

The intensity of his convictions and the spirit with which he gave his best to every cause he championed will long be remembered here. Respected by his neighbors and colleagues and deeply loved by his friends, MICHAEL EDELSTEIN'S memory will live on in these Halls and in the State and Nation which he loved and cherished. His death was a great shock to all of us, since most of us were with him here on the floor just before he was taken. He seldom missed a roll call, and it was his devotion to his duty as he saw it which contributed to his death.

I believe with all my soul that the humane principles for which MICHAEL EDELSTEIN stood will forever be upheld and engraved on the hearts of men. I know of no one who fought harder for the things he championed than this faithful public servant who has now been called to serve in a higher cause. I join with my colleagues in extending deep sympathy to his family and to his constituents. The State of New York will miss him.

William Brockman Bankhead

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

OF

HON. JOHN M. COFFEE

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. WILLIAM BROCKMAN BANKHEAD, late a Representative from the State of Alabama

Mr. COFFEE of Washington. Mr. Speaker, in the passing of the late Speaker, WILL BANKHEAD, the State of Alabama lost one of her most distinguished sons, and the Nation contemporaneously sustained a tragic blow because one of its great statesmen had been called to his eternal repose.

Scion of a long line of distinguished Bankheads—intellectuals, actors, statesmen, lawyers—Will quickly assumed the role of leadership in his native State. When the Almighty called him from his earthly existence, one of the stars which had been "shining on Alabama" winked out.

WILL BANKHEAD was an inspiration to the new Members; he was a tower of dignity; he was a lighthouse sending forth beams of inspiration and stimulation to his fellows amidst the encircling gloom of disillusionment, apathy, and despair in a war-torn age.

As a Speaker, he ranked among the best. A model of dignity, probity, propriety, he set an example for all of the Members of the House to emulate. Always courteous, kindly, and cooperative, he made one proud to be a Member of that body over which WILL BANKHEAD presided as Speaker. Possessed of a delicious and engaging sense of humor, WILL BANKHEAD had the qualities of warmth of heart, understanding, and deep emotion which unconsciously drew others to him more closely in the bonds of friendship.

His histrionic ability was demonstrated on countless occasions when he recited poetry, and under the impact of passionate urgency he would give voice to the stirrings of his heart and mind.

Today we weave a benediction to the yesterdays of accomplishment and beckon to the tomorrows of sought-for perfection. Though today our heads are bowed down with grief aroused by the memories of our departed brothers of the Congress, we must not give way to the point where we are incapable of carrying on the work upon which they were nobly and laudably embarked.

WILL BANKHEAD was an evangel holding aloft the light. He has tossed the torch to us, his successors. We cannot fail him. We are entrusted, figuratively speaking, under the will of our departed colleague, to insure that the light of liberty shall remain undimmed, in a world beset by troubles, and in an atmosphere beleaguered by threats of war and its horrors. We must carry on sans peur et sans reproche.

Today we "discern the signs of the times when the skies are red and lowering." We must read those signs aright. To be mistaken in our judgment would be fatal. Resting upon our shoulders is the greatest responsibility visited upon any Members of Congress since the inception of our Nation. We must not "let the people down."

WILL BANKHEAD was an inspiring and helpful guide in determining our course of conduct in the past. It is my fervent prayer that, rising among us and coming to us in the months to come, will be others who approach his stature. So I say, farewell, WILL BANKHEAD. We shall try to carry on. You have builded your monument in our hearts and our minds. We will never forget you

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

OF

HON. THOMAS ROLPH

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. KENNETH FARRAND SIMPSON, late a Representative from the State of New York

Mr. ROLPH. Mr. Speaker, it is indeed appropriate to have a day dedicated to the memory of those of our Members who have preceded us into the Great Beyond. Nothing could be more fitting than to pause for this final hail and farewell.

The untimely passing of Hon. KENNETH FARRAND SIMPSON stunned all and makes one realize the uncertainties of life.

On January 3, 1941, you administered the oath of office to us as new Congressmen, and just 22 days later, January 25, he was called to higher responsibilities. While it was not my privilege to know KEN SIMPSON before coming to Washington, nonetheless, from the short association with him in this body, I felt a cordial friendship would develop through our service here.

He came from the great Empire State, located on the Atlantic seaboard, while my home is out in the Golden State, beside the waters of the broad Pacific. The House of Representatives was our meeting place.

The freshmen in the Seventy-seventh Congress feel keenly the severing of the tie which bound us to our comrade. We find consolation in the words of All's Well, as written by Anna Newbegin, of San Francisco:

Whatever comes is best—'tis the true way
That we should meet the hours in faith and say,
"What's mine no one can keep or take away;
I'll give the best in song, in joy or pain,
And leave all else without a thought of gain."
When twilight falls, and rest is mine with care,
My soul can say, "All's well, here, everywhere."

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

OF

HON. WILLIAM P. COLE, JR.

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. WILLIAM BROCKMAN BANKHEAD, late a Representative from the State of Alabama

Mr. COLE of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, my long and somewhat intimate association as a Member of the House of Representatives with our late, distinguished, and beloved Speaker, WILLIAM B. BANKHEAD, is sufficient reason for me to express, along with his many friends, my deep affection for him; but the fact that I was privileged to be with him at the time he was stricken and, I expect, be the last Member of Congress to talk with him suggests that I might give the Members of the House and his many friends the benefit of that experience.

Our late Speaker had but shortly before his death passed through a very arduous and grueling experience at the Democratic National Convention, where he delivered, with his characteristic force and emphasis, a great speech, and thus became the outstanding possibility for a place on the national ticket as the candidate for the office of Vice President of the United States. He returned to Washington, apparently shouldering with ease and satisfaction whatever disappointment accompanied the decision of the convention, and appeared with his usual smile and happy disposition, ready to do his best toward the success of his party in the great November battle to follow. It was because of his attitude in this respect that at a meeting presided over by the Governor of Maryland and attended by its United States Senators, Representatives in the House, the mayor of Baltimore, the Democratic national committeemen and committeewomen, looking to the opening of the campaign in Maryland, it was unanimously determined to obtain Speaker BANKHEAD as the guest speaker at a great Democratic rally in Baltimore City, which was actually the opening of the 1940 campaign.

It is easy for me to recall the expression of satisfaction which came over the face of the then Speaker on this occasion and his apparent will and determination to serve the party which had honored him so highly, even to the point of affecting his health. So Speaker BANKHEAD accepted the invitation to address this great meeting in Baltimore, and on the appointed day, September 9, I motored from Washington to Baltimore with the Speaker and Mrs. Bankhead. We had a grand trip together, but as we arrived in the suite at the Emerson Hotel, where he was to rest until shortly before he was to speak over a coast-to-coast broadcast, he complained somewhat of being tired. I left him for a little rest, and when I returned to accompany him from the hotel he was at that minute stricken. I wish I could at this point present that scene—a giant of a man suffering intensely, apparently with but a short time to live, still in possession of his faculties and permitting his great mind to dictate his first hope and desire, that he could carry on with the engagement he had within one-half hour of that time. Having been privileged as I was to have read, the day before, the Speaker's prepared speech, I was asked to substitute for him; but, instead, I forwarded his speech to Governor O'Conor, of Maryland, for delivery by him, while I stayed at the bedside of Speaker BANKHEAD with his devoted and game wife until medical assistance arrived, and after that to meet the avalanche of calls and inquiries which were coming to his suite, because by then a message over the radio had notified the country of his illness.

This was the last I saw of our late Speaker, except the following day for a moment or two while visiting his suite.

My first attachment to Speaker BANKHEAD was when I met him in 1927 upon entering the House of Representatives, at which time he displayed such kindness toward me as a new Member. After that, when he was admittedly the outstanding choice of the majority party for Speaker, and he gave way to his friend and colleague of long standing from his own State, he displayed, as no other man in my time has, evidences of greatness, fair play, and honesty. It is not surprising, therefore, that subsequently, when a vacancy for the leadership was presented, he was the overwhelming choice, and then, after he had, despite terrific illness, led his party through bitter struggles in a way that placed him beside the great leaders of our time, he was elected to the Speakership. Strong in mind and body, one of the greatest orators of our time, a kindly gentleman, a devoted husband and father, a country lawyer and gentleman farmer, and every inch a statesman—this was our late Speaker, WILLIAM B. BANKHEAD.

Ernest Willard Gibson

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

OF

HON. CHARLES A. PLUMLEY

OF VERMONT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. ERNEST WILLARD GIBSON, late a Senator from the State of Vermont

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Speaker, it became my sad duty on June 20, 1940, to announce to the House of Representatives the death of the junior Senator from Vermont, the Honorable ERNEST W. GIBSON, my predecessor in office, a long-time Member of the House.

In his death the people of Vermont lost a true friend of great heart, and the State an eminent son, whose lifetime of distinguished service brought honor to it; the Nation an unusually able but unselfish public servant. For me, his death marked the end of a lifetime friendship that grew stronger with the passage of the years.

His career as lawyer, soldier, and statesman was ever devoted to the welfare of his country. This is evidenced in the brief biographical sketch, taken from official records, telling the story in part of the man he was, and indicates how great the loss his friends, his State, and the country sustained in his passing.

ERNEST W. GIBSON, son of William L. and Saville (Stowell) Gibson, was born in Londonderry, Vt., December 29, 1872. He prepared for college in the schools of his home town and at the Black River Academy at Ludlow, Vt., at the last-named place being a schoolmate of the late President Calvin Coolidge.

September 24, 1891, he entered Norwich University and completed the 4-year course in 3 years, graduating with the degree of bachelor of science in 1894.

While in college, he was corporal and later a second lieutenant of company A of the corps of cadets; editor in chief of the college publication, the Reveille; he won first prize in the Sheldon prize-speaking contest in 1893; was a member of the Theta Chi Fraternity; and in 1896, while principal of the Chester (Vt.) High School, he was given the degree of master of arts in course by the university.

He studied law at the University of Michigan and was admitted to practice in the State of Vermont in October 1899, forming a law partnership with E. L. Waterman and J. L. Martin under the firm name of Waterman & Martin, which later became the firm of Gibson & Waterman, when J. L. Martin was appointed Federal judge.

A Republican in politics, he was a long-time member of the Republican State Committee, register of probate for the district of Windsor, deputy clerk of the United States district court, a member of the Board of Trustees of the Village of Chester, represented Brattleboro in the Vermont House of Representatives 1906–1908, and was State senator from Windham County, 1908–10, and while senator was elected the president pro tempore of the Senate; appointed judge of the Brattleboro Municipal Court in 1908.

In addition, it should be said, as a matter of record, that he was a delegate to the Republican National Convention in 1912; secretary of civil and military affairs for Vermont; State's attorney of Windham County; a long-time trustee of Norwich University, and for years an active member and junior warden of St. Michaels Episcopal Church in Brattleboro, and trustee of the Diocese of Vermont.

He was always intensely interested in the military side of a citizen's duty to his country, and he exemplified his convictions. In 1899 he enlisted in the Vermont National Guard, rose to the rank of colonel, and retired in 1908. He returned to the service in 1915 as a captain of infantry, and served during the Mexican border trouble, and for 2 years during the World War overseas; was colonel of the One Hundred and Seventy-second Regiment of Infantry from August 5, 1921, to November 1, 1923.

In 1923 he was elected to the Sixty-eighth Congress and was subsequently reelected to the Sixty-ninth, Seventieth, Seventy-first, Seventy-second, and Seventy-third Congresses, resigning to accept an appointment to the United States Senate on November 21, 1933, to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Senator Dale.

He was married to Grace Fullerton Hadley, of Chester, Vt., on November 25, 1896. Four children were born to that union, three of whom are living, the eldest, Frank Hadley, and Mrs. Gibson are deceased.

The foregoing is indicative of his busy life as a civilian, though it is by no means a complete or comprehensive statement along that line.

In conclusion, let me say as I did the morning of his death, returning from the Senate Chamber:

Well I know he waits not as of old—
I could not find him in the old time place—
I must pursue him, made by sorrow bold,
Through worlds unknown, in strange celestial race,
Whose mystic round no traveler has told,
From star to star, until I see his face.

MEMORIAL ADDRESS
OF
HON. HAROLD KNUTSON
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. WILLIAM BROCKMAN BANKHEAD, late a Representative from the State of Alabama

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, in the quarter of a century that it has been my privilege to serve in this body we have had eight Speakers, three of whom passed away while occupying that exalted position. All were men of probity, ability, and honor.

Speaker BANKHEAD, whom we today mourn, ranks among the great Speakers of the House. As presiding officer of this body he was fair and impartial in his decisions and rulings. To the new Members he was always kindly and helpful, to the older Members friendly and wise in counsel.

WILLIAM B. BANKHEAD and I came to Congress in the beginning of the Sixty-fifth Congress and just before America's entrance into the World War. Early in our service we formed a close friendship that became strengthened with the passing of time, and no Member of the House grieved more deeply over our friend's departure.

It was WILL BANKHEAD'S privilege to have served as majority leader and Speaker during a most important period of post-war America. As such it devolved upon him to handle important administration measures that came to the House. The work incident thereto drew heavily upon his strength and we know how generously he gave of that strength. Never robust, Speaker BANKHEAD gradually broke down in health under the great strain under which he labored. In time he became weary, but never did he spare himself. To the end he carried on like the good soldier that he was.

Speaker BANKHEAD came of good American fighting stock. It was my privilege to have known his father, the late John H. Bankhead, for 13 years a Senator from the State of Alabama, a Confederate veteran who, by the way, was an intimate friend of the late Senator Knute Nelson, of Minnesota, a Union veteran, and also a splendid American. The late Speaker died in harness, as he wished. He passed away with all sails set, in all the glory of a well-spent life devoted to the service of his country and countrymen. A fallen oak that is majestic in death as it was beautiful in life.

Samuel Chapman Massingale

MEMORIAL ADDRESS
OF
HON. JOHN M. COFFEE
OF WASHINGTON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. SAMUEL CHAPMAN MASSINGALE, late a Representative from the State of Oklahoma

Mr. COFFEE of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I would be remiss to my own conscience were I not to say a few words in tribute to the memory and achievements of the late SAMUEL C. MASSINGALE. His untimely and tragic passing was a blow to all of us who knew and loved him. SAM was one of the most popular Members of the House of Representatives. Not a colleague existed but who warmed to SAM'S engaging personality, chuckled with SAM in his frequent good-humored sallies, thrilled to SAM'S homely and telling philosophic observations.

Though he has physically passed from our midst, his spirit lingers in our daily life and in the sessions of the House. His superb sense of humor was as oil on rasping machinery. His infectious wit soothed and warmed and made one glow. Always there was a pleasant reaction to contact with SAM MASSINGALE, no matter how brief was the visit with that remarkable character.

He was a potent spokesman for his State of Oklahoma. As a member of the powerful Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives, he added much to a needed balance between liberals and conservatives within the chambers of that committee.

SAM MASSINGALE knew and understood life in all of its phases. Though risen to high position, SAM at no time scorned the base degrees through which he did ascend. SAM's spirit and personality were racy of the soil of his beloved State of Oklahoma. He thoroughly comprehended the problems beleaguering the hearts and torturing the minds of the farmers of America. Though constantly discouraged by rebuffs and set-backs in his efforts to rehabilitate the American farmer, SAM obstinately continued on his course and worked assiduously to secure powerful support for his own bill designed to guarantee to the farmer the cost of production of his products.

We miss you, SAM MASSINGALE. Though you have gone to your eternal abode and are joined in the democracy of death with many great figures who have left our midst, we are advantaged by the inspiration you have provided for us. We shall emulate your record and be stimulated by the example you have set for all of us to follow.

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

OF

HON. CHAUNCEY W. REED

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. WILLIS BENJAMIN GIBBS, late a Representative from the State of Georgia

Mr. REED of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, in this short span of years that we call life there are certain possessions that we from time to time accumulate that can never be lost, stolen, or destroyed. They are the appraisals we have in our own minds made of the character and personal traits of individuals whom chance has escorted along our pathways.

Fate may sooner or later remove these persons from our immediate vision. They themselves may choose to deviate from the route we are wont to pursue; they may reach the goal for which we ourselves are striving, more rapidly than do we; or they may, in their journey through life, stumble, fall, and expire. If our contacts have been more than casual, we are often privileged to retain in our minds incidents in their existence which have contributed to our appraisal of their characters and which, though susceptible of fading with the passing of time, will ever recall pleasant pictures that we can enjoy. A sacred asset this, and one that can never be taken away from us. During BEN GIBBS' congressional career, his office was in close proximity to mine. I found him a good neighbor. We served on the same committee, walked to and from its meetings, and discussed the problems, pro and con, that were before us for determination. He was a sound thinker and possessed a keen, analytical mind. We visited in each other's offices. He was jovial and generous. I never heard an unkind remark pass his lips. In humor, in jest, in serious thought he was always a gentleman.

The picture of BEN GIBBS that indelibly impressed itself on my mind was revealed to me the last time I saw him alive—on the afternoon of the day before he passed away. In seemingly the best of health, he exultantly walked into my office and proudly displayed to me a most precious treasure that he carried in his arms—a baby granddaughter. Pleasure and pride fairly oozed from his features as he fondled the little one. When on the day following I was apprised of his sudden death the picture of that scene seemed to appear before my eyes. It was my last impression of him and was the best. It revealed him as a lover of children, a devoted father, and a happy grandfather. BEN GIBBS is gone, but those who knew him are happier because of the privilege that was theirs to know a noble character.

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

OF

HON. RAYMOND S. SPRINGER

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. SAMUEL CHAPMAN MASSINGALE, late a Representative from the State of Oklahoma

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, it is with a keen sense of sadness attending a great personal loss that I rise to add my humble tribute to the life and character of my fine and devoted friend, the late SAMUEL C. MASSINGALE, of Oklahoma. It is a high privilege to have extended to me the opportunity of bearing witness to the very high esteem and the deep and abiding affection with which our colleague of former days was held by the Members of the House of Representatives, and with that treasured memory I speak these few words of my colleague who was a good citizen, a loyal patriot, a constant humanitarian, an outstanding statesman, and a fine and loyal friend.

Representative MASSINGALE was devoted to his State. He loved the entire area of that great Commonwealth. The people of the great Southwest were his friends, and he was the friend of the people. Among them he grew into prominence; he was happy in their association. As a lawyer, he endured the customary hardships incident to his early practice, but he developed as the years passed by until he was respected as a worthy foe in every just and righteous cause. Thus he became deep rooted in his great affection for those about him. The people of his State and of his own congressional district quickly learned that he was a stanch and loyal friend in whom they could repose every confidence. He possessed the choicest ideals in life.

It was my privilege to become acquainted with my colleague in early January 1939 in our association on the Judiciary Committee in the House of Representatives. In our close contacts thereafter I came to recognize in him those rare qualities which directly appeal to men. His was not a nature which courted the spectacular things in life, but his was a temperament which yielded his affection to the serious and the better elements before us; he loved the common place of things. I knew him in the intimacies of those close contacts which are forever reserved by each one of us for but a few. I knew him as a veteran of the last World War, in which we had a common and kindred sympathy; I knew him in the stress of great turmoil when the ponderous questions of state, fraught with life's heavier burdens, were at hand; I knew him, too, in the meditations of sadness, when the heart bleeds and the somber voice pleads for solace and for rest; I knew him when he voiced his reflections and sound logic respecting the future of his country—the land he loved and the form of government which he professed with unerring devotion. He was as kindly as he was brave. He was both loyal and constant. Thus I knew my friend in the days gone by.

My colleague, whose memory I will long cherish, lived as he died—and he died as he lived—with the heavy weight of livid problems of all the people before him. He was no laggard, but he continued at his post of duty until the summons came; he was unafraid; within the silence of his memories he responded to the Master's call. He silently, yet surely, wrapped the draperies of his couch about him and laid down as if in peaceful, happy dreams.

Thus, his life work was ended. The career of my friend was completed.

SAM MASSINGALE, as we affectionately knew him, needs no encomium. His life and his living of it stand before us in all its beauty and its splendor. My last tribute to him I give in those beautiful words which were spoken of a great hero—in the days gone by:

This was a man!

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

OF

HON. JOHN C. BUTLER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. PIUS LOUIS SCHWERT, late a Representative from the State of New York

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I wish to join my colleagues in a tribute to the memory of the late PIUS L. SCHWERT, Member of Congress from my own district of New York.

It was my privilege to know Mr. SCHWERT personally. It is most difficult to find words adequate to express our inward feelings on occasions such as this. The good opinion of honest men, friends of freedom, and well-wishers of mankind, wherever they may be born or happen to reside, is the only kind of reputation a wise man would ever desire. PIUS SCHWERT prized the good opinion of his fellow citizens. The citizens of the district I now have the honor to represent will cherish his memory.

Memory is the only friend
That grief can call her own.

MEMORIAL ADDRESS
OF
HON. ALFRED F. BEITER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. KENNETH FARRAND SIMPSON, late a Representative from the State of New York

Mr. BEITER. Mr. Speaker, I had short acquaintance with the Representative from New York, Hon. KENNETH SIMPSON, whose untimely death occurred at the beginning of the first session of the Seventy-seventh Congress, but had he lived, I am sure that our friendship would have grown and ripened with the passing years. On this memorial day, I desire to pay him tribute as a distinguished Member of the House and a respected citizen of the great State of New York.

KENNETH SIMPSON was an outstanding political figure in New York and acted as a leader in the affairs of his party. His desire to serve and his energy and ability would have made him a national leader as well. It was, indeed, a tragedy that he had to be taken in the very prime of life and at the height of his usefulness and power. During the few weeks he served here he reflected honor and credit upon himself and his constituency. New York and the Nation have lost a valuable public official.

MEMORIAL ADDRESS
OF
HON. CHAUNCEY W. REED
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. MORRIS SHEPPARD, late a Senator from the State of Texas

Mr. REED of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, on this day when we pause in the midst of our official duties to do homage to those of our colleagues who have left us forever-more I take this opportunity to submit from the pen of Judge Frank E. Herrick, of Wheaton, in my State, an eloquent and fitting tribute to a great Texan and a great American:

THE WHITE TOGA

He wore a white toga in the Halls of State
With dignity and bearing fine and strong,
Clad in his robes chaste and immaculate
He stood and faced the Nation's Supreme Wrong!
With truceless lance and unsheathed sword
And tongue of flame he smote the foe—
Strong Drink and his law-guarded horde,
The Mocker of Mankind and king of Woe,
The brave who die upon the crimson field
Do do not hear the cheering victors shout,
But thrice brave they who will not yield
Howe'er the conflict seems in doubt!
Though his long battle days are done
The fields he fought shall yet be won!

Ernest Lundeen

MEMORIAL ADDRESS
OF
HON. OSCAR YOUNGDAHL
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. ERNEST LUNDEEN, late a Senator from the State of Minnesota

"A loyal son and a real defender."

Mr. YOUNGDAHL. Mr. Speaker, today we pause to pay tribute to the memory of our deceased colleagues for whom taps have sounded during the past year. They cannot benefit by our praise of their efforts and our expressed respect of their characters, but it is we, the living, that must derive inspiration from their courageous and useful lives.

On this impressive occasion I am privileged to briefly record my feelings regarding the life of my friend the late Senator ERNEST LUNDEEN, of Minnesota.

The news of his sorrowful and tragic passing is still fresh in our minds. Air-minded, a student of airplane development, an advocate of a powerful air force for America's defenses, God seemed to have decreed his untimely ending. All who knew him in life may be certain that in one brief instant he faced the inevitable in the same spirit that he lived—courageously and unafraid.

The late Senator ERNEST LUNDEEN was one of the few remaining Members of Congress who voted against America's entrance into the World War in 1917. Whether or not we agreed with him, no real American will deny him the verdict that he followed his convictions and courageously fought for them in the same spirit which really built America.

Yes; in the years preceding his death he vigorously continued the battle to keep America out of Europe's troubles. He spoke with courage, with conviction, with sincerity. His passing not only was a shock to the Nation, but in his demise America lost a loyal son and a real defender.

As I have said many times, we Americans admire men with courage and conviction. The late Senator LUNDEEN was a great American and a good soldier, not only literally but figuratively. He served his country well, both in peace and war. What more can a loyal citizen give to his country? He fought that America might live and prosper.

To those of us who must carry on, although we shall miss him, we have the cherished memory of his valuable contribution to his America and our America. The vivid memory of his willingness to fight for what he thought was right will inspire us to go forward with renewed efforts, with renewed courage in our determined fight to protect the last portals of democracy.

ERNEST LUNDEEN has passed on, but the memory of his outstanding human qualities will long live.

Samuel Chapman Massingale

MEMORIAL ADDRESS
OF
HON. LYLE H. BOREN
OF OKLAHOMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. SAMUEL CHAPMAN MASSINGALE, late a Representative from the State of Oklahoma

Mr. BOREN. Mr. Speaker, today, at the conclusion of the memorial services, a bugle will blow Taps in these Halls, the immortal notes which declare that the day is done and that the sun is gone from the earth, from the hills, and from the sky. But the sweet and gentle notes also say: "All is well, sweetly rest, God is nigh."

No man so richly deserves the honor that this day bestows upon his memory than my dearly beloved friend the Honorable SAM MASSINGALE. And it is fitting that the military requiem be a part of his memorial service because he laid down his life on the field of action where he served as an intensely earnest and loyal soldier.

I am glad that the conditions surrounding his departure were as he would wish them. He once said to me that his life had been rich and full, that he could ask no more in a personal way for all the rewards of value had come to him.

Through many years, he had enjoyed the companionship of a wife who was not only an intelligent partner but was beautiful and good to a degree of excellence and who made of their home all that wishes or imagination could conceive as being possible to the capacity of wife and mother. SAM also possessed the riches to be found in devoted children who themselves have at all times been worthy of their fine parentage both in the sense of their life attitudes and the quality of their citizenship.

Life was not niggardly in bestowing upon SAM awards and honors, for many times he was raised amongst his fellow men to positions of honor and trust which he so richly deserved and so faithfully filled. Then to be counted amongst his treasures is the affection of his friends. It is a matter of intense pride with me that I am certain in the knowledge that there was a full reciprocity of friendship between SAM and me. Very few men have ever lived who had more sincere and devoted friends than SAM MASSINGALE. Not only were men in exceptional numbers his friends, but he was a friend to men and he gave them full measure and with extreme generosity of his friendship.

I know of no finer tribute that can be paid to him and of no more certain gage of the fine character and quality of his work in Congress than to make the simple announcement that no man in Congress has more friends, sincere and devoted friends, than SAM MASSINGALE has amongst us here today. I make that statement in the certain knowledge that everyone in Congress will heartily concur with its truth.

I do not believe in death in its ordinary definition. It is beyond my conception that life could cease to be. I do not believe that life is a blind alley. I believe it to be a thoroughfare that goes on and on. The portal of eternity is simply an open gate. It opens the way to a more perfect high road. I once traveled several hundred miles down a long straight road, and could always look ahead and see some point where the road seemed to run into the sky. Man called that point a horizon. I soon found that the road did not end at the horizon, but the road stretched on beyond. And so I know that my friend who has passed beyond the horizon is continuing on the road on the other side that is as yet curtained from our view. He has walked on ahead of us and walks now with the sainted and the immortal with his presence adding honor and goodness to the total over there, just as he added those qualities in full measure when he was in our company here.

I have not said good-bye. I will not say good-bye. We have just shaken hands and parted as we have done so many times at evening, knowing that we would meet again tomorrow.

Willis Benjamin Gibbs

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

OF

HON. JOHN S. GIBSON

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. WILLIS BENJAMIN GIBBS, late a Representative from the State of Georgia

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, on August 7, 1940, my friend, WILLIS BENJAMIN GIBBS, a former Member of this body from my district, the Eighth Georgia, answered the last roll call.

Another hero has fallen asleep—one who enriched the world with an honest life. Again we stand in the shadow of the great mystery—a shadow as deep and dark as when the tears of the first mother fell upon the pallid face of her lifeless babe—a mystery that has never yet been solved.

Another life of love is now a blessed memory, a lingering strain of music. The pure and consecrated husband, the devoted and loving father, the faithful, sincere friend, who with tender faith and loyalty discharged the duties of life, has reached his journey's end. A braver, more serene, a more chivalric spirit never passed from life to enrich the realm of death. His life was gentle and his death sublime. He loved the good and all the good loved him. There is this consolation—he can never suffer more, never feel again the chill of death, never part again from those he loved. His heart can break no more. He has shed his last tear, and upon his stainless brow has been set the wondrous seal of everlasting peace. The river of another life has reached the sea.

In the presence of the great mystery, the great mystery that awaits to enshroud us all, we feel the uselessness of words. But where a fellow traveler has reached his journey's end—where the darkness from which he emerged has received him again, it is but natural for his friends to mingle with their grief, expressions of their love and loss.

Ben, as he was familiarly known to me, was truly a son of the Old South. He was born and reared in Clinch County, Ga., which belongs to a section of the Nation that is and has been through the years inhabited by a people through whose veins flows the purest and truest Anglo-Saxon blood, a people, if you please, with courage of steel and hearts of gold, where man is yet a superior creation of the Supreme Ruler and his word is a bond from which he would accept no release. He was of noble heritage, coming from one of the pioneer families who have helped develop that section of Georgia and whose patriotism to every cause of virtue has been an inspiration to all who have been thrown in the light of their lives. He was a son of Willis B. Gibbs and Lilla Johnson Gibbs, two of that county's truest patriots and noblest citizens, whose memory lingers in the love of all who knew them.

I practiced law in the courts with and against Ben. I knew him as he was, and in his soul was anchored a spirit of honor that was never questioned. My life has been made rich by friends, but I have never had, nor will I, a better or truer one than he who lies in silence now, yet loved. He was as steadfast, as faithful as the stars. This man was as reliable as the attraction of gravitation—he knew no shadow of turning. He was as generous as autumn, as hospitable as summer, and as tender as a perfect day in June. He was a home builder. He believed in the fireside—in the sacredness of the hearth. In every storm of life he was oak and rock, but in the sunshine of the summer of life he was love and flower. He was a believer of the religion of deed and his creed was to do good. No man has ever slept in death who nearer lived his creed. I have known him many years and have yet to hear a word spoken of him except praise.

If ever a husband and father could be called a prince of love and tenderness in his home, surely it was Ben. He served every office of home life as an ambassador of peace and good will and carried in his soul that tender devotion and love for his graceful and charming wife and daughter and manly son, that made each moment sparkle with joy and happiness for them. Every feature occasion in his life, whether business or pleasure, was magnified by his love for and pride in his family.

Ben was a public servant for the last 26 years of his wordly journey. For 24 years he served as prosecuting attorney in his district and the last 2 as Representative in Congress from the Eighth District of Georgia. Even though an alert and effective prosecutor, his every effort was founded upon a solid rock of honor and studded with diamonds of purity of purpose and his noble heart always tempered justice with mercy. I have been made happy since my entry into service in this Congress to learn of his brilliant, even though short, service in this body, and the love in which his memory is held by those who served with him. It has always been a source of joy to me that only a few weeks before his departure I had occasion to advise him by letter that I would not oppose him for his seat. I regret that his untimely death prevented him from enjoying a long tenure of office with the membership of this great body where he would have built a monument of service to his memory unsurpassed by American statesmen. His great ability, his unshakable honor and true sincerity always found its way to mightier and loftier heights.

Let me say again of this noble man. He was frank, candid, and sincere; he practiced what he preached, and looked with the holy eyes of charity upon the failings and mistakes of men. He believed in the power of kindness, and spanned with divine sympathy the hideous gulf that separates the fallen from the pure. He lived, he loved, and he was loved. Wife and children pressed their kisses on his lips. This is enough. The longest life contains no more. This fills the vase of joy. But in the presence of death, how beliefs and dogmas wither and decay. How loving words and deeds burst into blossom. Pluck from the tree of any life these flowers, and there remains but barren thorns of bigotry and creed. This we know: Good deeds are never childless. A noble life is never lost. A virtuous action does not die. BEN GIBBS with generous hands scattered the priceless seeds, and we shall reap the golden grain. His words and acts are ours, and all he nobly did is living still. The good are the noble. His life filled the lives of others with sunshine. He has left a legacy of glory to his children. They can truthfully say that within their veins is right royal blood—the blood of an honest, generous man, of a steadfast friend, of one who was true to the very gates of death.

If there is another world, which we have not the slightest doubt, another life beyond the shore of this, and the great and good who died upon this orb are there, then the noblest and the best with eager hands have welcomed him—the equal in honor, in generosity, of anyone that ever passed beyond the veil. To me this world is growing poor. New friends can never fill the places of the old.

BEN GIBBS lived for others. He accepted toil and hope deferred. He did not seek to adorn his body, but rather his soul with the jewels of charity, modesty, courage, and above all with love of life and its better portions.

Farewell, O brave and modest man!

Your lips, between which truths burst into blossom, are forever closed. Your loving heart has ceased to beat. Your busy brain is still, and from your hand has dropped the sacred torch.

Your noble, self-denying life has honored us, and we will honor you.

You were my friend, and I was yours. Above your silent clay I pay this tribute to your worth.

Farewell!

Alonzo Dillard Folger

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

OF

HON. ADOLPH J. SABATH

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. ALONZO DILLARD FOLGER, late a Representative from the State of North Carolina

He was a good man, and a just.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, what we say within these walls today of our late colleague, the late Representative FOLGER, can avail little to mold the judgment of his friends and acquaintances as to his useful life, less assuage the grief of those who so deeply and sincerely mourn his sudden and untimely loss.

The achievements of his life were in the courts, in unselfish civic enterprises, in the legislative hall; but perhaps, after all, they are most deeply engraved, if not as firmly perpetuated, in the minds and the memory of his friends and myriad admirers.

Any man might have a pardonable pride to have stood where Mr. FOLGER stood and to have done what he did. He continually did things from which the timid would shrink, the incompetent would recoil, and the coward would flee. But far from ministering to his vanity, the rarest and most sought honors did not elate him, and were in no sense necessary to his happiness.

In fact, honors and increased experience seemed to fill him with vague feelings of unrest and yearnings for hitherto untraveled fields of usefulness and power. One might have thought that one of his placid and judicial temperament would have remained long upon the superior bench of his State, but he resigned after only 2 months' service there to enter important work of a national character, wherein he distinguished himself.

Our friend was not a table-pounding speaker who depended upon gusts of oratory to convince his auditors; he seldom spoke upon the floor of the House, but his influence and work as a member of the important Committee on Banking and Currency were wide, penetrating, successful, and important. It is unusual for one to attain membership on that important major committee during his first term here.

Incorruptibly honest, he was proof against all temptation of avarice. His life was uniformly distinguished by the purest and most refined morality. Dissipation and vice, even of the mildest order, were unknown to him, unwelcome to him. Still he knew and appreciated the temptations of others, the unworthy motive of others; in short, he was cosmopolitan; he knew all classes of the world as they are.

He sympathized with weaknesses, which he in no way shared, of those who fall.

His was a voice that compelled attention and won the ear and the heart and his logical argumentation conquered doubt.

So fine were his feelings, his sympathies so susceptible, and his heart so tender that he felt and bore the pains of others as if they were his own, especially when he could not afford relief.

The wealth of a state or nation consists not in fertile soil, mineral land, or hoarded gold, but in the manhood of such men as Mr. FOLGER and the womanhood of her women.

Rich, indeed, in priceless jewels is the State that can claim him her son; fortunate, indeed, are we who can claim him a countryman and feel the quickening inspiration of the example to high-minded, noble endeavor.

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

OF

HON. ALLEN T. TREADWAY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. GEORGE NICHOLAS SEGER, late a Representative from the State of New Jersey

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, GEORGE NICHOLAS SEGER, dean of New Jersey's delegation in the House of Representatives, whom we lost through death last August, was a close personal friend of mine since 1922 and I miss him deeply.

Mr. SEGER was a builder. That was his vocation in life. He was a builder in the House where he was respected not only for his personal charm, his sterling character, but also for his fund of common sense and his knowledge of the tried and true principles of business.

The gentleman from New Jersey spoke rarely and on such occasions he always found a most attentive House because his contribution was both sincere and constructive.

Opposed to the Federal Government going into business in competition with private industry, he was the first to obtain an amendment to appropriation legislation to halt this trend.

Mr. SEGER was particularly active on the House Rivers and Harbors Committee. He was ranking minority member and for 18 years he assisted mightily in the development of America's harbors and waterways.

This man symbolized human kindness. I never saw him lose his temper. I remember him for his friendly smile, his warm handshake.

He had loved no darkness,
Sophisticated no truth,
Allowed no fear.

The plans he made for his secretary whom he called his partner make up one of the most interesting chapters in the history of the Congress and Capitol Hill.

William Devereux Byron

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

OF

HON. DAVID J. WARD

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. WILLIAM DEVEREUX BYRON, late a Representative from the State of Maryland

Mr. WARD Mr. Speaker, in the passing of Hon. WILLIAM DEVEREUX BYRON I have lost a dear friend. My association with him over a period of 4 years in the Maryland State Senate, and subsequently in the United States House of Representatives, will always remain with me a happy memory. He endeared himself to me and to all who had the privilege of knowing him as I knew him.

His passing is not only a deep personal loss but a great loss to the State of Maryland, to the membership of the House of Representatives, and to the Committee on Military Affairs, to which he had been assigned in the present Congress.

Mr. BYRON had a distinguished war record. His military experience was a factor in his assignment to the Committee on Military Affairs. He was graduated from Phillips Exeter Academy and Pratt Institute, and enlisted as a private in the Aviation Corps at the outbreak of the World War. After training he was commissioned a first lieutenant and assigned as instructor in flying and aerial gunnery.

During his brief service on the committee he manifested his value to the Nation in connection with the national-defense program. He helped form important legislation. With his colleagues on the committee he had covered 14,000 miles on aerial surveys of defense projects in the country, and was on two occasions designated by the chairman to make inspection trips to the Panama Canal Zone.

Mr. BYRON was devoted to his family. Symbolic of his harmonious home life was his family orchestra. Himself musically inclined, he encouraged his five boys to develop musical appreciation. Of this he said:

I have always believed that musical appreciation is not necessarily an accident of birth, but can be acquired, and gives those who have it a deeper pleasure and enjoyment of life.

My sincere sympathy is extended to his family. A kindly, gracious, and courteous gentleman and friend, BILL BYRON will always remain in the memory of those of us who were privileged to know him.

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

OF

HON. W. O. BURGIN

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. ALONZO DILLARD FOLGER, late a Representative from the State of North Carolina

Mr. BURGIN. Mr. Speaker, the death of our colleague, LON FOLGER, was a great shock to all his friends. We of his own State delegation, who knew him best, held him in the very highest esteem and affection. He was a very companionable man and loyal to his friends always. He liked political life and had the capacity for public service. He was always ready to assist those in need and was approachable by the most humble citizen as well as those of wider influence. He was much beloved by the people of his community, who sought his help and advice, and at the same time he had the confidence and respect of the business and political leaders of his district and State. We will miss him as a true friend, a valuable public servant, and as a loyal and patriotic American citizen. To his family I extend my heartfelt sympathy, and in the hope that it may help them to bear their irreparable loss, I quote from a letter written by Benjamin Franklin to his niece regarding the death of her father:

I condole with you. We have lost a most dear and valuable relation. But it is the will of God and Nature that these mortal bodies be laid aside when the soul is to enter into real life. This is rather an embryo state, a preparation for living.

A man is not completely born until he is dead. Why then grieve that a new child is born among the immortals, a new member added to their happy society? We are spirits. That bodies should be lent us, while they can afford us pleasure, assist in acquiring knowledge, or in doing good to our fellow creatures is a kind and benevolent act of God.

When they become unfit for these purposes, and afford us pain instead of pleasure, instead of an aid become an encumbrance, and answer none of the intentions for which they were given, it is equally kind and benevolent that a way is provided by which we may get rid of them.

Death is that way. We ourselves in some cases prudently choose a partial death. A mangled, painful limb, which cannot be restored, we willingly cut off. He who plucks out a tooth, parts with it freely, since the pain goes with it; and he who quits the whole body parts at once with all pains and possibilities of pains and diseases it was liable to or capable of making him suffer.

Our friend and we were invited abroad on a party of pleasure, which is to last forever. His chair was ready first, and he is gone before us. We could not all conveniently start together; and why should I be grieved at this, since we are soon to follow and know where to find him. Adieu.

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

OF

HON. ADOLPH J. SABATH

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. WILLIAM DEVEREUX BYRON, late a Representative from the State of Maryland

All that lives must die,
Passing through nature to eternity.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, the subject of our encomiums, the late WILLIAM DEVEREUX BYRON, is another promising legislator that was taken by death just as he was entering full fruit and flower. Born May 15, 1895, he became a Member of the House January 3, 1939, and passed away tragically February 27, 1941.

Let us gather some solace from the fact that—

That life is long which answers life's great end.

Soon after finishing his schooling Mr. BYRON enlisted as a private in the Air Corps of the Army and was in due course granted a commission as first lieutenant. This experience later caused our late friend to be selected a member of our Committee on Military Affairs, where he rendered valuable service, especially in connection with all aviation problems.

It would be difficult to imagine a better preparation than this good man received for service in the National Legislature. From youth he was trained in operation and management of an important private business. At the age of 31 he was elected mayor of Williamsport, Md., in which office he served 4 years, leaving it to become a member of the Senate of the State of Maryland, where he served 4 years. Following that term he served 2 years, 1934-1935, as a member of the Maryland Roads Commission.

The record does not show our late colleague to have been a noisy, self-advertising personage, but he was of that type that in a silent, forceful way devote themselves unceasingly and intelligently to their onerous and important duties in committees, with little or no thought of reward other than the satisfaction of duty well done.

He was one of those men who recognized that one must take humanity as it is and that the world could not be transformed or reformed in one day or one generation. While he recognized that there were conditions in this country that were bad, and some more abuses in our industrial and economic life should be corrected, yet he had the faith necessary to believe that these things could and should be corrected in due course under the orderly processes provided by our Constitution and form of Government, which he understood so well and respected so scrupulously.

Our good friend has gone, cut down in the high tide of physical and mental virility and usefulness. He has trod the path we shall tread when the summons comes. Let us be as well prepared in all things as he was, for the good he did lives after him. Our struggle here may be longer, yet for whatever time it may be, we will go on as "weary ships to their haven under the hill."

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

OF

HON. ED. V. IZAC

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. SAMUEL CHAPMAN MASSINGALE, late a Representative from the State of Oklahoma

Mr. IZAC. Mr. Speaker, we have lost many able Members of this body in the short period of 5 years that I have had the honor of representing in Congress the people of my district. We have lost to the grim reaper a wealth of talent, of honor, and of courage. But I actually had not felt so severe a personal loss until the unexpected passing of my old friend SAM MASSINGALE, of Oklahoma. We were corridor mates in the old House Office Building. We always conferred together on measures of importance. He advised me on agricultural problems. I advised him on questions of national defense. He was most conscientious and hard working.

I have never heard him vote against a humanitarian measure of any kind. His was the homely philosophy of the Golden Rule, and in his speech and in his actions he lived up to that standard.

SAM MASSINGALE spoke softly and was slow to anger. His kindly disposition made him a general favorite among us, and on numerous occasions his commonsense remarks on pending legislation resulted in the enactment of laws for alleviating the suffering of the poor and underprivileged and the bettering of the lot of the farmer and the workingman.

We will miss him here, but the greatest loss will come to those of his countrymen for whom he gave his life in line of duty.

MEMORIAL ADDRESS
OF
HON. ADOLPH J. SABATH
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. PIUS LOUIS SCHWERT, late a Representative from the State of New York

Give sorrow words; the grief that does not speak.
Whisper the o'erfraught heart, and bids it break.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, the subject of our encomiums, who was born November 22, 1891, and passed away March 11, 1941, was an especially promising legislator, after receiving a good, practical education in commerce, which was followed by successful experience in banking, merchandising, and as clerk of Erie County, N. Y. During his quest for business success in early life our friend was not too busy to answer the call of his country in an emergency, but he served as a commissioned officer in the United States Navy.

Mr. SCHWERT's popularity in his important county was so widespread that he was called to serve on the President's special review for veterans' compensation cases.

The qualifications of our honorable deceased were here instantly appraised and rewarded by election to a major committee—the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads—immediately after he was seated as the successor of Senator JAMES M. MEAD.

Our friend's ambition for success of his service here was high. With strong caution and conservatism in his nature he was in no danger of attempting rash experiments or resorting to the empiricism of statesmanship. But he believed that renewed and closer attention should be given to questions affecting the material interests and commercial prospects of 132,000,000 people. He believed that an essential forerunner to a new era of national progress must be a feeling of contentment in every section of the Union and a generous belief that the benefits and burdens of government should be common to all.

Least of all men did he harbor revenge, rarely did he ever show resentment, and malice was not in his nature. He was congenially employed only in the exchange of good offices and the doing of kindly deeds.

In the transitory struggles of life he had an abiding pride of consistency, but he was always liberal and tolerant. After reaching a conclusion, based upon full knowledge and mature consideration, in connection with his legislative duties, he was always content in his mind, justified in his conscience, and immovable in his determination.

After a too short service here, extending from January 3, 1939, to the date of his passing, our friend left behind a proud, expectant constituency, a great host of sustaining friends, and a proud and unsullied name.

Every acquaintance of this honorable deceased loved him. His kindly nature and lovable traits of character and his amiable consideration for all about him will long endure in the minds and hearts of his constituents and colleagues.

MEMORIAL ADDRESS
OF
HON. GEORGE H. MAHON
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. MORRIS SHEPPARD, late a Senator from the State of Texas

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker, I have heard and read many of the glowing tributes which have been paid to the memory of the late senior Senator from Texas, the Honorable MORRIS SHEPPARD. All of these tributes were inadequate. They fell far short of the mark because the character of MORRIS SHEPPARD was indescribably fine. It would, therefore, not become me to try to pay him an adequate tribute. But I cannot refrain, as a Texan who admired the Senator very much, from adding my name to the list of those who seek to pay their respects to the memory of a great Texan and a great American.

Some may remember the Senator as they last saw him on the Senate floor, pleading the cause of national defense. Some will remember having last seen him on the way to a Goverment department on a mission in behalf of a powerful or an humble constituent. Some will remember having last seen the Senator as he spoke at the banquet table with a sparkling brilliance and a fine sense of humor. Some will remember him as he sat in the church, as he regularly did, with a reverence and loyalty which was characteristic of his life to the end. One thing sure—all those who remember him will have cause to be grateful for the example of so fine and wholesome an American as was MORRIS SHEPPARD.

George Nicholas Seger

MEMORIAL ADDRESS
OF
HON. GORDON CANFIELD
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. GEORGE NICHOLAS SEGER, late a Representative from the State of New Jersey

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Speaker, humbly do I join in this memorial tribute to GEORGE NICHOLAS SEGER, who represented the Eighth Congressional District of New Jersey for almost nine terms. He was my chief, my friend, my mentor, and 1 year ago today he was making plans to "stump" for me to succeed him. His sudden death in August broke up our 18-year-old partnership in service, and I had to forego the happiness of having him at my side when I took the oath of office on January 3, 1941.

Mr. SEGER was a man of sterling character and it gave him great joy in late life to reflect on his more than 30 years of public service—school commissioner, mayor, and Representative—and to realize he had kept the book clean. Every political opponent admitted this and he was properly classified as his district's public citizen No. 1. He was an outstanding exemplar of the philosophy "a man can be honest in public life and go places." And he believed mightily the theory it pays to do well the little things in life—courtesies, humanities, acts of friendship.

When Mr. SEGER and I first teamed up he impressed upon me ours was to be a "We" relationship. Frankly, I doubt that Capitol Hill history can record a closer relationship of Member and secretary. This was emphasized by his frequent reference to me as his "third son."

Because he was the World War mayor of his home city of Passaic, Mr. SEGER always felt close to the veterans of that war. He sent his two sons overseas and he officiated at many send-offs of other boys. Giving those boys the then oft-repeated assurances that all would be well when they came home, he was saddened later at the disappointments and heartaches of those who did return. This was his principal reason for his support of the payment of the soldiers' bonus which in 1936 almost cost him his reelection, close business friends then holding such payment would ruin the financial structure of the country.

Mr. SEGER's sons served in the Navy and he himself loved the water. He made several trips abroad with Mrs. Seger, and when he came to the Congress he was assigned to the House Committee on Rivers and Harbors, being ranking minority member at the time of his death. He had a deep affection for the chairman, Representative JOSEPH J. MANSFIELD, of Texas, and the two cooperated for years in the development of America's ports and waterways. When the Texan once told him he, Mr. SEGER, was destined to become chairman he replied that they would have to have "the two Joes on hand to help." Besides the chairman he was making reference to Joseph H. McGann, long-time faithful and efficient clerk to the committee.

It pleased Mr. SEGER when Postmaster General James A. Farley came to Paterson in 1933 to dedicate that great industrial city's new Federal Building. Digressing from his prepared manuscript, the Democratic chieftain paid great tribute "to the Congressman from this district for his services to his people and the Nation."

In many of his talks, particularly when he would sight Democrats in the audience, Mr. SEGER would recall that his father was once a Democratic member of the New York City Board of Aldermen. It was in the days of "Boss" Tweed, and when the elder Seger refused to obey orders from the boss he was purged, serving but one term.

Mr. SEGER'S gracious and charming daughter who had been his campaign manager in his first campaign came to Washington with him in 1923. Here she met and married a truly fine gentleman of the South, one who sat on the other side of the aisle from her father, Representative FREDERICK H. DOMINICK, of Newberry, S. C. Their two lovely daughters, Joan and Doris, were Mr. SEGER'S joy, and after Mrs. Seger's passing in 1934 he spent almost every congressional recess in the Southland.

Mr. SEGER loved the House and its membership. I have often heard him say he would rather serve his district in Congress than have any other post within the gift of the people. Friends had often urged him to consider the governorship of New Jersey, but he would never do so. He was much concerned about the international situation as it grew from bad to worse last summer, and he prayed that he would never have to see a World War No. 2, one engulfing America.

There were no prejudices, no hates, in the make-up of this great American citizen, and people of every race, color, and creed knew him as their friend, their champion. Meticulous about his personal habits, he was so about his daily record of "things done." I have never known a man in public or private life who kept a more accurate diary, that book he kept so clean.

There is no group in American life who can appraise a public man better than the gentlemen of the press. Reporters everywhere saluted this genial, friendly dean of the New Jersey congressional delegation, and they did so for the same reason men and women of all stations of life wept when they heard of his passing. They knew he was good and they knew he loved his fellow men.

The world today is better because of GEORGE NICHOLAS SEGER. The heritage he left me is immeasurable.

I see a hand you cannot see!
I hear a voice you cannot hear.

Key Pittman

MEMORIAL ADDRESS
OF
HON. ADOLPH J. SABATH
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. KEY PITTMAN, late a Senator from the State of Nevada

Like as the waves make towards the pebbled shore,
So do our minutes hasten to their end.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, the life and the accomplishments of the late Senator PITTMAN aptly illustrate the possibilities accruing under our democratic form of government and the free institutions of our country.

One from Mississippi may be pardoned if he asserts that it is among the sons of his State that occur very frequently indeed striking illustrations of the rising to place of influence, power, and importance of men born in places which, in theory, preclude such advancement; and among the many such examples of children of Mississippi there stands out the life and enviable record of the late Senator PITTMAN.

The record discloses only one important advantage, except parenthood, that was given to the late Senator in early life, and that was opportunity for a good education. Surely after he left school at the age of 20 he was very much on his own as a pioneer, for we find him on the Pacific coast in 1892 trying to establish himself in the practice of law. Five years later he migrated to Alaska with other adventurers, where he spent 4 years and was the first prosecuting attorney of Nome. Thereafter he returned to the United States and settled in January 1902 in Tonopah, Nev., where he lived the remainder of his life.

As the late Senator grew to maturity he knew instinctively that the closed hand cannot receive; therefore his hand was ever held out in helpfulness to all with whom he came in contact.

I cannot tell those who have served here while our friend was a Member of the Senate anything new concerning his assiduous and intelligent application to duty. Going to the Senate the same day as did the late Senator Sheppard, January 29, 1913, he wrested ceaselessly through many black and purgatorial years, and at too great a sacrifice, as this sad ending indicates.

He gave to every interest his best, and the regard and respect of all his associates came back to him. This deceased was indicative of the man who knew life at first hand and who was able and eager, out of his own experience, to devise ways for smoothing the pathway of those who needed most the help of kindly hands. If it be true that the drying of a single tear "hath more honest fame than shedding seas of gore," then Senator PITTMAN will indeed have an enduring fame. Always he mingled with strong men in crowded places. Always his hand was outstretched to aid his fellow men.

Our friend realized that no man has come to true greatness who has not felt in some degree that his life belongs to his race, and that what God gives him He gives him for mankind. He knew that every noble life leaves the fiber of it interwoven forever in the work of the world.

This honored deceased recognized that the best results in the operation of a government wherein every citizen has a share largely depended upon a limitation of purely partisan zeal and effort and a correct appreciation of the time when the heat of the partisan should be merged in the patriotism of the citizen; that this was still a government of the people, and it should be nonetheless an object of all our solicitude. He felt that after party strife, the bitterness of partisan defeat, and the exultation of partisan triumph, these should be supplanted by an ungrudging acquiesence in the popular will, and a sober, conscious concern for the general weal. He felt that we should in these great national emergencies cheerfully and honestly abandon all partisan prejudice and distrust, and determine, with manly confidence in one another, to work out harmoniously the achievement of our national destiny and security and thereby deserve to realize all the benefits which our great and good form of Government can bestow.

Of this good man's eminent service as President pro tempore of the Senate and chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate I shall not speak, because it will be covered thoroughly by those most intimately associated with him; and I need not point out to scholars around me the necessity for strong leadership in those two exalted positions in mercurial times like these.

May we not learn a lesson from the life of this good man that will aid us in our struggle to so live that it can be said of us, as we now truthfully say of the deceased Senator, that in every walk of life, in every responsibility and trust, it was his creed to honestly and fearlessly do his duty as God gave him the light to see his way. His career has been a wholesome influence in American public life.

The widespread influence that Senator PITTMAN exercised as a statesman and philosopher must long continue to be felt and recognized as a molding and directing force in America's onward progress.

MEMORIAL ADDRESS
OF
HON. A. SIDNEY CAMP
OF GEORGIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. WILLIS BENJAMIN GIBBS, late a Representative from the State of Georgia

Mr. CAMP. Mr. Speaker, the sorrow we experience in the passing of our friends is a sorrow from which the heart fails to find real surcease. It is a sorrow measured exactly by our love for them, and when we learned, on the evening of August 7, 1940, that the great Master of the Universe had called our brilliant, kind-hearted, generous, distinguished, and beloved colleague, WILLIS BENJAMIN GIBBS, from his unselfish labor among us to his eternal home in that country—

From whose bourne
No traveler e'er returns.

we were so convulsed in an overwhelming grief that time, though a great healer, refuses to palliate.

And all of us were grieved to receive the sad news of BEN GIBBS passing, for all of us loved him, as did everyone who knew him. He loved us, and he loved everybody. Scion of one of the oldest and best families in the land, peer of statesmen and jurists, he fraternized with men of high and low estate, rich and poor, and saw their best qualities, shared their joys and sorrows. He was a true nobleman, noble in thought, in purpose, and action, and appreciated that quality in others as few men can do. His conception of nobility has been exactly expressed by these words:

Howe'er it be, it seems to me,
'Tis only noble to be good,
Kind hearts are more than coronets
And simple faith than Norman blood.

It had been my privilege to know BEN GIBBS some years before his election to Congress, while he was serving as solicitor general of the Brunswick judicial circuit and as governor of the Georgia district of Kiwanis International, which positions he served with dignity, honor, and distinction; but our intimate friendship began when I was sworn in as a Member of this body on August 1, 1939. He came immediately to me, gave me information and guidance so helpful to a new Member, and seemed to derive a real pleasure from every service rendered. As I was drawn closer to him by friendship's ties, I discovered that all his genuine joy came from service he rendered his country, his State, and those about him. He loved his committee work and gave the most careful thought and consideration to every measure coming before it. He studied every measure before the House, and no Member voted more intelligently nor more conscientiously.

He enjoyed wholesome recreation, baseball games, and fishing. He would sit for hours watching the sandlot teams playing in the parks and spend other hours fishing in the Potomac and Chesapeake Bay, but his chief pleasure was his family. He was born in the little community of Dupont, in Clinch County, Ga., on April 15, 1889, the son of Willis B. Gibbs and Lilla Johnson Gibbs. After finishing the common schools of his native county, he entered Mercer University, from which he was graduated, and admitted to the bar in June 1911. He moved to Jesup, Ga., and began the practice of law there in 1912. In 1914 he was elected solicitor of the city court of Jesup, holding that position for 10 years until his election as solicitor general of the Brunswick judicial circuit in 1924, which latter position he held 15 years until his election to the Seventy-sixth Congress on November 8, 1938.

He was a prosecuting attorney for 25 years, and no other in the State had a more enviable record for convictions, yet he made no enemies. He prosecuted violations of the laws fearlessly, but he prosecuted them fairly, and commanded the respect of all.

He was an official member of the Methodist Church and a leader in religious and civic life of his community.

He is survived by his widow, Mrs. Florence Reville Gibbs, who succeeded him and served his unexpired term in Congress; and a son, Warner B. Gibbs; and a daughter, Mrs. J. A. Leaphart, all of Jesup.

In the passing of BEN GIBBS, the Eighth District, the State of Georgia, and the country has sustained a great loss. He died in the service of his country, while giving his time and talents to their fullest capacity. BEN GIBBS was one of the—

Tall men, sun-crowned, who live above the fog
In public duty, and in private thinking.

And one of those—

Men whom the lust of office does not kill;
Men whom the spoils of office cannot buy;
Men who possess opinions, and a will;
Men who have honor, men who will not lie.

Samuel Chapman Massingale

MEMORIAL ADDRESS
OF
HON. ADOLPH J. SABATH
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. SAMUEL CHAPMAN MASSINGALE, late a Representative from the State of Oklahoma

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, we gather today not to engage in the regular business of the House, but as Representatives to reverently raise our voices in speaking of our honorable deceased.

Since our last memorial services about nine Representatives and four Senators have passed from earth to another world. Neither the old nor the young have been spared. The oldest and the youngest Representatives, who but a short time ago were occupying their seats here, apparently in full prime and vigor, and carrying in their hearts the eager, rejoicing power to meet all demands, have been taken.

Mr. MASSINGALE came here January 3, 1935, and served continuously till his sudden passing on January 17, 1941; and during that too short time I had many pleasurable and profitable conversations with him.

The RECORD bears witness that our friend was a vigilant, untiring worker. He did not occupy the floor in prolix and pedantic speeches, but reserved his more earnest endeavors for effective committee work, which rested very near his heart. His success in law made it inevitable that he become a member of our Committee on the Judiciary after a proper novitiate.

This good man was endowed with studious tastes and disposition, a rich vocabulary, and an enviable, accurate and retentive memory. Seemingly he never forgot anything he either heard, read, or saw. Consequently his mind was not only stored with useful knowledge, but that knowledge was at all times available. This was verified by his few speeches in the House. It was, though, as I have said, in the freedom of a committee room that his strong powers were exhibited to the highest advantage. He practiced none of the arts of oratory, and made no effort at display of any kind, but spoke straightforwardly, entirely unmindful of the style or manner of his delivery.

Our friend was always as chivalrous and generous as the typical knight of the olden time. He did not think that every man with whom he disagreed was foolish. In addition to many other virtues he constantly exhibited the loftiest patriotism. In all that he did he was scrupulously jealous of his country's honor, good name, and highest interests. All proposed legislation here was by him subjected to the test of every sound and experienced legislator—how would it affect the whole United States of America?

Mr. MASSINGALE, born in the State that gave John Sharp Williams and other notable men to the Congress, was a true gentleman of the old school. In a time like our own, when it is too much the habit to sneer at ideals and regard them as impracticable sentimentalities, when change is too thoughtlessly effected, it is well to remember that these men of ideals who belonged to the past were a hard-fighting, brave, and peculiarly effective generation. It is equally important not to forget that now, as always, it is only the men of ideals who in the long run can move and guide the people, for however vivid may be the admiration for mere success, those whom the people really trust and follow must be men who are not content to minister to their appetites or their prejudices, but who bid them raise their eyes and beckon them forward to the heights beyond. We may, in our wisdom, have changed all this, but the nobler instincts still remain to start into life at the master's touch.

Our friend has gone; our high tribute to his worth and work is that we would not have had him what he was not.

Consecrate for us all the memories of the past, the memory of the faithful man whom we shall not see here again, because he has been lifted up to higher service.

MEMORIAL ADDRESS
OF
HON. ED. V. IZAC
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. PIUS LOUIS SCHWERT, late a Representative from the State of New York

Mr. IZAC. Mr. Speaker, what a fine incentive to the youth of our land to see one of their baseball heroes doff his uniform and substitute for his career of providing recreation and entertainment for the American people a new career of service in more grim and realistic matters affecting the daily lives of every one of us. "PI" SCHWERT left that kind of a legacy to American youth. He rose high in athletic prowess; he was destined to rise equally high in service to his fellow men through the medium of legislation for their good. Too bad he had to be stricken just at the time he attained to a place of influence and prestige in the House.

Although he served but a few short years, he had endeared himself, as perhaps no other Member has done in so short a time, to his colleagues of all political parties. I was especially fond of him because, while thrown with him constantly, I never heard him utter a derogatory word about a single human being. He was the soul of honor and a representative of his people of whom they could well be proud.

"PI" SCHWERT was the kind of a Congressman we all hope we would be like. God rest his soul.

Morris Sheppard

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

OF

HON. ADOLPH J. SABATH

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. MORRIS SHEPPARD, late a Senator from the State of Texas

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, one by one the old landmarks of our political life are passing away; one by one the links that connect a glorious past with the present are sundered. The deceased Senator in tribute to whose memory this day has in part been set aside did not, unfortunately, live the threescore and ten years spoken of by the Psalmist as the period for man's earthly existence; but he wrought with singular devotion, unexcelled ability, and rare constancy in a wide scope and during an epochal era that held us all against the grindstone of grave and anxious uncertainty.

There is given to few men such a splendid opportunity of service and to have received the measure of appreciation, love, and devotion accorded to the deceased Senator.

I served with him from March 4, 1907, to January 29, 1913, in this honorable body. As I sat with him around the table in a committee room and worked with him in this Chamber about 6 years I learned to know and love him in his daily walk of life; and it is with profound respect and true admiration for the lofty example of a busy, purposeful, and useful life that I am glad on this occasion to pay a simple tribute in a few words to his memory.

Although I did not agree with some of the Senator's views, especially one, nonetheless I always found him to be very broad gaged and liberal minded, a gentleman who knew no distinction between races and religions. From time to time he made many interesting public speeches, always pleading for justice and tolerance.

It is, of course, a great honor to serve as a Senator of the United States, and especially so when one comes from a large and populous State. Senator SHEPPARD'S immediate predecessor, Senator Joseph Weldon Bailey, had established an enviable reputation as an orator and statesman, his last effort in the Senate, as I remember, being in connection with the Illinois United States Senatorship in 1912, when the country witnessed the unusual procedure of a Democratic Senator of transcendent ability defending the right of a Republican Senator to retain his seat. Senator Bailey failed in that great effort, but his expounding of age-long principles of election will long enrich the literature of that important subject, and he failed only when opposed by an array of very able legalists headed by the great Elihu Root. This was the last time the legislature of my State selected a United States Senator. In fact, no doubt it may be said that this celebrated case hastened the States to approve the constitutional amendment that provides for the direct election of United States Senators.

The more than 10 years Senator SHEPPARD served in this body was a splendid training for the new and wider duties imposed by his promotion to the Senate; and his State, which had constantly been represented in the United States Senate by men of unusual ability, did not suffer by his elevation.

Let us, then, as our dead is buried out of our sight, seek for the lessons and admonitions that may be suggested by the life and the death which constitute our theme.

First, they teach the value of study and mental training; but they teach more impressively that the road to usefulness and to the only success worth having will be missed or lost except it is sought and kept by the light of those qualities of heart which it is sometimes supposed may safely be neglected or subordinated. That is a great mistake. The greatest possible accumulation of learning alone will not lead to the heights of usefulness and success.

The Senator was not deficient in education; he had a very good education; but of all you will hear of his grand career, and of his service to his country and his fellow-citizens, you will not hear that either the high place he reached or what he accomplished was due to his education. You will, instead, constantly hear as accounting for his great success that he was obedient and affectionate as a son, patriotic and faithful as a safe and sound legislator, honest and upright as a citizen, tender and devoted as a husband and father, and truthful, generous, unselfish, moral and clean in every relation of life. He never thought any of these things too weak for manliness. Make no mistake. This was a most distinguished man, a great man, a useful man, who became distinguished, great, and useful because he had, and retained unimpaired, the qualities of heart which too many of us, I fear, feel like keeping in the background or abandoning.

Living, he was honored; gone from us, his memory will be fervently cherished as long as intellectual excellence, purity, and singleness of purpose and heart are revered among mankind.

By the memory of our deceased friend, let us resolve to cultivate and preserve the qualities that made him great and useful; let us determine to meet the call of patriotic duty in every time of our country's danger or need.

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

OF

HON. PAUL BROWN

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. WILLIS BENJAMIN GIBBS, late a Representative from the State of Georgia

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, Hon. W. BEN GIBBS was serving his first term in Congress at the time of his death on August 7, 1940, but during this short time he had proved himself to be a Congressman of outstanding ability and had endeared himself to the entire membership of the House.

He was brilliant and genial and one of the most prominent lawyers of his beloved State. He served for many years as solicitor of the city court of Jesup, Ga., and as solicitor general of the Brunswick judicial circuit. When he came to Congress he was assigned to the Judiciary Committee, for which he was so eminently qualified by his many years of experience at the bar.

His courage, his sympathetic attitude to all in need, his purity of character, and fidelity to duty, together with a sense of justice and humor, marked his life in every position which he was called upon to fill.

His uppermost thoughts were always of others. Never did he place himself above the level of the common man. He was immediately at home with the farmer in the field or with the statesman in the Chamber. He was never happier than when helping the young people with whom he came in contact in their various problems.

Mr. GIBBS was a faithful public servant, a true and loyal friend, and in his passing the State and the Nation sustained a great loss.

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

OF

HON. THOMAS D'ALESANDRO, JR.

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. WILLIAM DEVEREUX BYRON, late a Representative from the State of Maryland

Mr. D'ALESANDRO. Mr. Speaker, it was my sad duty to announce to the House the sudden and untimely death of our friend and colleague, WILLIAM D. BYRON, of the Sixth Congressional District of Maryland, on February 27, 1941. To those who knew him and who shared his friendship, his death carries with it the deepest sense of personal loss. That Mr. BYRON was well loved and deeply respected by his constituents is shown by the fact that he was elected as mayor of Williamsport in 1926, to the Maryland State Senate in 1930, and in 1938 to the United States House of Representatives. What further evidence of their affection and esteem could they have shown?

His personality, his sincerity, and his generosity endeared him to all who knew him and especially to those who had the pleasure and privilege of serving with him, and he well deserved the respect, devotion, and love which they freely gave. Mr. BYRON leaves a host of friends in the House and thousands of devoted admirers in the State. He had qualities of mind and heart which made him an especially valuable Member of Congress and public servant. He departed for the farther shore at a moment when he was on the threshold of a notable and brilliant career in Congress. As his friend, and a Representative from the same State, I am proud to pay tribute to his memory. In his passing the Congress and the Nation have suffered a great loss.

I am sure that his devoted wife and children will derive great consolation in the remembrance, down through the years, of his splendid attributes and in the abiding faith that a Divine Providence has ordered all things well.

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. M. MICHAEL EDELSTEIN, late a Representative from the State of New York

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, since our last memorial exercises four Senators and nine Representatives have responded to the final summons, which every mortal must obey; and "no man knoweth either the day or the hour."

Death is never so distressing, its chilly hand never so unwelcome, as when it withers one whose brilliancy and rare attainments set him above the ordinary level of mankind, as a character to be emulated and admired. When Nature blesses a man with unusual talents; when it invests him with nobility of mind and soul, his passing leaves a void difficult to bear, because it is hard to fill.

Representative EDELSTEIN, to whose memory we pay tribute today, was such a man. Nature was generous with him in her endowments, which he well repaid by more than 30 years of useful service to Nation, State, and community. As a successful member of the bar and a national legislator our friend devoted his talents and high character to the service of his clients and constituents with an intelligence, energy, and enthusiasm that did honor to himself and the State he represented in part.

He was an assiduous student whose books brought him sound counsel and the broad and penetrating information that made his judgment much respected. He was a citizen and legislator eagerly seeking the best interests of his country and the maintenance of its honor. Scion of a race whose history has been one of persecution, his life has given to the world another proof that this is a land wherein merit knows neither race nor creed—a nation wherein honest achievement will receive its just recognition.

I shall never forget an interesting conversation I had with our deceased colleague on the subject of religious liberty. We know that this principle, the right to worship according to the dictates of one's conscience, free from the restraint of man-made laws, continued to be cherished by him as long as he lived, as, in fact, it has been by the race from which he sprang, whose sufferings from un-Christianlike intolerance have been no less noteworthy than the steadfastness of their adherence to the faith of Abraham.

Death lent a touch of high drama to an utterance by Mr. EDELSTEIN here, which utterance ordinarily might have gone unnoticed in these extraordinarily mercurial times. He spoke for only 1 minute when he was stopped by the gavel of the Speaker and by death's sudden dart. Yet it may be said without fear of contradiction that that was the highest moment of our deceased friend's life and that his brief remarks will go down in the annals of American Jewry as one of the most dramatic as well as most significant utterances ever made by a Jew in the Congress. In an atmosphere surcharged with passion, Mr. EDELSTEIN sounded a clarion call for reason, fair play, and tolerance. That death took him so suddenly after his heart's outpouring only serves to stress the significance of his brave defense of the Jewish people.

It was the erroneous and inaccurate charge of certain Representatives against "international bankers and their Jewish brethren" that stung the deceased to the quick, moving him to an immediate and eloquent reply. I need not repeat the charge and the defense of one group of the accused. Those are green in memory.

I wonder whether these gentlemen realize that by their unfortunate charge they killed something not only in Mr. EDELSTEIN'S heart but in the heart of every Jew in the United States. You all know that to which I refer and I will not name it, because this is not an occasion for debate.

This honorable deceased was a comparatively new Member of the House. The RECORD shows that he abstained from boring this House with prolix and pedantic speeches. He simply bade his time and allowed others to orate about matters of state. He was a simple soul, modest, and without any gift for ballyhoo and the histrionic. He was a quiet worker, dedicated entirely to the cause of whole America and the Jewish people. His name did not ring through the Halls of Congress as often as did those of others, yet his dramatic exit did much to preserve the high prestige of the House of Representatives. He may not have been a martyr, as some maintain, but it can be said without fear of contradiction that his short and brave challenge to the forces of Jew hatred and reaction contributed much toward that which every Member of this House holds dear.

Shrinking and in nervous dread of any sort of contest, none surpassed him in vigor of defense or bravery of attack when the fight began, as was shown by the closing moments of his life. Had the aspersion against his race, which precipitated his death, been an aspersion against himself alone, I doubt that Mr. EDELSTEIN would have dignified it by any comment; but, being a Representative here of many of his own race, he could not let that oft-repeated but erroneous charge go unanswered.

This honorable deceased ever shrank from giving pain to anybody or anything. He was always on the side of mercy, always first to urge forgiveness and charity.

Let us fondly hope, as our dead is buried out of our sight, that the unwarranted, unsupported, erroneous charge which was the immediate cause of this death may not be made again in this Hall; and I rest that hope, in part, upon this statement of the Founder of the Republic:

> May the children of the stock of Abraham who dwell in this land continue to merit and enjoy the good will of the other inhabitants. * * * May the Father of all mercies scatter light and not darkness in our path and make us all in our several vocations useful here, and in His own time and way, everlastingly happy.

Our friend was not much influenced by the pleasures of the world, but early discovered that the only deeds which yield a true, enduring satisfaction are disinterested deeds. He found true pleasure only in laboring for the welfare of humanity, and he knew that Christian charity is the only atmosphere in which the human soul can find complete gratification.

Resting with firm step upon the rock of immutable and self-evident principles, he armed his keen eye with the powerful lense of Faith and swept, eagle-like, the boundless region of truth; viewing the ultimate reasons of things from the loftiest and serenest point. Strong in the power of synthesis, he spurned subtlety, one-sidedness, arid abstractions, vaporous generalizations, and traced the meaning of all actual existence to the ideal.

The aspiration of this good man was not in any form of luxury, and his dignity depended not upon artificial adjuncts. The superficial display and the vanity of the world at large were to him matters of absolute indifference.

Our colleague has gone from this House of Representatives to that realm from which no traveler ever returned. He leaves behind him a good name, a priceless heritage of industry, patriotism, and achievement in the interest of his country and humanity.

Those of us who have been here for many years have seen one eminent Representative after another fall by the way.

The older ones in the House are nearly all gone, and new men take their places; and may we trust and believe that in the future, as in the past, we may not be wanting in good and wise men to guide the destinies of the Nation.

Willis Benjamin Gibbs

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

OF

HON. MALCOLM C. TARVER

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. WILLIS BENJAMIN GIBBS, late a Representative from the State of Georgia

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Speaker, the principal objective in the commemoration of the life of any man is to preserve for posterity a record of whatever about that life may furnish inspiration. Relatives and close friends, as well as thousands of other contemporaries, do not need to be told of the admirable qualities which distinguished the character of our late beloved colleague, WILLIS BEN GIBBS; but if in the archives of the Congress through the medium of this memorial service there may be recorded facts about his career which will quicken the ambitions and steady and strengthen the purposes of young Americans for this day and future days, that indeed is something that is worth while.

Because I feel that is true, I wish to submit these remarks about our departed friend.

During our brief but extremely pleasant association together in Congress he told me much of his early career and of the difficulties he encountered before he was able to plant his feet firmly in the pathway which led to eminence in his profession, honors in public life, and a private and public career which can be measured accurately by only one word—success. With limited financial resources, he nevertheless attained through hard work the educational advantages needed to open to him the door of opportunity—advantages which thousands of other young men have had handed to them on a silver platter and perhaps for that reason did not always appreciate.

BEN GIBBS was accustomed to work for what he wanted. Within 3 years after his admission to the bar the qualities of industry and capability had already so distinguished him that he was called into the public service as solicitor of the city court of Jesup, Ga. Ten years later, in 1924, his people enlarged the field within which he might labor for them by electing him solicitor general of the Brunswick, Ga., judicial circuit, in which position, because of his honesty, ability, and successful performance of duty, he was continued until his election to the Seventy-sixth Congress in November 1938.

He made a wonderful impression upon his colleagues in Washington. Quiet and unassuming, courteous and friendly, he was immediately accepted upon a status of recognized worth which ordinarily is not accorded until after years of service. As an evidence of that fact, he was assigned during his first term to the powerful Judiciary Committee, an assignment which has been rarely in the history of Congress, given to a first-term man.

His service justified the confidence placed in him. He continued on this important assignment the policy to which he had been accustomed throughout his life—hard work and careful attention to every detail of his duties. Before long he was recognized as one of the outstanding men on this committee, which has among its membership some of the ablest members of the American bar.

His untimely death on August 7, 1940, was a tremendous shock to his colleagues. The stress and strain of legislative work during the emergency undoubtedly accelerated the fatal results of a heart condition which under less strenuous circumstances might have been overcome. His death, therefore, may be truly said to have been a sacrifice on the altar of public duty.

BEN GIBBS, country boy, student, lawyer, public servant, citizen, and friend, admirable in every condition and relationship of life. I close, as I began, by saying that the record of his career should, indeed, be an inspiration to American youth and that the good of his unselfish life was not "interred with his bones."

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

OF

HON. ED. V. IZAC

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. WILLIAM BROCKMAN BANKHEAD, late a Representative from the State of Alabama

Mr. IZAC. Mr. Speaker, it is with a keen appreciation of my inability to do justice to one of the great men of our day that I rise at this time to eulogize his memory. One of the greatest influences in my congressional career has been the advice and example of our late beloved Speaker BANKHEAD. To me no Member of the House of Representatives so epitomized the ideal type of legislator and presiding officer as he. Ever courteous but firm, his demeanor stamped him at once as the dignified yet jovial leader of 435 representatives of the people who loved him because of his fairness, his fine personal qualities, and his unfailing friendliness to all.

I am happy in my recollection of a great opportunity when I could show my appreciation of his great talents and of my belief in his fitness for even a more exalted position by casting my ballot for WILL BANKHEAD as Democratic nominee for Vice President of the United States at the National Convention in Chicago last summer. It proved later that he was more needed in the House of Representatives and we all bowed to the will of the majority.

I cannot help feeling that although spared to us as Speaker for but a few short years his passing from the mortal stage has not been without some compensation for us all; he left us a warmness of heart that comes from contact with a noble character.

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

OF

HON. VICTOR WICKERSHAM

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. SAMUEL CHAPMAN MASSINGALE, late a Representative from the State of Oklahoma

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Mr. Speaker and fellow colleagues, it is with a deep feeling of reverence that I stand before you on this day set aside in memory of those of this body who have passed on to the Great Beyond within the last year. And, in this connection, permit me to say that I know of no Congressman who is more vividly pictured in your minds than my predecessor, my friend, and your friend, the late SAMUEL CHAPMAN MASSINGALE, known by everyone as Sam.

Mr. MASSINGALE had acquired that homespun philosophy and jovial nature from early childhood and training. He was respected and will long be remembered by his kindly nature and his smile. When he spoke there was a listening audience.

Although I made two races against Mr. MASSINGALE, I never knew a man who was any fairer to his opponents. He made a clean campaign and, likewise, I made a clean campaign. We were friends. He won his races easily.

Mr. MASSINGALE served his country as a church worker; he served his country as a faithful soldier, as a counselor for many years; he served his family as a good father and a loyal husband; he served his country as a real Congressman; he left a good wife, three fine daughters, and innumerable friends.

I am 35; Mr. MASSINGALE was 70; and may I say now that if I am privileged to be allotted the threescore and 10 years and if at the end I have rendered as much service; if I have won the esteem and friendship of the people, have maintained the love of my family and fellowman, and have retained my smile, as Mr. MASSINGALE did, I will feel that I have fought a good fight; I have finished my course; I have kept the faith.

Mr. Speaker, fellow Members, and friends, I feel that Mr. MASSINGALE's passing was a loss, not only to the Seventh Congressional District and the State of Oklahoma but to the United States of America. It will be a difficult task for me to take his place as a Congressman, but I shall do my best.

Morris Sheppard

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

OF

HON. NAT PATTON

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. MORRIS SHEPPARD, late a Senator from the State of Texas

Mr. PATTON. Mr. Speaker, I wish to speak briefly on the character of the late MORRIS SHEPPARD, Senator from the State of Texas, who, until but a short time ago, was the dean of the Senate and the beloved mentor of all legislators in the Capitol. I cannot, in the short time I shall take, cover the entire life or the entire field of achievements this great man attained. I cannot adequately outline the greatness of this man among men. But from my personal acquaintance with this great and noble man, and from his hope for the future, I should like to discuss with you MORRIS SHEPPARD—discussing one phase of his life in the hope that the great and Christian scheme that he envisioned shall not linger and fade with his death, but shall achieve the immortality of fulfillment.

MORRIS SHEPPARD was a brilliant man. His years in the University of Texas and his undergraduate years at Yale bespeak his keen insight into the halls of knowledge. His public addresses in those formative years show a groping and astute intellect, probing the problems of mankind and brushing aside the set delusions of smaller minds.

I am proud to say that I was a member of the Texas Legislature in 1913 that, twice in the same day, elected MORRIS SHEPPARD to the Senate. I remember him as he was then, a small man in stature made larger by a commanding poise and a confident ability to cope with any situation. I recall with the keenest pleasure his acceptance speech before the legislature in January of 1913. He accepted the duties and the obligations of that office with the purest and most noble intentions. and, I praise God, when he laid down the duties of his office at the peaceful close of his life 28 years later there was not one blemish—there was not one sign that MORRIS SHEPPARD had not fulfilled the duties of his office save in the highest and most honorable way. What more can be said in praise of such a man? What greater praise can mortal man receive than to say that in neither ignorance nor guilty purpose did he soil the mantle of his authority?

If I should seek to outline in full the mighty achievements of MORRIS SHEPPARD, I would take your attention for hour upon hour. I do not intend to do that. I shall merely commend to you, Senators and Representatives alike, a close study of his career. From his life and his ideals shall you gain an insight into the character of a true Democrat and a firm advocate of the right. Some day, perhaps in the dark dim future, if democracy should not withstand the pressure of the dictators, some day when future scholars probe in the past, some day a student or a scholar will bring to light the career of Senator MORRIS SHEPPARD. To that age MORRIS SHEPPARD will glean light, the light that shines to us in the careers of the prophets and the great of Greece and Rome. "Here," they shall say "here was the forerunner of our day." "Here," they shall announce, "here was a man who lived before his time and who predicted the world to come." "Here," they will announce to that future world, "was MORRIS SHEPPARD, living in a world of the blind and greedy proclaiming the world of the day and of Christ."

MORRIS SHEPPARD grew to manhood in the world that saw America rise to manhood. For the first years of the life of the United States of America the Nation west of the Atlantic had gathered itself within its borders—jealous of its rights and desiring no contacts with the Europe across the sea. Europe was a prison that they feared and hated. Europe was the land their forefathers had forsaken, left because it offered them only the doom of a living death.

MORRIS SHEPPARD was still a student when Richard Olney, that great American statesman, declared that the American people could not assume an attitude of indifference toward European politics and that the hegemony of a single continental state would be disastrous to their prosperity, if not to their safety. MORRIS SHEPPARD was a young man practicing law in the days right after Theodore Roosevelt declared:

> We have no choice, we people of the United States, as to whether or not we shall play a great part in the world. That has been determined for us by Fate, by the march of events. We have to play that part. All that we can decide is whether we shall play it well or ill.

MORRIS SHEPPARD was a keen observer of events when Roosevelt sent the American Ambassador to France, Henry White, to the Conference of Algeciras in 1906. He saw the United States, a rising young giant, entering the arena of world affairs and sharing in the duties and responsibilities of a member of the world family of nations. He saw, guided by the powerful hand of Theodore Roosevelt, our Ambassador dominate the conference and determine its actions. With other farsighted young Americans, MORRIS SHEPPARD gloried in the activities of his country. He applauded the spirit in which Theodore Roosevelt endeavored to settle the Russo-Japanese War. America had come of age and had taken its seat at the council tables of the world.

It is singular that MORRIS SHEPPARD, one of the most gentle of men and a firm believer in right over might, should have also interested himself in military affairs. It is singular that while he was a strong advocate of peace MORRIS SHEPPARD favored and spoke for increases in our Military Establishment and in our defenses. As the painful days of the Bosnian crisis passed and the Agadir incident took its place, MORRIS SHEPPARD was speaking in behalf of defense and preparedness. A Congressman alone in the din of a House dedicated to everlasting peace and prosperity had to command much respect to be heard. MORRIS SHEPPARD was heard—and some few heeded his message. Too many, too, too many did not. The Balkan troubles in 1912 and 1913 came into history. MORRIS SHEPPARD pointed his finger at the cancer. Be it said to the credit of Texas that SHEPPARD was heard and his worth was recognized—and he was elevated to the Senate in the midst of that Balkan crisis.

MORRIS SHEPPARD entered the Senate at the time that Germany and Austria were watching with misgiving the defeat of Turkey by the Balkan alliances, when the Balkan drive for independence was set to blow the powder fuse at Sarajevo. When even President Wilson was declaring that this was "a war with which we have nothing to do, whose causes cannot touch us" when the great majority of the American legislators were declaring that we had no stake in the war, MORRIS SHEPPARD was warning of the coming crisis—the dawning day of the denouement. MORRIS SHEPPARD was expressing the desire of the people for a strong union of nations to make the violation of the peace impossible. His ideals were later summed up in his speech made in the Senate of the United States in 1921, when he said:

> Thinkers, philosophers, statesmen, teachers, prophets in all periods have expressed the longing of humanity for peace. This longing was embodied in the visions of Isaiah, who pictured peace as the natural state of all mankind, and all mankind one brotherhood under the one and only God. Its application to all the world was foreshadowed in the league of Grecian states, by which they were federated into a workable whole. It was dimly seen in Plato's dream of an ideal republic. It permeated the doctrines of the Stoics, a system of philosophy based on the concept of every man as friend, not foe. It obtained portrayal in the deliverances of that orator of ancient days, Isocrates. It was suggested in the writings of Virgil and Cicero, of Seneca, of Horace, and of Tacitus. It was the theme of the angels as they sang the advent of the Messiah. It prompted the measures with which the church curbed medieval violence and disorder. It inspired the teachings of Erasmus. It found expression in Queen Elizabeth's "great design" for a European federation and in the proposal of Henry IV and his Prime Minister, Sully, for a Christian republic of Christian states. It was illustrated in the treatise of De La Croix, who proposed a world tribunal for the prevention of war. It was reflected in the thought of Locke, who denounced war as inconsistent with the morality. It was exemplified in the plan of William Penn for a sovereign state of Europe. It was mirrored in the preachings of Fenelon, the reasoning of Leibnitz. It was embedded in the celebrated project of the Abbé of Tours, Charles St. Pierre, for a republic of nations. It was defined in the philosophy of Rousseau, the conceptions of Jeremy Bentham and the mysterious Gondard. It found spiritual realization in the theories of Immanuel Kant.

Such a thorough survey of the history of the world to achieve a lasting and honest peace could not have come but from years of study and thought. Please note that no periods of "armed peace" are mentioned as worthy of the plan. The Pax Roma is not mentioned. Peace at the point of a sword was not MORRIS SHEPPARD's idea of peace. Freedom must be the first requisite of peace—peace without freedom to MORRIS SHEPPARD was far worse than war itself.

The overshadowing object of our entry into the world struggle was the overthrow of war and the gospel of war.

When the war in Europe revealed itself to the American public as a world war and the events at sea brought the United States to the brink of active participation, MORRIS SHEPPARD was interested in seeing that the reason for war was worthy of the sacrifice. His reason for entrance was to overthrow the gospel of war. To him, the defeat of power politics and the downfall of force as a means of policy was worth the sacrifice of war. But he insisted that this sacrifice not be made in vain. MORRIS SHEPPARD asked that before the United States entered the war the nations recognize the purpose of the American entry and guarantee that the peace to follow would be molded on the foundations of permanent and honorable intercourse between nations. A peace of justice must be established to act as a cornerstone for the future. MORRIS SHEPPARD was a powerful influence on the plans and thought of Woodrow Wilson. The famous Fourteen Points were an expression of the ideals SHEPPARD had been preaching in the Senate and through the land. And when the German Government called for an armistice, it was called on in accordance with the Fourteen Points.

Glad were the leaders of the world, for the dawn of a new era seemed about to begin. War had ceased, and peace would be established in justice and in honor.

Yet the United States, the Nation that begat Woodrow Wilson and MORRIS SHEPPARD, did not ratify the League of Nations. A "little band of willful men" destroyed the dream of MORRIS SHEPPARD. MORRIS SHEPPARD fought the surging tide of reaction—but in vain. Disgusted with the heavy price of the war, the American people wanted to forget and turn to other things. Europe had been the burial ground of its young men, and the people wished to forget the hateful words spoken in war. MORRIS SHEPPARD the "Little Sheppard of Kingdom Come," the prophet of peace, was not heard though he spoke wondrously well.

Refusing to bow to the reactions of war, MORRIS SHEPPARD strove in futile grandeur to preserve the progress of world peace. His speech in the Senate on October 5, 1921, is one of the masterpieces of modern statecraft. The address, published by the Government Printer, covers 158 pages and is the best exposition on the workings of the League of Nations yet written. It is the guidebook of all scholars. None have surpassed its insight and its delineation of the League of Nations.

Commenting on this monumental speech, the Alexandria (Va.) Gazette said:

A few days ago Senator MORRIS SHEPPARD, of Texas, delivered in the United States Senate a speech that may be regarded as one of the best and most timely addresses before that body in years. * * * Senator SHEPPARD has given the people a most thorough and exhaustive review of the work of the League since its inception. * * * We know of no document of recent times that is more likely to increase in historic value as the years go by. * * * We congratulate Senator SHEPPARD on the fruits of his labors. They are refreshing, indeed, in these times of sordid politics and partisan narrowness.

Another newspaper, the Charleston, W. Va., paper, in an editorial of the day, stated:

Senator MORRIS SHEPPARD, of Texas, has taken the time and the trouble to review the work of the League of Nations. His is a brave heart and true, one that does not leave the path of right at the first gl fire of error, nor at the poison gas waves of prejudice. His is a masterful piece of strategy as well as a timely contribution to the literature of a subject now almost entirely surrounded by ignorance, prejudice, and politics. * * * SHEPPARD, like Wilson, can see that while money, power, prejudice, ignorance, and political power can do wonders, it cannot stop people from thinking. * * * Senator SHEPPARD sees the power of truth.

MORRIS SHEPPARD never admitted defeat. Again in 1923 Senator SHEPPARD, at the expense of his health, conducted a filibuster against the Senate actions in an effort to gain strength for a movement to bring the United States into the League of Nations. Suffering from an attack of the grippe, Senator SHEPPARD nevertheless led the filibuster and spoke 7 hours one day, to follow it with a speech of 10 hours the next.

Said the Associated Press:

Fearing the Senator might be taxing his strength too greatly, friends tried during the course of his speech to induce him to stop, but he smilingly replied that he was not tired, and continued. There was not even a roll call to interrupt him and give him momentary rest. Including the 4 hours in which Senator SHEPPARD spoke Monday night, he spoke a total of 11 hours out of a possible 24.

Senator SHEPPARD's speech was commendatory of the League of Nations and its accomplishments and deplored the insistence of the United States in failing to participate with it in combating the principal menaces of humanity which he designated as "one of the overshadowing tragedies of all time."

MORRIS SHEPPARD was fighting to gain the goal that the sacrifices of our American soldiers had made possible. He was seeking to bring the mighty influence of the American Nation into the council rooms of the world and bring about a permanent and a just peace. To him, the denial of that sacrifice and the rejection of that goal was criminal. It meant that thousands of lives had been heedlessly and wantonly slaughtered. It meant that war had been fought in vain; that there was to be no reward for valor.

Never turning, MORRIS SHEPPARD declared:

Believing that the issue of issues before the United States and all mankind is the League of Nations * * * or another earth-wide crash; that this League, slow though may appear its processes and numerous difficulties which surround it, offers to this generation and to this century the only hope of the final establishment of organized right and justice among nations, I cannot vote for any enactment in which, once more asserting our isolation from the League, we emphasize our desertion of humanity.

In 1921 MORRIS SHEPPARD drew the line—either a cooperation of nations and a workable League of Nations or an "earth-wide crash." To MORRIS SHEPPARD the denunciation of our sacrifices in the World War and our rejection of the League was a "desertion of humanity." To do as was planned, said MORRIS SHEPPARD in 1921, would lead to another "earth-wide crash."

Was he right? Certainly he was right. Only 2 years later, in 1923, while Senator SHEPPARD was leading a filibuster and pleading the cause of the League of Nations, in far-off Bavaria a little man with a comic moustache was organizing a league of "gray shirts" into a national socialist party. Hitler was emerging from his shell.

I remember the last months that MORRIS SHEPPARD was alive. Vivid in the eyes of the world was the earth-wide crash he had predicted. Only by his work in preparing this Nation through his chairmanship of the Senate Military Affairs Committee, chiefly through his masterly work in getting the Selective Service Act of 1940 enacted, had saved the United States from being totally unprepared. Despite his efforts, in the face of his speeches dating from 1921, when the League was rejected by the United States, the United States had not heeded his call for greater defense work. MORRIS SHEPPARD was the voice calling in the wilderness. He has been right in all things. God grant that we shall learn our lessons and learn our duties aright from the life of MORRIS SHEPPARD. Gentlemen of the Congress, I plead with you to garner the fruits of MORRIS SHEPPARD's labor and let us prepare against the future. Let us arm this Nation as he wished. Let us raise our eyes to the God of all men above who was the mentor of MORRIS SHEPPARD and determine here and now that we shall listen to the prophetic words of MORRIS SHEPPARD still echoing through the Halls of Congress that in the days to come no heedless sacrifice shall be made and that when this horrible war now raging shall be ended that no little "band of willful men" shall defeat the Christian desire of the peoples of the earth. Let us now resolve to ourselves that the memory of MORRIS SHEPPARD shall be immortal in the foundation of a federation that shall preserve the peace of the world in justice and in God. Let us prepare so well that never again shall there be an earth-wide crash nor shall any nation be guilty of a desertion of humanity.

Samuel Chapman Massingale

MEMORIAL ADDRESS
OF
HON. A. S. MIKE MONRONEY
OF OKLAHOMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. SAMUEL CHAPMAN MASSINGALE, late a Representative from the State of Oklahoma

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the privilege of placing in the permanent RECORD of this Congress some of the things that I believe the people of this Nation should know about the late Hon. SAM MASSINGALE, who so ably represented the Seventh Congressional District of Oklahoma for many years.

Uncle SAM was the favorite nickname given to Representative MASSINGALE. He earned this fond characterization, for, during his 7 faithful years as a Representative, he was a personification of the best that is the American way of life.

He was able, fearless, energetic, but, above all, he had a sense of humor that was truly traditionally American in its kindliness. It was these qualities—all sterling attributes of statesmanship—that won for him the affection of every Member, regardless of party.

Representative MASSINGALE'S training was an ideal background for his success in Washington. A graduate of the schools of and University of Mississippi, a student of law in Texas, a veteran of the Spanish-American War, a pioneer in the new country of Oklahoma, and a leading member of the bar of that new State—all these tended to build the character that was SAM MASSINGALE.

I first knew Uncle SAM when I came to Congress in 1938. I found him helpful, kind, and always willing to lend a hand to a new Member. No task was too great for him to offer his great help; no question was too unimportant to receive a careful explanation from him.

Soon I found out more about him and his kindness to every living being. I never heard him speak ill of anyone. His zeal to help others kept him long overtime hours at his desk.

On the floor of the House I found him always fighting for the cause he believed was right. He was always willing to assist the underprivileged because he believed that they needed his help. His action in this was a personal love and genuine sympathy for those who had had less of the advantages of America. His action always for them was based on an intimate and affectionate understanding of their trials and difficulties—known by him personally to exist throughout his section. Never was his action based on the politically expedient, but on his sincerity for those less fortunate than he was.

Long hours, late meetings found him working for the farmers of his district—those who tried to eke out a living on submarginal farms in the Dust Bowl country. He understood those people, and their weak, inarticulate voices from drought-stricken farms found an able and effective champion in SAM MASSINGALE.

He was liberal in his thinking on legislation; he was always ready to take a position against powerful pressure organizations without a thought of the consequences to himself or his political future. It was for the unorganized man, the weak, the underprivileged, that MASSINGALE championed.

It was his genial friendship, the cheerful smile, the sincerity of purpose that won Uncle SAM his wide host of close friends in Congress. No day was too full of worries or troubles to erase that quizzical smile. No debate was ever too hot or issues too closely drawn to make him forget his humor or his kindliness. I have seen him many times stride arm in arm from the floor with his bitterest opponent in debate. You simply had to love this kindly, friendly man.

It was my privilege to attend the funeral rites in Cordell, Okla., his home for nearly 40 years. It is on the western plains of Oklahoma, where a 10-year drought has ravaged once prosperous farms. The high wind, too, has stripped the fertility from much of the soil. But the drought or the wind could not break the spirit of those pioneer farmers—they were of the stuff of which MASSINGALE found his strength.

Long before time for the funeral the town was overcrowded, and thousands left their farms, their stores, their homes to drive many miles to mourn the passing of their friend and champion. The large city-hall auditorium was too small to hold the number who loved him, too. Across on the courthouse square more remained outside to mourn as could be accommodated in the auditorium.

Huddled in small groups of 8 or 10, they talked of their genuine loss. There was no pomp, no ostentation, no false show of sympathy or grief. Their loss of MASSINGALE was truly personal, for they had known him so intimately for those 40 years that he served them.

Many had known him as a young lawyer, struggling to make a start in the new country. Others had known him as the kindly and just adviser to those who sought his counsel. Still others remembered the thousands of kindly acts that he had done for his people as a Member of Congress.

It was a real cross section of America that day that came with damp eyes to express its sorrow in the loss of a true friend and a great American. Yet these people in common walks of life had a common love and esteem for Uncle SAM that was shared by all those in the Nation's Capital.

From the Senate and the House, from the newest elevator boy and page, that same feeling of loss of a true friend was felt—as existed there on those Oklahoma plains.

We all feel the loss of SAM MASSINGALE. We know that a truly great American, who lived by the Golden Rule, has been called from us. But the memory of his sincerity and his great character will long leave its imprint on those who knew SAM MASSINGALE.

MEMORIAL ADDRESS
OF
HON. ROBERT F. RICH
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. GEORGE NICHOLAS SEGER, late a Representative from the State of New Jersey

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, it was my happy privilege to serve in this House with the late GEORGE N. SEGER, Representative from the State of New Jersey. I knew Congressman SEGER well and regarded him an able Representative, always conscious of his duties and responsibilities as a legislator. His long service as a Member of this House is proof of his abundant ability and popularity among his fellow Members and constituents as well. No man remains in Congress for more than 16 consecutive years without clearly demonstrating his ability and capacity as a legislator.

I knew Congressman SEGER personally as a gentleman of high quality and one who had the capacity to estimate his fellow men. He was tolerant and sympathetic. His death was a great loss to his constituents and to this House. It is a personal loss to me, and I extend to his bereaved family my heartfelt sympathy.

MEMORIAL ADDRESS
OF
HON. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. ERNEST LUNDEEN, late a Senator from the State of Minnesota

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Speaker, the high esteem in which a large majority of the citizens of Minnesota held Senator ERNEST LUNDEEN is in itself a testimonial which will far overshadow my remarks in memory of this good friend and colleague. Twice elected from Minnesota to the House of Representatives and then to the United States Senate reflects the unquestioned confidence of our people in him.

Born and educated in the Middle West, he knew the life of a pioneer people. Senator LUNDEEN was known to be a man of the common people and sought to give expression to their views in his public work. He loved his family, and when not engaged on public problems he could always be found at the family fireside enjoying the companionship of his loved ones. In all of his struggles his talented and personable wife was his constant adviser and helpmate. We mourn the passing of our friend, ERNEST LUNDEEN, but can little appreciate what this sadness means to his family. Our hearts go out in sympathy to them.

The untimely and tragic death of Senator LUNDEEN came as a shock to the Nation. He was on his way home when the airplane in which he was a passenger crashed to earth. He was a frequent user of air transportation, and was one of the first to cross the Atlantic Ocean of a Clipper ship.

Senator LUNDEEN served his country as a soldier, statesman, and lawyer. While I did not always agree with his political views, I nevertheless respected his opinions and admired his courage. In war or peace he stood for America first.

Today we pay tribute to the memory of ERNEST LUNDEEN and other colleagues who have been called to their reward. They are gone from our midst, but their lives, characters, and work will stand as monuments in our memories and on the pages of American history. They served their country, and their names will be inscribed in the archives of fame as men who helped build a better America.

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

OF

HON. ROBERT W. KEAN

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. GEORGE NICHOLAS SEGER, late a Representative from the State of New Jersey

Mr. KEAN. Mr. Speaker, we meet today to pay tribute to the memories of our colleagues who have answered the last roll call in the past year.

Among them is listed the beloved dean of the New Jersey Republican delegation, GEORGE N. SEGER, of the eighth district, who died on August 26 last, following a brief illness.

It was not my good fortune to have been intimately acquainted with Mr. SEGER over a long period of years. I knew him casually as one who was prominent throughout the State of New Jersey for a long time and who served faithfully and well his home city of Passaic as its mayor from 1911 to 1919, and as director of finance from 1919 to 1923; and then the Eighth Congressional District from 1923 until his death.

But my close association with him dates to my coming to Congress in January 1939 as a fledgling member of the New Jersey delegation when he helped to make easy my apprenticeship in the Halls of this body. For his kindness and courtesy to me then I shall always remember him affectionately in the years to come.

To my mind Mr. SEGER had all those qualities which typify the real gentleman. Clean, wholesome, courteous, and kind; a family man in the finest sense—a devoted husband, a loving and lovable father. To his friends he was ever loyal and sympathetic and was always ready to help make lighter their burdens.

In him was gathered a constellation of virtuous qualities of mind and character which reflected that splendid personality which made up his soul. And as these exercises today serve to call him to our minds we experience a deep sense of grief for the loss that has come to us in his death. We grieve for him because we loved him; in that respect our grief is ennobling for we could not mourn for someone we did not love.

OF

HON. JOHN W. GWYNNE

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. SAMUEL CHAPMAN MASSINGALE, late a Representative from the State of Oklahoma

Mr. GWYNNE. Mr. Speaker, SAM MASSINGALE was an able and popular Member of the House. By training, personality, and character he was eminently fitted for the position he held as a Representative from the State of Oklahoma. He was a lawyer of real ability. To him the law was not merely a collection of abstract rules, but was rather the machinery by which the ever-changing problems of government are to be solved. In addition to his work on the Judiciary Committee he was very much interested in the problems of agriculture. Laws for the benefit of farmers everywhere always had his vigorous support. In the death of SAM MASSINGALE those of us who knew him have lost a good friend and the House of Representatives has lost a valuable Member.

Willis Benjamin Gibbs

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

OF

HON. HUGH PETERSON

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. WILLIS BENJAMIN GIBBS, late a Representative from the State of Georgia

Mr. PETERSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, less than a year ago the hand of Providence saw fit to remove from this Hall our colleague, WILLIS BENJAMIN GIBBS, who was so faithfully and efficiently serving as the Member from the Eighth Congressional District of Georgia. His passing was a great loss to this House and to our country. With a strong personality and a natural talent for legal and legislative affairs, he had, even during the brief period he was permitted to serve his district, impressed himself upon the membership of Congress and gained the admiration and friendship of those with whom he served.

Few men entering this body have gained so many personal friends among the Members in so short a time as did BEN GIBBS. He was a man of strong moral character, sound judgment, and temperate manners. He was possessed of modesty and dignity, of poise and self-control, and he had a rare wit as well as a natural gift as a conversationalist and story teller. He was gentle and kind yet mentally and physically courageous. He was loyal and reliable. He had an enormous capacity for friendship, and his love for and devotion to his family merited the admiration of all who knew him.

With a natural gift for making friends, a native personality, fine mental faculties, and a character strengthened and mellowed by long and useful public contacts and public service, BEN GIBBS was a man of rare charm and a public servant of unusual ability.

He had a splendid record as a student in the schools of Clinch County and Mercer University, where he acquired a fine legal education. Upon entering the private practice of law his unusual talents were soon recognized by his fellow citizens, and only 2 years after he opened his law office in Jesup, Ga., in 1912, he was elected solicitor of the city court of Jesup. In 1924 he was elected solicitor general of the Brunswick judicial circuit. After many years of faithful and efficient service in these offices, he was elected Representative in the United States Congress from the Eighth Congressional District of Georgia to fill a vacancy in the Seventy-sixth Congress. He was popular among his constituents as well as among his colleagues, and when he offered for reelection to the Seventy-seventh Congress there were none to challenge him. Although assured of reelection without opposition, BEN GIBBS continued without slackening his energetic activities in behalf of his constituents and his country. His constant and energetic devotion to duty no doubt contributed greatly to the attack which so swiftly removed him from our midst.

The congressional district which I have the honor to represent adjoins the district which he represented. Our offices in the House Office Building were near each other. Thus, while at home in Georgia we frequently saw each other and while in Washington there was seldom a day that I did not see him and discuss matters with him. I came to know him intimately, and his passing has been a tremendous personal loss to me.

I never saw a man more devoted to his family, and this loving care won for him much happiness. He lived for others and the happiness that surrounded him truly proved the truth of the assertion that we get out of life what we put into it.

BEN GIBBS lived a full and a useful life—one that was crowned with success. He acted "well his part." And even as he has entered into a rich inheritance in a life beyond likewise has he left a rich inheritance—the memories and example of an honorable life well lived—to his family, his loved ones, and his friends.

Today we who knew WILLIS BENJAMIN GIBBS cherish his memory and mourn his loss.

MEMORIAL ADDRESS
OF
HON. ROBERT F. RICH
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. SAMUEL CHAPMAN MASSINGALE, late a Representative from the State of Oklahoma

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, it is proper and fitting that those of us now serving in Congress should pause to unite in paying tribute to our departed brothers and colleagues. So today it is my privilege to speak a word of tribute to the late SAM C. MASSINGALE, of Oklahoma, whom I knew so well and favorably. I was a great admirer of his fine qualities. He was a valuable Member, a good friend to those for whom he professed friendship. He was not of my political faith, but we were of the same mind on many issues of profound importance and I held in high esteem the judgment and sincerity of SAM MASSINGALE. He was an able Congressman. He served his country honorably during the Spanish-American War. His death removed from this House a faithful servant, a good legislator, and a personal friend who cannot be replaced. His loss is irreparable and cannot be overestimated.

MEMORIAL ADDRESS
OF
HON. SCHUYLER OTIS BLAND
OF VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. GEORGE NICHOLAS SEGER, late a Representative from the State of New Jersey

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, to know GEORGE N. SEGER was to love him. He was my very dear friend. I could not in a eulogy of considerable length speak of him as I should like or as he deserved. I came to know him in the early days of his congressional life and each year his quiet, gentle manner, his unassumed dignity, and his splendid poise increased my admiration for him.

Mr. SEGER served for many years on the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, of which I have been chairman for the past 8 years. He was well informed in the problems with which we had to deal, sound in judgment, patient in consideration, indefatigable in his labors, and wise in counsel. One of the last missions of magnitude on that committee with which he dealt was as a member of the subcommittee studying Alaskan problems and particularly the fisheries of that Territory. It was my good fortune to be with him on that trip of about 6 weeks, and I learned then more than I had ever known before of his patient search for the truth, his tolerance in judgment, his humanity, his kindly sympathy with his fellow man, his desire to help wherever possible, and his zeal for the right. Party partisanship played no part in his deliberation. He wanted to know what was best for his country, what was right in his associations with his fellow man.

GEORGE SEGER'S life was an inspiration and an example. I conclude as I began—to know GEORGE N. SEGER was to love him.

William Brockman Bankhead

MEMORIAL ADDRESS
OF
HON. SCHUYLER OTIS BLAND
OF VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. WILLIAM BROCKMAN BANKHEAD, late a Representative from the State of Alabama

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I pay my last sad tribute to my very dear friend of many years. Speaker BANKHEAD is absent from mortal eyes, but never from the hearts of those with whom he served. There are times when words fail. To describe BILL BANKHEAD, to measure his virtues, to appraise his fine qualities of mind and soul needs a far more facile pen than I possess.

When I first qualified in Congress on July 3, 1918, BILL BANKHEAD was there. For many years I served with him on the Committee on Merchant Marine, Radio, and Fisheries. I soon discovered his discerning mind, his keenly analytical study of legislative problems, his wealth of information, his grasp of public affairs, and his patriotic and patient approach to their solution. In those early days I learned to lean upon his wisdom and his judgment, to rely upon his fidelity to truth, and to follow in his fight for justice.

Mr. BANKHEAD had the finest qualities of mind and soul. He did not know how to do wrong. His eyes were ever on the stars. His feet were always on the ground. Where he led, men might always safely follow. As a public man it may be said of him, as Jefferson said of President Monroe, that you could turn his soul inside out and the world would not find a blemish. His public career and the many honors which came to him never disturbed his characteristic modesty. He was always the same—kindly, patient, unselfish, friendly, loving. He was a great Speaker. He was always more than that: He was the kindly, loving man, whose greatest glory was to do good, to advance the right, to relieve the afflicted, to lift up the fallen, to help the blind, to strengthen the weak, to replace darkness with light, sorrow with joy, wrong with right. Men like BANKHEAD never die. The good they have done lives after them and years after their journey has ended, many who knew them still call them blessed and, themselves departing, bequeath to others some of the spiritual glory of those lives that they have known.

When I reflect upon the life and character, the work and worth, of BILL BANKHEAD, I feel more than ever the full force of the admodition of the Prophet Micah:

> What doth the Lord require of thee, but to do justly, and to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God.

Old friend, hail and farewell; for so it must be now, but soon the mists shall have rolled away, and those who knew you here, may again know you where there are no farewells.

MEMORIAL ADDRESS
OF
HON. W. R. POAGE
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. MORRIS SHEPPARD, late a Senator from the State of Texas

Mr. POAGE. Mr. Speaker, on April 9, 1941, Texas lost her most beloved and most trusted public servant. The United States Senate lost its most industrious and considerate Member. This Nation lost a crusader and a leader of note. The people lost a friend.

No man ever served in the Senate who more completely held the confidence and love of the people he represented. All of my life I have known of MORRIS SHEPPARD. He was known to every Texan as a man of firm convictions and of unyielding moral principles. Yet in all the years I have listened to the comments of the people I have never known a man or a woman who questioned the integrity or the character of this illustrious statesman.

His friends included all who knew him, and it may be truly said that all his friends and constituents loved MORRIS SHEPPARD. They all knew that no man worked harder, longer, or more intelligently and effectively for them, not only collectively but individually, than did he. We who have throughout the years taken our problems to him know that, in truth and in fact, this noble and kindly character literally worked himself to death in the service of his people and his country. We humbly bow in recognition of his outstanding life of service, cheered with the knowledge that he is even now enjoying the everlasting reward so justly his.

Tribute to the Late Senator Sheppard by Senator Capper

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ARTHUR CAPPER

OF KANSAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, June 19 (legislative day of Tuesday, June 10), 1941

ADDRESS BY HON. ARTHUR CAPPER, OF KANSAS

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the Record a tribute to the late MORRIS SHEPPARD, Senator from Texas, delivered by me at the MORRIS SHEPPARD memorial service on May 26, 1941, at Calvary Baptist Church, Washington, D. C.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

In the fifteenth psalm in which David describes a citizen of Zion, I find these words:

"Lord, who shall abide in Thy Tabernacle? Who shall dwell in Thy holy hill?

"He that walketh uprightly, and worketh righteousness, and speaketh the truth in his heart.

"He that backbiteth not with his tongue, nor doeth evil to his neighbor, nor taketh up a reproach against his neighbor."

Our good friend, MORRIS SHEPPARD, who has gone on before us, by David's definition, is one who will abide in the Tabernacle; who will dwell in the holy hill. For if ever there was a man known to me who lived up to the high and exacting requirements of the Psalmist, it was MORRIS SHEPPARD.

Those of us who were privileged to know MORRIS SHEPPARD know that he walked uprightly, he worked righteousness, he spoke the truth that was in his heart. And through all his crusading against the things he believed evil, he never spoke ill of any man; nor ever did evil to any man, nor did he take up a reproach against any of his fellow men.

I have known few as gentle, as courageous, as kindly, and as unswerving in his fight against evil, as our friend, MORRIS SHEPPARD.

I had unbounded faith in him. I believed in his cause. The people of Kansas who made it possible for me to hold a seat in the Senate where I could aid him in his battles—believed in MORRIS SHEPPARD and they believed in his cause and believe in it now.

MORRIS SHEPPARD at the time of his death held a unique place in the Nation. He had represented the State of Texas in the Halls of Congress for 39 years—11 years in the House of Representatives, 28 years in the Senate of the United States. He was dean, and the well-beloved and highly respected dean, of the Congress of the United States.

At the age of 27 he was elected to the House to complete an unexpired term of his father, who had died in service, even as the son was to die in service 39 years later. In 1913 MORRIS SHEPPARD was elected to the Senate, taking his seat January 29, 1913, 6 years before I came to the Senate. It is not necessary that I recite his many and valuable services in the Senate, on Senate committees, on the floor of the Senate, among the councilors and leaders of the Nation.

But I am very proud to pay this little tribute today to the memory of this man whom I loved so much, and whose example and warm companionship, whose leadership in the cause of the right, whose unflagging devotion to duty, in little things as well as great things, was an inspiration to all of us.

Because MORRIS SHEPPARD meant—and still means, for the lives we live, live on after the spirit has left the dwelling of the body—I say that Senator SHEPPARD means much more than just a long record of service in the Congress of the United States.

He was a mild-mannered, courteous, industrious man of unflinching courage and dogged perseverance, with high ideals and the highest personal integrity. He had the respect of everyone who knew him and, so far as I know, the sincere liking of those who disagreed with his views, as well as those of us who generally were in agreement with him. It is said of MORRIS SHEPPARD, and I think truthfully, that he never was known to have said an unkind word or harbored an unkind thought toward or about any human being.

MORRIS SHEPPARD had convictions, and by those convictions he stood to the end, without regard to whether those convictions were popular or not. He was a gallant and unflinching crusader for the things in which he believed. His beliefs were so sincere, so vital, so earnestly and strongly held that he inspired confidence and respect among his fellow men.

Like myself and some others, Senator SHEPPARD believed in national prohibition. I honored him for sponsoring the eighteenth amendment—the national prohibition amendment. He fought for the amendment; he fought against its repeal; he fought hard, but there was no bitterness, no personal animosity, in either victory or defeat.

On the 16th of January every year since 1920, Senator SHEPPARD made a report to the Nation on the liquor problem. When the amendment was repealed he continued to make his annual report to the Senate and the Nation, though prohibition was not as popular as it once was. He never hauled down his flag nor admitted final defeat in his war on what he considered a wrongful and criminal thing—the liquor traffic.

I wish you could have been a listener in the Senate, as I was, when he made his annual report again this year, only a few short weeks before his death—his last attack on the iniquitous liquor traffic. I remember that speech. I believe the tide is turning again, and some of you may live to see the time when the faith that was in MORRIS SHEPPARD and was responsible for his refusal to accept final defeat, will have been justified.

This man, who refused to quit under fire, who refused to surrender his convictions and disdained to hide them, spoke out in the Senate for national prohibition in these words in his 1941 report to the Nation:

"Today I reaffirm the conviction I have often expressed concerning national prohibition, namely, that national prohibition is the most effective and practical way of protecting the American people, especially American youth, from the losses and tragedies of one of the principal social enemies of the Republic—beverage alcohol.

"While millions of our people struggled against privation, want, and misery," Senator SHEPPARD continued, "while America began to call forth its material resources to prepare against modern aggressors, and while American youth prepared to leave their homes and occupations to enter upon a period of preparation and training in defense of a civilization which they believed to be worth preserving, a golden stream of profits continued to pour into the coffers of the liquor industry as constantly as relegalized liquor poured incessantly out of its vats, its casks, its barrels, and its bottles to undermine and cripple the human resources of this Republic."

I am proud to have known MORRIS SHEPPARD. I am proud of a people and a civilization that has produced a MORRIS SHEPPARD. I am proud that he never faltered, never wavered, never retreated an inch in his support of the cause to which he gave allegiance.

As a Kansan and as a Senator I am glad to say that my State keeps up the fight against the evils of the liquor traffic that MORRIS SHEPPARD condemned so effectually till the day of his death.

Memorial Services for the Late Robert M. La Follette, Sr.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE, JR.

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, June 19 (legislative day of Tuesday, June 10), 1941

ADDRESS BY HON. D. WORTH CLARK OF IDAHO

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. CLARK] at the sixteenth annual memorial services for my father, the late Robert Marion La Follette, Sr., at Madison, Wis., June 15, 1941.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Trying times bring out the greatness in great men. Such a time is today, as America stands at the crossroads of her destiny. The world is aflame, and the noblest of all God's creations, the human mind, is so bewildered and confused as to make civilization itself waver on the very edge of destruction. Barbaric forces have been unloosed; and just when we were about to believe that man, after a struggle of countless eons, had reached the very pinnacle of civilization and culture and humanity, we were aghast to find that in many respects he has degenerated into the utmost depths of savagery.

Never, therefore, was there a more propitious moment when we, in the midst of our uncertainty and confusion, might well take pause to examine in grateful contemplation the words and deeds of those who have preceded us in meeting and conquering other crises which have occurred before. It is for that purpose that we are gathered here today, to bring, as it were, into our midst the spirit of one of the finest Americans who ever trod this continent, the soul of a brilliant scholar, the ghost of as gallant a fighter as ever lived on this earth—Robert Marion La Follette, Sr. It will well behoove us now, if we would gain insight into the problems which beset a sick world, to take silent counsel with the spirit of that noble man who so valiantly and well met the onslaught of the forces of evil in his day and generation.

Yes; these are turbulent times, in some respects monstrous times, and the world is "out of joint." So, also, was the year 1916. Then, too, America stood baffled at the forks of the future. In November of 1916, a momentous national election was held. Europe's perpetual volcano of war was once again roaring with unholy fire, and belching more lavishly than ever the molten lava of hate and destruction and death. The common people of America wanted none of this foreign holocaust, and the representatives of those people in the Congress of the United States and in high executive office knew this in their hearts. And so one and all, almost without regard to party, they went before their people asking election to high office, and pledged their sacred word, that if elected, they would never vote to take their beloved country into Europe's cesspool of war. In fact, the slogan of one great party was that it had "kept us out of war."

Here in the beautiful State of Wisconsin, amidst your lovely lakes and fertile farms, a segment of that fierce political battle was raging, and as a candidate for reelection to the Senate of the United States stood Robert Marion La Follette. Already a brilliant figure among his contemporaries, having served his State eminently and well in the Congress of the United States and in the Governor's chair, he was well known to the Wisconsin electorate. In his many struggles with entrenched greed in Wisconsin he had made bitter and powerful enemies, but, even so, his election by the common folk was assured. Nevertheless, with his characteristic courage and leadership, he, too, promised the voters of Wisconsin that as long as he was in the Senate of the United States he would never vote to feed the young bodies of the sons of American mothers into the hungry belly of Europe's immortal god of war. A great President in that year said likewise. The people of America went to the polling places, election was over, and the mothers and the fathers of our country settled back in peace and happiness, secure in the pledges of those whom they had elected, and which were so sacredly given.

Scarcely, however, had the music of election bands faded into an echo, hardly had the torches of election night burned out, when the war racketeers, the paid propagandists, began to ply their nefarious trade. Unmentionable millions were poured into the river of propaganda. Lecturers, authors, and college professors were bought and paid for at so much a head in order to impregnate the American heart and condition the American mind for war. The phrase makers, the slogan designers, began to tell the people of our Nation that they must send their boys across the sea to die, to die for something they called democracy. They said we must "fight a war to end wars," a war "to make the world safe for democracy." They said that England was "fighting our fight" and that her Navy was our "first line of defense." This, my friends, was in 1916, but, let me ask you, isn't there something strangely familiar about it all?

Well, it didn't take long. Money—deceit—propaganda—and in 5 short months a President who had promised in November to keep us out of war was before the Congress in April coolly asking for war itself. And so the Congress, in solemn assembly, undertook to debate whether or not the United States should declare a foreign war. Where were the election promises then? Where were the pledges of men of honor—statesmen, if you please—so weightily given and so prayerfully received by tearful mothers so short a while before? They were the "campaign oratory" of their generation.

Under the whip and lash of heavily subsidized propaganda, typhoons of emotion, and hurricanes of hysteria roared through the land. Gone was the spine of the Senate. Vanished was the fiber of the House. And the raging winds of intolerance and pressure broke like reeds those who had dared to call themselves men. Ah, not quite all. Through the storm one could discern a few—a very, very few—rugged, mighty oaks, towering among their lesser fellows, beaten by the tempests, shivered by the lightning, but standing gallantly. Among these giants was "Fighting Bob" La Follette. He had been well named "Fighting Bob." So far as he knew, the dictionary did not hold the word "retreat." He hated war. He knew what war was. All of his tumultuous life, as the champion of the common people whom he loved so dearly, he had fought predatory financial interests. He had fought special privilege. He had fought international financiers, all of whom had fastened their ugly tentacles upon the masses of the people.

He knew, perhaps better than anyone else of his day, that those same selfish groups which had exploited his people in time of peace were largely responsible for the generation of all wars, in order that they might coin more wealth out of young human lives. None knew better than he that war is a racket, a merciless, relentless racket, devised by racketeers, sometimes these same representatives of savage wealth whom he hated so much, and sometimes politicians masquerading as statesmen.

Yes, Bob La Follette knew war. He knew its causes. He knew its devastating effects. He saw it in its true light as the great destroyer, a destroyer of material wealth, of spiritual values, of human life, of all of the noble aims for which he had so fiercely fought, the destroyer of civilization itself. No pacifist, no appeaser, no coward he. Throughout his stormy career he knew not the command "Cease firing." His outstanding quality was courage, and when those of smaller stature wavered and cringed before the forces of wealth and greed and exploitation he stood firm. He had always known but one word, "Attack." And when these same forces generated hysteria he attacked hysteria. When these forces were finally able to generate war he attacked war, and attacked it with all of his might. Moreover, he had given his pledged word; that word meant something to Bob La Follette. His people had believed him at election time. His very life he would sacrifice to retain that belief.

And so as a quavering Congress plunged this country into the cataract of War, La Follette said "No," and in a masterly address made on the floor of the United States Senate he told the Senate and his country why. They laughed him to scorn, but his answer still was "No." He wearily went away, and his country went into a conflagration from which it has not recovered unto this day. La Follette was a lonely man.

Some of you who believe that the present European conflict is none of our affair, some of you who feel today that saving and perfecting democracy at home is infinitely more important than fighting a war abroad, some of you who believe that paid propaganda is again rampant, and that America's destiny lies in America, may be distressed when chattering war makers call you "appeasers," "fifth columnists," and other opprobrious things; but let me say to you good folk of Wisconsin, you have an inspiration to see you through your distress far beyond those who live in other States. You have the spirit of Bob La Follette, which electrifies the very atmosphere in which we stand today.

Consider what happened to him. After his vote against war, every elemental force of evil in this land of ours was unloosed against him. The savage dragon of prejudice, into whose slimy scales his own sword had so often been buried deep, raised its ugly head to strike him down. Even the powers of darkness skulked out from their hiding places to be in on the kill. It is almost unbelievable to realize today, even when we are up to our necks in the present wave of propaganda, to just what lengths intolerance went in Bob La Follette's time. Disorderly, howling mass meetings all over the United States demanded that the Senate expel him from its midst. So savage did men become that they danced in glee and exultation as he was hanged in effigy in every corner of our land. The public press was almost as a unit in maligning him. Men in high public places, men presumably of integrity and honor, slandered him unmercifully. It is said that many times streetcars and elevators would empty as he entered and was recognized.

Listen, listen to some of the calumnies. No less a man than Theodore Roosevelt himself labeled him a "cause for shame and humiliation for every worthy American." Such was the sweep of emotion that Gov. James Fox, of Ohio, insisted upon his "deportation to Germany." The Public Safety Committee of your neighboring Commonwealth of Minnesota said he was "disloyal and seditious." At numerous mass meetings he was called a "traitor" amidst great applause. The staid, old, conservative newspaper, the Boston Transcript, said that his name would go down in history "bracketed with that of Benedict Arnold." The New York Times said of him that he had a "German mind," and some bespectacled, cowardly editor in the New York World called him an "envious, pusillanimous wretch." The New York Herald said that he would "go down in history with Benedict Arnold."

All these things were bad enough, but the saddest act in the whole sordid tragedy was the treatment which was accorded him by some of his own people right here at the great University of Wisconsin, for which he had done so much. The public press owed him little except fair treatment. Irate mobs throughout the country were at that time only slightly familiar with his sterling character, but if there was one group in all this world which owed Bob La Follette everything, it was that group which composed the University of Wisconsin. La Follette was probably its most distinguished alumnus. When in school there, he brought national fame to his alma mater by his oratorical prowess throughout the Middle West. While Governor of Wisconsin, he had fostered the growth of the university to the point where it was probably the outstanding institution of learning in the United States. La Follette had defended publicly, and in the face of much opposition the right of its faculty to teach in the manner in which they saw fit, and when the freedom of the university to teach the truth was under attack and in jeopardy, he aided the board of regents to prepare and adopt the following resolution:

"Whatever may be the limitations which trammel inquiry elsewhere, we believe the great State of Wisconsin should ever encourage that continual and fearless sifting and winnowing by which alone the truth can be found."

Such was the service which Bob La Follette had rendered to a great institution; such was the honor he had brought to its glorious name.

And yet as the maelstrom of the war spirit began to whirl ever faster and faster, a majority of the faculty of the University of Wisconsin, acting as unreasoning, violent human animals rather than as rational men of intellect, signed a memorial to the public press and filed it with the Senate. In this memorial they charged La Follette with giving "aid and comfort to Germany and her allies." Not content with this, they also filed it as a public document with the Wisconsin State Historical Society. Also, at the same time the State Senate of Wisconsin passed a similar resolution.

What a travesty! What a mockery of all that was noble in mankind! I can picture in my mind's eye "Fighting Bob" as he received the news of what his university had done. Likely, it did not stir up his fighting qualities. Likely, it must have hurt him beyond all measure. It must have reminded him of Caesar when he looked into the faces of those who were about to assassinate him and there saw the countenance of his old friend for whom he had done so much. All he could say was, "Et tu, Brute!" And I think La Follette said it, too.

Well, for nearly 2 years the fearful persecution continued, and La Follette said many times that he did not hope to live to see the day when his position would be vindicated. He hoped only that his children might see it, but the implacable forces of justice struck swifter than he knew. The war ended, and after 4 years of horrible slaughter, after 4 years of ruthless shells tearing apart young flesh and bone, after 4 years of a civilization gone mad, the war ended. Then a weary and a haggard human race began to take stock of its losses and its gains.

Europe found herself bankrupt and bleeding, with tens of millions of her young lives snuffed out. The American soldiers who had been sent abroad only a little while before by the profiteers, exploiters, and swivel-chair patriots at home, began to return. They left behind them row on row of little white crosses to mingle with the poppies in Flanders Fields. They brought with them hundreds of thousands of their comrades crippled, maimed, and insane to fill new and hungry hospitals, where, as broken wrecks, many stay even unto now. Those same soldiers found upon their return a sick and disconsolate Nation. How La Follette must have brooded as he saw the boys come home. How his great heart must have pined for his people as he contemplated the billions and billions and billions of dollars wrenched from the farmers and the workers and the little businessmen of the country, so carelessly tossed away into Europe's age-old conflict. How he must have wondered how long that staggering burden would overhang the already weary shoulders of the American taxpayer, and unquestionably his prophetic eye saw that it would be for a long, long time to come. And so it has. The burden of 20 years ago still weighs us down heavily.

La Follette saw the peace, or what was called a peace. He saw the vultures of the Old World sit down at the peace table at Versailles. He saw them strip from their faces the bright mask of democracy. He saw them revealed to the world in their true form, a form he always knew existed, namely cruel, cunning politicians. He saw every semblance of "making the world safe for democracy," "fighting a war to end wars," vanish. He looked upon the final grab at the peace table by the victors, not for democracy, but for land, gold, trade, commerce, and unconscionable power for themselves. He watched an idealistic President go to Europe and try to obtain some consideration for his 14 points of peace. He watched this same President laughed at and ridiculed for his naivete by the tyrants of the Old World. He saw this President saddened and disconsolate as he began to realize that tens of thousands of American boys had died, not as he thought on the altar of freedom, not as he had hoped in the name of democracy, but on the bloody chopping block of European power politics. He watched Wilson return from Europe a sad man, and he watched his utter disillusionment break his spirit, ultimately his health, and drive him to his grave. Yes, La Follette saw war after the handiwork of the propagandists had been removed. He saw it when the glitter finally had fallen from its bony body. He saw it as he always knew it was—annihilation.

But that was not all. Gradually, the scales began to fall from the eyes of America. Coffins, graves, crippled, maimed, insane, hospitals, debt, break-down of moral values—these things were ruthless awakeners. Soon many of those who had been La Follette's chiefest critics began to slink and crawl away. Loans were made and not repaid. Honor among nations was held for naught. It was not long until the disillusionment of the American people turned to resentment against those who had cost them so much. It was only a little while until the great heart of America began to well up in admiration for Robert Marion La Follette and the pitifully small band around him who had had the courage to tell the people the truth. He grew again in stature and soon became one of his people's chiefest idols. The press, which had condemned him before, now lavishly showed him the highest praise. The Senate of the State of Wisconsin in hasty repentence expunged from its records the vicious resolution which it had passed condemning La Follette when the Senate did not know what war was, and he did. How a majority of the faculty of the university must have felt then. A resolution was introduced in the Senate to expunge from the records of the State Historical Society the memorial which I have heretofore referred to, wherein the university faculty had denounced him as giving aid to Germany. At this point comes an incident which I think gives a better insight into the true character of La Follette than any other thing that I know. As soon as he found out about the resolution, he wrote the author of it and requested that he withdraw it, and I want you to listen as I read to you a few paragraphs from his letter, and I now quote:

"It has come to my attention through the press that you have introduced a resolution in the Wisconsin State Senate which directs the curator of the historical library to transmit to the superintendent of public property for destruction a certain resolution signed by members of the University of Wisconsin faculty censuring me for my attitude during the recent war.

"I deeply appreciate the spirit which prompted you to introduce this resolution and the desire on your part to rectify, insofar as possible, what has seemed to you to be an unfair and libelous attack upon me.

"The signing and promulgation of that resolution by members of the faculty of the university of which I am an alumnus was a source of deep regret and disappointment. Many of them had been lifelong friends and associates. Before the experience of the war, I would not have believed that they could bring themselves to impugn my loyalty and devotion to the best interests of this country. However, the support and steadfastness of you and many others gave me great compensation, which was a source of strength to me in doing my duty to my State and my country as it was given me to see it.

"Time is the great sifter and winnower of truth. The formal destruction of that document cannot change the fact of its existence. I stated many times from the public platform in Wisconsin during the recent campaign that I would not exchange my record on the war with any man in the United States Senate. History alone can judge impartially. So far as I am personally concerned I am well content that this document shall remain as a physical evidence of the hysteria attendant upon the war.

"It seems to me that our energies should be devoted toward bringing our institutions back to the principles upon which they were founded, and which are the true source of our greatness.

"This applies with special significance to the university, and we can perform no greater service toward all our institutions than to see to it that the great University of Wisconsin ever continues that winnowing and sifting by which alone the truth can be found is made a reality and not a fiction."

A man wrote that. Deeply pained as he was by what his alma mater had done, sadly contemplating the injustice of it all, he would not allow the record to be changed. Even in this hour his passion for truth and accuracy led him to insist that history be recorded as it was written.

Soon the revolution was complete and Bob La Follette was not only the idol of his State, but one of the great figures on the American stage, respected, admired, and beloved by all.

Now, my Wisconsin friends, you may wonder why I have devoted so much time to this particular part of La Follette's life. I have done so because to my mind it is the most important part. I have done it because we face today conditions which constitute almost a deadly parallel with those which confronted him. I have done it because as we stand here near his grave I am sure his spirit would want it so. I have done it because once more the vultures of intolerance and prejudice are circling above us, ever ready to pounce down again with their unclean talons and devouring beaks. I have done it in the hope that we may all profit from it.

Now it would be sheer presumption on my part to attempt even to delineate the complete life of Bob La Follette to the people of Wisconsin. The life of La Follette was the life of Wisconsin until the day of his death, and those of you who knew and loved him, and even those who are too young to have known him are, I am quite sure, familiar with his accomplishments. Those of you in Dane County have oftentimes heard of how, as a graduate just out of the University of Wisconsin, he fought the party bosses, and by direct appeal to the people themselves became the prosecuting attorney of your county. You remember well his matchless record in that office. Almost legendary, I am sure, were his services in the House of Representatives, fighting always the people's battle, a man who would rather be right in the cause of the common people than live.

Some of you may recall him as your Governor, giving to the State of Wisconsin an administration which at that time constituted a model of progressive government toward which the eyes of the whole Nation looked for guidance. Then, when he had served you well there, you refused to release him from public service, but sent him to represent you in the greatest deliberative body on earth, the Senate of the United States. His record there belongs not to Wisconsin alone, but to the United States of America. He served there until he died in 1925.

I shall not attempt to analyze the reforms he brought about either as Congressman, Governor, or Senator. His life was too crowded, his accomplishments too many to do them even elemental justice in the time at my disposal this afternoon. He had only one master—the common people of Wisconsin, and later of the United States. In the service of those people he enlisted when he left the university, and only God released him from that service.

I have often thought, however, of several outstanding things characterizing his governorship. Let me mention them briefly.

First, he abolished the caucus and convention system in Wisconsin, and substituted therefore the direct primary where the people themselves could have expression. La Follette believed in a party system in the United States. He was not a despiser of parties as many would have you think, but he also was deeply convinced that a political party is the servant of the people and not its master. When, therefore, at the turn of the century he discerned that the party machinery in Wisconsin had fallen into the hands of all sorts of special privileges, and was controlled by political bosses, and dictated to by the vested interests of the State, and when he saw the party in Wisconsin no longer representing the people, but on the contrary dictating to them, he decided to hit that system, and hit it hard.

He knew corrupt party bosses usually function at their best in convention where they can sit in smoke-filled rooms, use money freely and back candidates who represent not the people, but only the own selfishness of the bosses themselves. So when he became Governor he abolished this system, and made the great State of Wisconsin an early leader in giving the people control of the party, and not the party control of the people. The result was the Wisconsin direct primary law, which has been a model for other States ever since.

Second, he abolished free transportation, special fees, rebates given as a bribe by the then all-powerful railroads to shippers. It is hard in this day and generation to realize the extent of the ruthlessness of big business as the twentieth century was being born. The railroads were flinging their mighty lines of steel across the country. Huge land grants had been given them by the Federal Government. They quickly obtained monopolies where with complete freedom from all regulation and supervision they bought and sold State and national officers at will, and in general robbed and pillaged the public in any unbelievably brutal way. They gave free transportation to favored shippers, and secret rebates were also a common practice. Of course, the farmers of Wisconsin and adjoining States paid the bill.

Governor La Follette's task in breaking this corrupt railroad ring was no easy one. Vast sums of money were spent to bring about his downfall. Calumny of all sorts was indulged in. But ultimately, and with the help of the common people of his State, he broke their strangle hold forever. He set up one of the first railroad commissions in the United States to see to it, in a measure at least, that fair practices only were engaged in. He compelled the railroads to pay their just share of the taxes of the State, which was one reason why he kept the treasury in splendidly solvent condition. He forced the railroads to abolish free transportation and secret rebates for shippers, and Wisconsin was a better State for his success.

Again, he had enacted a State civil-service law. He had seen how well the political bosses in the pay of predatory interests could control the employees of the State. He conceived it to be the duty of those who worked for the State to be able to give to the State a full measure of service, untrammeled by crookedness and corruption, and so once and for all, after another difficult fight, he placed those who gave their lives in the public service of the State of Wisconsin, in complete security and freedom from political oppression.

I could go on and relate many more of his accomplishments as Governor. Time, however, will not permit. Nearly all of the laws which were enacted under his administration were denounced as dangerously radical at the time. Today nearly every State in the Union has at last followed the course which he so valiantly then laid out. It is a tremendous tribute to his sagacity and almost prophetic vision that not a single law passed under his administration has ever been held unconstitutional by our highest tribunal, the Supreme Court of the United States. In social and progressive legislation he made Wisconsin a shining pattern for the entire Union. Is it any wonder Wisconsin loved him?

His record in the Senate was, of course, a brilliant one. He sought to do there on behalf of the United States what he had so successfully done in Wisconsin. He was one of the first men in public life to place the value of human beings above that of material wealth. Always he devoted his untiring energy to right the wrongs of oppressed people, and this was so whether the oppression came from the business trusts and monopolies of his day or from corrupt government. There is a well-defined body of progressive Federal legislation sponsored by Senator La Follette designed to remedy the intolerable industrial conditions which he found on entering the Senate in 1906. There was the Hours of Service Act, making it unlawful for any common carrier to permit any employees to remain on duty for a period of more than 16 consecutive hours. The purpose of the act was, of course, to promote safety in the operation of trains, and also to promote better working hours for labor, which was also close to his heart. The railroads again strenuously opposed this measure, but "Fighting Bob" beat them, and his law was upheld by the Supreme Court.

Then there was the Employees' Liability Act, which relieved from employees of railroads who were injured in interstate commerce the necessity of complying with the stringent regulations of proving negligence on the part of the carrier, and also relaxing other rules relative to contributory negligence. Again, there was the Railroad Valuation Act, and finally the famous Seamen's Act. Up to that time seamen were practically slaves. They did not have a single right under the Constitution as were accorded other citizens. The nature of their occupation prevented them from maintaining effective unions. They were a hopeless class of Bob La Follette's common people. I shall not go into the details of this constructive piece of legislation now. Suffice it to say that it made the seamen of our country once again free men.

I could go on further with the legislative reforms, but they are too many. Not only was he constantly pressing for positive progressive legislation, but he was ever ready to take the floor of the Senate in defense of human rights. He, together with Senator Borah, of my own State, Senator NORRIS, of Nebraska, and others, formed the nucleus of a liberal bloc in the Senate which was largely responsible for most of the reforms that have occurred in national legislation in the past 25 years. His services in Washington made America a better place for its people.

Now, it may or may not be appropriate here, but I simply cannot let this occasion pass without saying to you, briefly, that the elder La Follette's work did not perish with him. On the contrary, his progressive liberalism, his matchless courage, his love for the common people, his devotion to his State, and his rare discernment have been perpetuated ever since his death in the persons of his two outstanding sons, BOB LA FOLLETTE, JR., and Phil La Follette. Neither of them has read this address, and I am sure that both will censure me for even mentioning their names. Nevertheless, I think that Robert Marion La Follette, Sr., would wish it so, and again as we meet near his grave, it is a magnificent source of satisfaction, not only to the people of Wisconsin, but to the whole of America, to know that the progressive, liberal, courageous program which he so valiantly commenced is now being so nobly carried on. BOB and Phil, may you ever in the future, as you have so brilliantly in the past, be worthy of his great name.

In conclusion, may I again remind you that America faces today a crisis even more fearful than that which confronted her in 1916. Another war, generated by the tyrants of the Old World, is again consuming Europe. The pattern of this war does not differ from that of the previous one. It is the same war in a new dress. The same propagandists which La Follette had to face in 1917 are again fastening their talons upon the throat of America. Once more the slogan-makers are busy and again huge sums of money are being spent to soften the fiber and condition the minds of the common people for war. The phrases "fighting for democracy," and "for the freedom of small peoples" again din our ears. Powerful influences are at work to plunge America into a conflict which may not only fail to save democracy abroad, but will surely destroy it at home. We have gone a long way in that direction now. Only the final, fatal, disastrous step remains to be taken. The same financial interests are at work, interests who have more investments abroad than they do here at home; interests who "where their treasure lies, there their heart is also."

Let us pray to God that the lessons of 20 years ago have not been forgotten so soon. Oh, that the spirit of Robert La Follette could be brought back from the grave. Oh, that it could point once more the accusing finger at those who would destroy our land. Oh, that the majestic statue of him which now graces the Hall of Fame, the gift of the admiring people of Wisconsin to the doubly grateful people of the United States, could come to life and speak to us now in the hour of our need. I was looking at that statue just before I left Washington. All of the power, all of the dynamic energy of La Follette is there. It almost seemed to me that it was about to spring not only into life but into swift action. But it cannot. Each of us will have to fight alone today as Bob La Follette fought alone before. We can, however, take courage from his example, and when their slander and calumny are heaped on us as it was on him, let us gather solace and courage from those lines of Henley's which La Follette quotes in his autobiography, and which he states always inspired him and gave him hope during his severest trials:

"Out of the night that covers me,
Black as the pit from pole to pole,
I thank whatever gods there be
For my unconquerable soul.

"In the fell clutch of circumstance
I have not winced nor cried aloud;
Under the bludgeoning of chance,
My head is bloody but unbowed.

"It matters not how strait the gate,
How charged with punishment the scroll,
I am the master of my fate,
I am the captain of my soul."

Annual Celebration of Bunker Hill Day

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HARRY FLOOD BYRD

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, June 19 (legislative day of Tuesday, June 10), 1941

ADDRESS OF HON. ALBERT B. CHANDLER, OF KENTUCKY

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a most eloquent address made by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CHANDLER] in the armory at Boston, Mass., on June 16, 1941, on the occasion of the annual celebration of Bunker Hill Day.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Chairman and my fellow countrymen, I am grateful to you for the invitation which permits me after an absence of 20 years to return to Boston. It is good to be here again where as a youngster in college I pursued courses of study at Harvard University, coached football at the high school in the village of Wellesley, courted at Wellesley and Radcliffe, and followed the usual course and pattern of a young American who had come from the South in search of knowledge in the years immediately following the last World War. I realize that in speaking to you on the anniversary of the Battle of Bunker

Hill I follow in the footsteps of illustrious fellow countrymen of ours who in years past have journeyed to Boston to review with you the exploits of our noble heroes of the past and to keep alive in memory's garden their deeds of valor.

I reaffirm the purposes expressed by Daniel Webster, who first delivered the Bunker Hill oration on the 21st day of June 1825, on the occasion of the laying of the cornerstone for the Bunker Hill Monument, and I quote: "We are among the sepulchres of our fathers. We are on ground distinguished by their valor, their constancy, and the shedding of their blood. We are here, not to fix an uncertain date in our annals, nor to draw into notice an obscure and unknown spot." We are here today, as we have been in each succeeding year since the date of this historical battle, June 17, 1775, because we are Americans and because we are anxious to remind ourselves of all the struggles which our forbears have encountered in order that we may be able to pass in peace that portion of our existence which God allows to men on this earth.

I am proud and happy to walk momentarily in the footsteps of these great citizens of the past and to bask temporarily in the sunlight of the glory they reflect. Thousands of people gathered in Charlestown on the 17th day of June 1825. General Lafayette, then on a triumphant tour of the States, was present and assisted in the ceremonies. Fifty years had passed since the Battle of Bunker Hill had been fought, but there was a sense of nearness and reality which that half century had not been able to erase from the minds of even the younger generation of that day. The fathers and grandfathers of most of them had borne arms in the Revolution, and there were present upon the occasion 40 veteran survivors with their marks of battle visible upon them. I subscribe again and again to another declaration made by Webster in that first Bunker Hill speech, and I quote: "We cherish every memorial of these worthy ancestors; we celebrate their patience and fortitude; we admire their daring enterprise; we teach our children to venerate their piety; and we are justly proud of being descended from men who have set the world an example of founding civil institutions on the great and united principles of human freedom and human knowledge. To us, their children, the story of their labors and sufferings can never be without its interest. We shall not stand unmoved on the shore of Plymouth while the sea continues to wash it." And so tonight, I am privileged to speak for the new generation, mindful of the fact that there flits before you the spirit of Prescott, Putnam, Stark, Brooks, Read, Pomeroy, and Bridge, all of whom live in the grateful memory of their countrymen as a shining example of those who preferred death to slavery.

When John Adams presented his letters of credence as Minister to London in 1786, George III, the then King of England, said he was pleased to receive a Minister who had no prejudices in favor of France. To which Adams replied: "I have no prejudices except those in favor of my native land." I hope sincerely that any judgment that is passed upon the remarks that I make upon this occasion will be judged by that standard, because I am indeed an American first, last, and all the time.

Today, 166 years after the Battle of Bunker Hill, we are in the midst of a world revolution. From Narvik to Japan there is no peaceful life. Life, itself, is threatened and security is not at all certain. Because of one man, millions are homeless and countless thousands are dead. A strange paradox, indeed, that in a civilized world only savages remain content. The natives of Africa, the headhunters of Malaya, and the Australian aborigines appear to be carrying on life as usual. In America alone there remains, precariously balanced on the outcome of battles now in progress, the hope of the world for ultimate security. For more than 2,000 years man has fought to raise himself above his geological heredity. All of the years of struggle seem to have led him back to where he began. The concepts of liberty and of freedom, as we have always known them, since the days of Washington and Webster, are based upon faith and justice. Centuries were required to build up this faith among peoples and nations. Creeds were established, based on Roman Law, English Common Law, and the Code of Napoleon. The scales of justice came from Egypt, the modern concept of right and wrong from the Ten Commandments of Moses, and the rights of man from the Magna Carta.

Today the world is threatened by a single man, bent on subduing it. There is no voice in Europe now except his voice. There are millions of people silenced and enslaved, with their cities and towns destroyed, and their populations threatened with starvation. As my friend Stuart Cloetes has said in his revealing book, Yesterday Is Dead, "It seems the dream of yesterday is dead, today is the awakening." It seems absolutely necessary that this tyrant be stopped if order is to return to the world in our time and generation. Every generation must pay in its own turn its own obligations to its own generation. We must live realistically. We must realize that life is real and earnest. We must remember that life is not merely a heritage to be enjoyed, but that it is in every sense an obligation that must be fulfilled. I wish devoutly, as do all fathers and mothers, that I could pay the obligations of my children to their own generation, suffer their pains, stand their reverses, and save them from much of the misery that they must in reality suffer for themselves. But that would not be best, because that would soften them and their successors might prove useless to the country, indeed. The freedom which we enjoy in such abundance today, was gained for us through the grace of God, by our country's heroes from Bunker Hill to the present hour.

Today we are rearming the country hurriedly to meet possible or threatened attacks from world aggressors. We have voted and are voting large sums of money for these armaments. We need a national solidarity and a national unity of all classes, all religions, and all ages at the cost of comfort and at the cost of sacrifice of possessions and property, and maybe of life itself. There should be no division among us. We should, in my opinion, earnestly support the President of the United States in his efforts to prepare adequately the defenses of this country; make these defenses so strong that they will be able to meet any eventuality. I regret any statement made by public men at any time which seeks to create the impression in the minds of the people that the President desires to take the country into war. This I do not believe. Neither do I approve of those fellow citizens of ours who have undertaken to create in the public mind of the country a war hysteria, as I would be wholly unwilling to carry upon my conscience in the years that are left to me the feeling that I had encouraged the men and women of my country to go to war. If war comes again to our beloved country—and God grant that it will not—we should enter it solemnly with the feeling that it is necessary in order to more adequately protect the lives and security of the people of America. At 18 years of age I am proud to say that I was a private in my country's Army. As a captain in the Reserve Corps of the Army of the United States subject to call by the President I speak as one who would not urge one of your sons to sacrifice himself in a war for any purpose except in the defense of his country. History repeats itself. In every crisis in the history of our country we have somehow, under God's providence, been able to raise up men who stood firm in the crisis and who were able with His help and with the energies of other men to work out the salvation of the country.

In March 1916 talk of preparedness in the country vied with pleas of pacifists in an apprehensive Nation. Young men were leaving their homes and labor for training camps. German periscopes were arising in the Atlantic to menace American export trade. Critics of the Wilson administration, just as those of the Roosevelt administration today, were branding their President as a warmonger. A Congressman from Virginia took the floor of the House of Representatives and spoke in defense of the President of the United States. He spoke with caution and courage, with frankness and firmness that commanded not only the respect of the President and the people of his own country, but also the respect of foreign nations. He said the President had for 18 months applied himself to the task of preserving peace without impairing the honor of the Republic. In his summation he delivered one of the most eloquent pleas ever heard in the Congress of the United States, and I quote: "Every one of us in authority here is for peace. The whole Congress is for peace. The President of the United States for many months, by night and day, has kept a vigil for peace. With enduring patience, with amazing skill, oblivious to all things else, he has passionately sought, by every conceivable means, to keep this country out of the maelstrom of war. Neither taunt nor threat has shaken his purpose or diverted him from his course. But there are some things better than life, as there are other things worse than death. The human body, bereft of the soul which reveals the image of God, is but a whitened sepulcher; and so a nation with its righteous spirit quenched is as a tossing derelict of the sea * * *." Finally he lashed out at the propaganda of the pacifists, and I do not express the word "pacifist" in any sense of derision, because our Lord has said "Blessed are the peacemakers for they shall inherit the earth," but the Congressman continued: "Like unto the proposal to discredit the Nation is the pathetic, perfervid talk about desolating American homes and distressing American mothers by sacrificing their sons to the god of war. The nearest approach to war which this country has recently made was when Members of Congress sought to impede the President's plans for maintaining an honorable peace. The surest prelude to intolerable affront from one direction is the manifestation of a cowardly submission from the other; and unless it be conceived that no injury, however great, no insult, however grievous, could provoke this Nation to resentment, the course proposed by meddling resolutions is most certain to invite aggression and ultimately to precipitate war. And there are some things worse than war. Virginia has homes which might be desolated and mothers who might be distressed and sons who might be sacrificed. But I pray God that the mothers and sons of Virginia who live appreciate their heritage from those who 'being dead, yet speaketh.' Two of Virginia's boys are my own—stalwart, manly fellows, for either of whom I would die a thousand times—and I would have them hear me say, without a tremor, in the spirit which I hope animates their hearts, that I would rather be pursued through time and eternity by the pitiful apparition of their shattered forms than to see my country dishonored and its flag hauled down in disgrace." These words were spoken by Senator CARTER GLASS, of Virginia, while a Member of the House of Representatives. They are as true today as they were yesterday. What will tomorrow bring? The survival of England keeps actual warfare at least an ocean's width away from our beloved country

The Naval Affairs Committee of the Senate of the United States, of which your distinguished citizen is chairman, recently filed the following report: "From all the evidence available it appears that the United States can be conquered without military conquest of continental United States. An effective blockade against our foreign commerce can be maintained at points thousands of miles from our coasts and well beyond aircraft range. Our outlying possessions will be captured and used against us as advance bases. There will be nothing to prevent the establishment of bases, by force if necessary, in this hemisphere, from which as well as from aircraft carriers repeated bombing raids can be dispatched against our highly industrialized areas. Under such conditions enemy ships, except in the form of raiders, need not approach anywhere near our shores. With the loss of our outlying possessions, our foreign commerce, and subject to continual raids upon our coastal areas, our ultimate defeat is inevitable. It will be only a question of time, depending on how long our national will to further resist will hold out. Without the power to carry the fight to the enemy, there can be no alternative other than subjugation to his wishes."

America would be subjected, in my opinion, to frequent raids from land, sea, and air, and our country, which has always been free, would become a military Nation.

The burden of armaments in the years ahead might conceivably be heavier than our people can bear. It is a frightful prospect to contemplate that we might become a beseiged fortress, spending our time fighting off bombing raids on the cities and towns and upon the civilized population of our country. We devoutly wish, hope, and pray for peace and for security of our sons and daughters. We must be prepared to make sacrifice. We must be prepared to suffer hardships, to get along with less. We must sacrifice sweat now in the urgent race for thorough and total preparedness. Tomorrow may be too late! It has been too late in so many of the small countries of Europe. We must make every sacrifice in order to avoid the sacrifice of blood and tears which may come later. There are those who urge us to negotiate for peace—negotiate with whom, may I inquire? The German military dictator has broken his word to every country with whom he has dealt. I do not believe that this country can afford to deal with one who does not keep his word. As long as our Republic is free, as long as men and women can assemble together in the schools and churches of the country, and as long as we can produce freemen with integrity, vision, and courage, our Republic is safe. This beloved country of ours is a fairly decent place in which to live. It will be in the years ahead what we are willing to help make it, despite those who seek to destroy it. Thank God there are in America still things worth living for and things worth dying for, if necessary. We are what we are because of the struggles and sacrifices of the loyal men and women of all creeds, races, and colors from all sections of this country.

"Here's to the boys of the windswept North
When they meet on the fields of France,
May the spirit of Grant be with them all
As the sons of the North advance.

"Here's to the boys of the sunkissed South
When they meet on the fields of France,
May the spirit of Lee be with them all
As the sons of the South advance.

"Here's to the boys of both North and South
When they meet on the fields of France,
May the spirit of God be with them all
As the sons of the Flag advance."

I close with a toast to the Flag of the United States, written by my good friend John J. Daly, a well known Washington newspaper man, first published in Boston just after America's entrance into the last World War:

"Here's to the red of it,
There's not a thread of it,
No, not a shred of it,
In all the spread of it,
From foot to head,
But heroes bled for it,
Faced steel and lead for it,
Precious blood shed for it,
Bathing in red.

"Here's to the white of it,
Thrilled by the sight of it,
Who knows the right of it,
But feels the might of it,
Through day and night?
Womanhood's care for it,
Made manhood dare for it;
Purity's prayer for it
Keeps it so white.

"Here's to the blue of it,
Beauteous view of it,
Heavenly hue of it,
Star-spangled dew of it,
Constant and true;
Diadems gleam for it,
States stand supreme for it,
Liberty's beam for it
Brightens the blue.

"Here's to the whole of it,
Stars, stripes, and goal of it,
Body and soul of it,
O' and the roll of it,
Sun shining through;
Hearts in accord for it,
Swear by the sword for it,
Thanking the Lord for it,
Red, White and Blue."

There is a Destiny that holds the lives of all of us in the hollow of His hand. Let us all heartily resolve again on this sacred ground, with the memory of the exploits and the deeds of the hero of Bunker Hill fresh again in our minds, that with God's help we will keep our rendezvous with Destiny and pay fully our own obligations to our own generation.

The Late Representative Pius L. Schwert

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES M. MEAD

OF NEW YORK

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, June 19 (legislative day of Tuesday, June 10), 1941

STATEMENT OF HON. JAMES M. MEAD, OF NEW YORK

Mr. MEAD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement made by me on the life and services of the late Representative Pius L. Schwert. I should like to have this statement called to the attention of the House Committee on Memorials and the Joint Committee on Printing.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The tragic weight of a profound personal sorrow makes it impossible for me to speak appropriately of the late PIUS L. SCHWERT. He was my neighbor, my ally, my colleague, and my true friend. I became associated with him many years ago, and that association developed into a bond of comradeship which can never be completely broken so long as I live.

We played baseball together, we attended social affairs together, we dealt with civic problems together, we conducted political campaigns together, we dwelt together. Those kinds of ties make parting almost unendurable.

PIUS L. SCHWERT succeeded me as Representative in Congress from the Forty-second District of the State of New York. Last November he was reelected to that post of honor and responsibility. Prior to his service as a Member of Congress he made an outstanding record in the important elective office of county clerk of the county of Erie. PI SCHWERT made friends wherever he went, among all classes, races, creeds, and political parties. He despised bigotry, indolence, and selfish partisanship. He possessed a rare and enviable philosophy which enabled him to see only good in his fellow man and which constantly compelled him to greater and greater public service.

PI, sterling athlete as he was, knew the rule of fair play, and the thousands who knew and loved him attest to the fact that he never deviated from that cardinal rule which motivated his every word and action.

He served his country in the naval service, he served his community in numerous responsible official and unofficial capacities, and he served in this Congress with everlasting credit to his name and to his memory.

I cannot recount his tragic death. It came with a suddenness that was merciful to him but unspeakably shocking to his scores of friends who were with him at the time.

But I only know that I have lost one of the most genuine friends that any man could ever have. His devotion to family and to friends, his allegiance to duty, his belief in truth and justice, marked him not only as an exemplary citizen, but as a man wealthy in spiritual qualities.

It is with a profound sense of futility that I endeavor to pay tribute to his memory. I can only join thousands of others, who held for him the highest esteem and regard, in calling him a true American, a great man, and one whose loss it is difficult for his friends, his community, and his Nation to sustain.

Our sympathies go forth to his kindly, genteel, and courageous widow, and to those others who were close and dear to him through family bonds. His was a noble character, a lovable disposition, a just and conscientious mind. He worked too hard, he assumed too many responsibilities, he overtaxed his great reservoir of physical energy. He was youthful in spirit and in years, but the burdens he carried were too heavy. He gave his life for his country and in the service of his friends. No greater tribute can be paid to any man. He served his God and his Republic faithfully. No greater loyalty has any man.

Flag Day Address by Senator Wiley

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALEXANDER WILEY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, June 19 (legislative day of Tuesday, June 10), 1941

ADDRESS OF HON. ALEXANDER WILEY, OF WISCONSIN

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered by me on Flag Day, June 14, 1941, at La Crosse, Wis., under the auspices of the Elks' Lodge.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Brother Norman Schultz, Exalted Ruler of La Crosse Elks, my friends, and brother Elks, it is always an honor to speak on the subject of the Nation's flag. It is a particular honor to speak on that subject under the auspices of a group whose reverence for the flag is so outstanding and whose Flag Day ceremonies are so inspiring.

In every one of the 1,500 Elks lodges throughout the Nation commemorative ceremonies are held in June in honor of the flag. In so honoring the flag you honor Elkdom itself, where every member has sworn allegiance to the flag which drapes your altar.

Your organization, by its research throughout the years, has become so well informed on flag history that it is almost presumptuous for me to attempt to discuss that history here today.

We are interested in that history, however, not as a collection of facts, but because it sheds light on the significance of our flag and what it symbolizes.

We know that late in 1775 there was a committee appointed by the Continental Congress to consider the question of a single flag for the Thirteen Colonies. We know that a flag design known as the "Grand Union Flag" was recommended, and that John Paul Jones hoisted this flag on his masthead early in December of 1775, and we know moreover that it was hoisted over the headquarters of General George Washington at Cambridge, Mass.

Because the flag did not have a completely American identity, there was a general demand for a new design.

On June 14, 1777 the Congress provided: "That the flag of the United States be 13 stripes of alternating red and white, and that the union be 13 stars, white, on a blue field, representing a new constellation."

We do not know whether the Philadelphia Quakeress, Betsy Ross, actually made the first flag at her upholstery shop on Arch Street in Philadelphia, but we do know, however, that there was a home-made flag which flew over Fort Schuyler, N. Y., on August 3, 1777, when the fort was attacked by the British and the Indians.

That was probably the first time that the United States flag—as we first knew it—was fired upon.

That flag was made from strips of white torn from the soldiers' shirts, from a red petticoat belonging to the wife of one of the soldiers, and from a blue cloth coat belonging to one of the officers.

Every school child knows that the original 13 stars and 13 stripes represented the Thirteen Original Colonies. Throughout the years, of course, the flag was enlarged and altered in design.

Today we meet to commemorate the first authorization by Congress on June 14, 1777 of Old Glory. Our flag is the third oldest of all of the national standards of the world, and it has a long and honorable history.

We are today less concerned with the past history than the future, and yet we can interpret the future only in the light of what that flag has symbolized in the past.

As Henry Ward Beecher said, "Accept it, then, in all its fullness of meaning. It is not a painted rag. It is a whole national history. It is the Constitution. It is the Government. It is the free people that stand in the Government on the Constitution. Forget not what it means; and for the sake of its ideals, be true to your country's flag." (Flag story—teacher.)

It was just 164 years ago today that Congress met in Independence Hall in Philadelphia to pass a resolution that Capt. John Paul Jones was to be appointed to command the ship Ranger. That was the same day that Congress made provision for a flag of the United States. All of us remember John Paul Jones' famous cry:

"That flag and I are twins, born the same day and the same hour. We cannot be parted in life or in death. So long as we can float, we shall float together; if we must sink, we shall go down as one."

When John Paul Jones raised that flag with his own hands on the staff of the Ranger there were 13 States and 3,000,000 people. Today our State of Wisconsin alone has a larger population than the entire country had at that time.

Stretching across the span of 164 years, however, the convictions, the ideals, the hopes of 131,000,000 people are one with those of the little group who met in Philadelphia at Independence Hall on June 14, 1777.

The flag has been altered in design but the convictions, the ideals, and the hopes it represented then are the same today.

This is the same flag that fluttered over the ragged armies of George Washington when they marched into Yorktown. It is the same flag that was carried through the ice floes of the Delaware and on into Trenton.

It is the same flag that flew at Bunker Hill; that flew at Ticonderoga; that Perry carried at Lake Erie; that flew over Lawrence as he died on the deck of the Chesapeake.

It is the flag that flew over the Alamo; that was flown at the Little Big Horn with Custer. It is the flag that stormed the heights of Chapultepec.

This is the flag that was with Zachary Taylor at Buena Vista, with Dewey at Manila Bay, with Jackson at New Orleans, with the Rough Riders at San Juan Hill; that marched with our boys at Chateau Thierry and in the battle of the Argonne, when the Nation ventured forth to make the world safe for democracy. It is the flag that Byrd placed at the South Pole and Admiral Perry placed at the North Pole.

For more than a century and a half this flag has represented the highest ideals of a great nation and a great people who want to live at peace with all the world.

When I left Washington a few days ago I saw in my last glimpse of Washington as the train moved out of the city the Nation's flag waving over the Nation's Capitol.

It is the same flag that drapes your altar today. It is the same flag that has flown all over our land. What is impressive about this fact is that wherever our flag is displayed throughout the land it represents one people, one nation, indivisible.

When that flag was adopted by Congress there were 13 distinct Colonies fighting the mother country. They had one objective and that objective was liberty.

This flag was its symbol and it welded those Thirteen Colonies into a unified confederation.

It is my fervent belief that in these grave days our flag symbolizes the unity of our people, a unity which may differ on policies but which is eternally the same on ideals.

Our first task then today is to forge in the American consciousness a realization of what our flag symbolizes. Groups such as this one make a great contribution when they focus the attention of the American people on the deep significance of our flag—yes, the real meaning of that flag. (Fond du Lac incident.)

We are too prone to accept our flag and what it symbolizes as the free birthright of every American. It is such a birthright, but it is imperative for us to realize that it is not ours alone, that it belongs also to generations yet unborn, that it is ours to cherish as trustees and to pass on to future generations unsullied and unmarred, as the symbol of a great, free people. (Freedom is a word to conjure with in this period; we alone of the peoples of the earth possess it.)

That is why it is vital for us to realize what it symbolizes as it flies across the Continent of 48 States and over 131,000,000 people who give it allegiance.

The American flag symbolizes so much that can be found only in the hearts and minds of men that it again seems presumptuous for me to attempt to reduce its ideals to words.

My poor evaluation can add little to the glory of our flag, and my words of explanation are no more eloquent than the simple but unspoken understanding which may throb in the heart of a farm boy or a tenement-bred urchin who may never have read of the history of his flag.

It is with deep humility that I consider the significance of our flag as a symbol.

It is a symbol of our ideals, of our progress, of our liberties, of our happiness, of our free-born American initiative, of our hopes, our ambitions, our history, our prayers, our inspiration, our patriotism, our truth, our heroes.

It is the living emblem of our freedom, of our sacrifices, of our fortitude, of our reverence, of our equality, of our independence, of our sovereignty, of our principles, of our righteousness, our justice, our honor, our sincerity—and certainly of our destiny.

It is a symbol of a new breed of men called The American. We stem from many blood streams, but we are a new race, a peculiar people, free of the prejudices, hatreds, and limitations of other people. Under Heaven we are Americans. There is no hyphen there.

It is not enough for us today to pay homage to that flag. Ours must be, as it has always been, more than a lip service. Ours must be an homage expressed in our every thought, word, and deed. Yes, our job must be, in this hour of the world's travail, a dedication to that flag, a dedication and a consecration of all we are or hope to be.

We do not need to be in the uniform of our country to live the allegiance, the loyalty, the obligations we owe that flag of ours. Part of the story of the American flag has been written by soldiers in blood on the snows of Valley Forge and a thousand battlefields, but another part of the story has been written in the sweat of men who carved a Nation from the forests, and in the tears of women who left their bones to bleach white on the alkaline sands. Still another part of the story of the American flag has been written in the dreams and hopes of every immigrant who came to these shores.

The story of America's flag is written not only in the battles for independence, not only in the battles for the freedom of the seas, not only in the battles to vindicate our sovereignty, not only in the battles against tyranny.

It is written also in the steel rails which span the Nation, in the great forests which fell before the advance of the frontiersman. It is written in factories, in great skyscrapers, and in humble homes, in sweat and tears and struggle, in hope and prayers and living, in joy and laughter, in epic lives and simple lives.

It is written wherever our citizens have had great ideals, wherever they have had great convictions, wherever they have sacrificed for a worthy cause. It is all there in that flag.

The American flag is a symbol of peace. Here in our land we are one people with one government. We do not police our State borders. We do not police men's minds, or men's hearts, or men's thoughts. The freedom of the open spaces, sky and sea is ours. No tyrant soul possesses us.

We who live under the flag believe in inspiring allegiance, not by hatred, fear, and oppression, but by the common bond of tolerance, love, and service.

Today the world is on fire, and we owe an obligation to our Nation, to the flag, to the family circle, and to our love of God to keep that fire from our shores. Therefore we must prepare for any eventuality.

It is our sacred obligation that our Nation shall not be filled with hatred and intolerance. We must always be unified. It is our obligation that whatever cause we undertake must be undertaken because of the high calling of lofty ideals.

We must not embark upon any course because of lust or hatred or emotion. We must not embark upon any course of tyranny or conquest.

Our land must remain a haven and a refuge for the oppressed. There must never be a period of witch burning in the United States. There must never be oppression in this land.

There must never be an indifference in this country to our problems, whether they be economic, military, or ideological. There must be a consciousness of our problems and a willingness to make sacrifices to meet those problems. Believing we have a great treasure here, we must throw a shield of protection around it so that no saboteur, fifth columnist, or foreign "ism" shall find lodgment here.

There must be a reaffirmation of our spiritual obligation. There must be a continual prayer in our hearts to the Creator for guidance and the continuance of His goodness and mercy. There must be a perpetual desire in our hearts to prove worthy of this goodness and mercy.

In our individual lives and in our Government, we must stand for moral integrity and truth. We must continually strive for domestic tranquillity, for freedom and equal opportunity for every man.

We must continually strive for domestic peace. We must live for the blessings of human liberty and American resourcefulness and initiative.

We must continually bulwark our faith against the snares and delusions of totalitarian systems. We must continually strive for a nation of laws rather than a nation of edicts.

In a drab, disillusioned world (but in a world in which we can live gloriously, as Americans) we must continue an orderly march with all the fervor of our belief toward a dynamic and growing democracy, to live in honor, to keep our aspirations and our ideals high, and to forge toward a high destiny with a prayer in our hearts that the God of our fathers will continue to guide and guard us.

This is no time to hide behind the flag. It's a time to support what it stands for.

Oh, my fellow citizens, ours is a tryst with destiny. Tired, worn humanity is looking to us to keep the torch of reason, of tolerance, of Christianity, of liberty, alive, so that when this holocaust is over, poor benighted mankind can find its way back to the light, such as we possess under this flag. May we, under God and our flag, prove equal and worthy of this great cause.

Has England Taken the United States Without Firing a Shot?

REMARKS

OF

HON. MARTIN L. SWEENEY

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 19, 1941

Mr. SWEENEY. Mr. Speaker, a group of businessmen in my district, willing to put up capital to help our national defense, came to Washington to secure priority on steel and power from the Boulder Dam. They were to engage in the business of extracting magnesium from certain deposits in Nevada. They asked for no money from the Government. They were finally turned over to John C. Jones, an Englishman, not a citizen of the United States, employed in the O. P. M. He told these men they could not secure the power or the priority. How do you like that—an alien telling our citizens what they can or cannot do.

Now, this Englishman, Jones, is not a citizen of the United States—therefore he cannot take an oath of office. He is getting his per diem from the United States Government. In due time, Mr. Speaker, I shall demand a thorough investigation. It looks to me as if the British have taken over the United States without firing a shot.

Mr. Speaker, these reputable Cleveland businessmen to whom I refer have a process to extract magnesium, a metal that is rare and vitally necessary to national defense. My information is that because they refused to disclose this formula to the English technical adviser, Mr. Jones, who is employed in the aluminum section of the O. P. M., they were refused a certificate of convenience and necessity to secure power from Boulder Dam to go into production.

Boulder Dam is a project built by the taxpayers of America, and I vigorously object to any alien, no matter who he is, making final decisions on the question of the power that we taxpayers of America helped to create. The suspicion is prevalent among many Members of Congress that British capital and in many cases money furnished by the United States Government to British capital seeks to control the production of aluminum and magnesium in this country.

To me it seems to be dangerous, to say the least, for the Government to permit employment of aliens who however sincere they may be, would be inclined to discriminate in favor of their own nationals against citizens of this country.

The information furnished me on this British subject, Mr. Jones, is that he was employed as a metallurgist in the British Aluminum Co., Ltd., Warrington, England, and also consulting metallurgist, Arthur Seligman and Co., Ltd., New York City.

I make no complaint about the British Purchasing Commission, who are employing hundreds of their nationals here in Washington, so long as they are paid by the British Government, but I strenuously object to any agency of our Government delegating final authority to an alien to dictate to American businessmen. Just as the precious metal of magnesium shines, equally does this disclosure, in my opinion, stink.

How long will the Congress supinely submit to the influence of our British plotters, whom we saved from destruction in the last World War and made possible their continuation as a world power, only to have them subsequently literally thumb their noses at us and term us "Uncle Shylock."

The schemers of Union Now," with the new flag they propose, seem already to have taken shape. The matter needs a complete investigation before it is too late. American labor and American businessmen need not take it on the chin under the guise of national defense, which, interpreted, means defense for the British Empire and not the United States of America. If some Members of Congress want to subscribe to Union Now and make of Congress a British Parliament, where they can be addressed as the Right Honorable Smith or Jones, from Devonshire or Lancashire, well and good; but, thank God, there are some of us left who will insist we operate as we have from the beginning of the Continental Congress down to the present day, and that we will insist that the portrait of George Washington still adorn the Halls of Congress, and that his Farewell Address be read religiously each year on the 22d of February.

If Union Now ever takes hold, perhaps the expatriated American Lady Astor may once more take up citizenship in Virginia and run for Parliament from the hound country, once the home of the immortal Patrick Henry.

Instead of singing God Bless America, let us sing God Save America, after this fashion:

God save America
From British rule.
Stand beside her and guide her
From the schemers who would make of her a fool.
From Lexington to Yorktown,
From blood-stained Valley Forge,
God save America
From a King named George.

Addresses Luncheon of the Pilgrims

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WALTER F. GEORGE

OF GEORGIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, June 19 (legislative day of Tuesday, June 10), 1941

ADDRESS BY AMBASSADOR WINANT

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address made by the American Ambassador to Great Britain, Hon. John G. Winant, at the luncheon of the Pilgrims on Tuesday, March 18, 1941.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The Pilgrims' luncheon gives me the first opportunity to express formally and publicly my deep appreciation of the extraordinary welcome that I have received since my arrival in England. I realize that in honoring me you wish to do honor to my country, but I would like to say that your personal kindness to me in doing it will always be cherished and remembered.

I hope that I may be able to convey to the American people some measure of the warmth and sincerity you have shown their representative. The policies which draw your country and mine more closely together in face of a common peril are policies to which the American people as a whole have solemnly committed themselves.

I shall, of course, do what little lies within my power to carry out those policies, but it is the great mass of American people, working in the factories and in the shipyards and on the farms, who are building the arsenals and the granaries for democracy's defense. It is they who with their labor and resources will provide the tools—the ships, the planes, the guns, the ammunition and the food—for all those here and everywhere, hic et ubique, as it is written on the Pilgrims' crest, who defend with their lives freedom's frontiers. The American people have now girded themselves to provide these things with the utmost speed, in the greatest volume, and with all the skill at their command.

At different periods of history it has fallen to the lot of one nation or group of nations rather than another to guard and defend the frontiers of freedom and civilization. Each nation or group of nations to which that lot has fallen has gained from it its finest traditions and most enduring heritage. Nations, like individuals, derive greatness from deeds which benefit not themselves alone but all mankind.

It was England's proud privilege to give to the world Magna Carta, the conception of due process and equal protection of the law, a conception cherished today by free men everywhere.

It was America's privilege to give to the world the Declaration of Independence, of which Abraham Lincoln said: "It was not the mere matter of separation of the Colonies from the motherland, but that sentiment in the Declaration which gave liberty not only to the people of this country but hope to all the world for all future time. It was that which gave promise that in due time the weight would be lifted from the shoulders of all men and that all would have an equal chance." Today I believe that the British people are happy to recognize that the ideas embodied in the Declaration of Independence were the ideas of Chatham and Burke as well as of Washington and Jefferson, and that those ideas helped to create not only the American Republic but the British Commonwealth of Free Nations.

It was the privilege of France, notwithstanding the excesses of the Revolution, to give undying meaning to the words, "liberty, fraternity, equality," words which will forever ring in the ears of those who fight in freedom's cause.

But I would not have you believe that I think that the cause of freedom is the cause of any one nation or group of nations. The cause of freedom is the cause of all men everywhere. The history of freedom is the history of civilized man, to which all nations, not excepting the nations now held enthralled by the dictators, have in the past made notable contributions.

Today it is the honor and destiny of the British people to man the bridgehead of humanity's hopes. It is their privilege to stand against ruthless and powerful dictators who would destroy the lessons of 2,000 years of history. It is your destiny to say to them, "Here you shall not pass." You have said so little—you have done so much. It is all part of a soldier's faith to have known great things and to be content with silence.

Never in any struggle between barbarism and civilization has so much been at stake. Nazi-ism has called into question every tenet in the faith of civilized man. It has refused to recognize the dignity of man as a human individual. It has deliberately and ruthlessly denied to man freedom of speech, freedom of religion, and equality before the law.

The world has known tyranny before, but never tyranny more cruel and absolute or as relentlessly organized. For nazi-ism has stolen and run amuck with the great inventions of free and inquiring minds, and has set about using them, not to liberate, but to enslave the human spirit.

Peace-loving peoples are slow to believe that others are plotting their destruction and the obliteration of everything they hold dear. But once aroused to the dangers, once convinced that they cannot live in peace with those bent on their destruction, tolerant and peace-loving peoples have within them latent resourcefulness, energy, and fortitude that tyranny can neither match nor master.

In the struggle against the Nazis, the people of Britain hold the front line but they do not stand isolated and alone. Your dominions and your colonies are mustering their forces to bring you ever-increasing aid. America, as President Roosevelt said last Saturday night, "has gone into action." It is mobilizing with ever-growing speed its tremendous resources to make available to you the sinews of war.

On every continent, in every country, on every island—wherever there are men and women who value freedom and love liberty—you have friends and allies. Your magnificent resistance has not only moved other democracies into action, it has given new hope and new courage to the Czechs, the Poles, the Dutch, the Danes, the Norwegians, the Belgians, and the French. Even today throughout the continent of Europe there are legions who yearn for your victory, which means freedom for them as well as for you.

The great mass of common men the world over are not deceived by the Nazis' talk of a new order. They realize that there is no order or security in tyranny. They want what the British people want. They want what the American people want. They want a friendly civilized world of free peoples in which Christian virtues and moral values are not spurned as decadent and outmoded—a world where honest work is recognized and a man can own himself.

They have not lost their faith in individual liberty and the democratic way of life. They are not content to be deprived of these freedoms which they know to be essential to the welfare of man. They desire freedom of speech and expression. They desire freedom to worship God in accordance with their own conscience. They desire freedom from want, or, if I may borrow the words used by your Prime Minister in a broadcast to America spoken more than 2 years ago, they desire a "world of increasing hope and enjoyment for the common man—the world of honored tradition and expanding science." Lastly, they desire freedom from the fear of armed aggression. They know that those freedoms cannot be had in a world dominated by totalitarian tyranny. They know that those freedoms can be won only by your victory.

The free peoples of the world have come to realize that the enslavement of one nation is a threat to the liberty of all nations. This is the significance of the world situation—clearer today than ever before. The peoples of the world were not, and dare not, destined for subjugation to the will of others. There is no people or race charged with the responsibility or endowed with the ability to dominate the world.

But we must recognize that the well-being of men and of nations has become interwoven with the well-being of other men and other nations in a degree that would have been inconceivable a few short decades ago. A much greater degree of cooperation is required between men and between nations than was necessary before the days when the engine and the dynamo came to influence our lives. That cooperation can give to the great mass of men and women a higher standard of living than our forefathers would have ever dreamed possible.

While we have accepted the machine, we have not always learned to cooperate with one another to make the machine the servant and not the master of mankind.

Never has man been able to live unto himself alone, but never has it been so necessary for man to live and work and cooperate with his fellowmen as it is today.

In an interdependent world men must cooperate, dominate or perish. Fear that their neighbors may seek to dominate them has caused too many men to think that they should dominate their neighbors.

It has been that fear in the past which has too frequently blinded men to their common interests, and has set class against class, and nation against nation.

It is that fear which is the root-cause of the counter-revolution—the effort of the few to impose by force their will upon the many—a fear that has brought so much grief to our generation.

It is that fear of other men and other nations which dictators and demagogues have exploited not to give men their freedom but to enslave them. It is that fear that the cooperation of free men and free nations alone can and will overcome.

The road ahead is hard. The lost years are gone. A new spirit is abroad. Free peoples are again cooperating to win a free world and no tyranny can frustrate their hopes. Those who now suffer and die in this effort do so for the common good of the free peoples of the earth who shall follow after them, and who, with the help of God, shall build from these sacrifices a citadel of freedom so strong that force may never again seek its destruction.

So far as your people and our people are concerned, I hope that we may work together in the spirit of the moving words which your poet laureate, Mr. John Masefield, addressed to me on my coming to England. May I read them to you?

"Two with like laws and language should be friends.
Whatever enmities have marred a past,
A future with good will may make amends
And build a new world happier than the last.

"Your coming and your friendship are a cheer.
If yours and ours will but understand,
Earth's future children will not live in fear,
Nor deed of spirit die by deed of hand."

May we help one another build a new world happier than the last so that earth's future children will not live in fear.

Canadian Prime Minister Addresses Associated Canadian Organizations of New York City

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLAUDE PEPPER

OF FLORIDA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, June 19 (legislative day of Tuesday, June 10), 1941

ADDRESS BY HON. W. L. MACKENZIE KING

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a very inspiring address delivered at New York City on June 17, 1941, by the able Prime Minister of Canada, Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I thank you, Mr. Chairman, for your words of introduction, and you, ladies and gentlemen, for the warmth of the welcome you have so generously accorded me.

I speak to you tonight as the head of the government of a country which, for almost 2 years, has been actively and unitedly at war. In accepting your invitation, I have not been unmindful that, though it was extended by Canadian friends, I, nevertheless, would be speaking in a country other than my own and to citizens or residents of a nation which is at peace—or at least, officially at peace. Through the courtesy of the National Broadcasting Co., my words will be heard by many of your fellow citizens of the United States. I believe they will be not less anxious than you are to be told, at first hand, facts concerning Canada's war effort.

You have asked me to tell you something of the causes and ideals which led us to take up arms; something of what Canada is doing, and has been doing, as a nation at war; something, too, of our hopes for the world which will rise when peace comes again to bless mankind.

The Canadian people entered this war of their own free will. As one people, we made the momentous decision by the free vote of a free Parliament. Our declaration of war was signed by the King upon the recommendation of His Majesty's Canadian Ministers. The King's proclamation was in the name of Canada. We, in Canada, were as free to make war or to abstain from making war, as the people of the United States are free to make war or to abstain from making war.

PARLIAMENT ACTED PROMPTLY

The decision of the Canadian Parliament was given as soon after the outbreak of war as Parliament could be called together. It was a prompt and united decision. There was no hesitation. There was no compulsion. We knew humanity's cry was upon us all. We took our stand as a free and independent people who wished to do their utmost to thwart aggression, to maintain freedom, to crush the cursed creed of nazi-ism, to preclude world domination by any power, and to end forever, if that were possible, the substitution of force for reason as an instrument of national policy.

Our people went to war for the sake of Canada, but not for Canada alone. We went to war as well for the sake of Britain, for North American civilization which we are proud to defend, and for the sake of that humanity which is above all nations. We saw clearly that Canadian freedom, that North American freedom, was one with British freedom.

We went to war at Britain's side because we believed hers to be the right side. We committed ourselves to her cause because it was our cause—the righteous cause of the liberty of nations, great and small, and of all men, great and humble, rich and poor. If Britain had not been on what we believed to be the side of righteousness, the cause for which she had taken up arms would not have been our cause. I do not hesitate to say that Britain, or no Britain, Canada would never have entered the war if, at the outset, our country had not seen the issue clearly for itself and believed it to be what all free peoples know it to be today.

MOTIVE IS HUMAN FREEDOM

In our unhesitating decision and our action which followed we were true to ourselves. For if any nation was ever inspired by high ideals, unselfish motives, and a passion for human freedom and social and national justice that land was and is Canada. We have a national history without stain of aggression, exploitation, or territorial greed. We have worked always in patience for peace.

In our dealings with other nations we have been amongst the foremost exponents of conciliation, mediation, and arbitration, and the most consistent advocates of international good will and understanding.

We are nationally minded because as Canadians we are free and independent. But we see no escape, no safety, no refuge in national isolation. We are internationally minded because our people know that a threat to freedom anywhere is a threat to freedom everywhere. We know that there are no longer any geographical defenses strong enough in themselves to prevent the onset of aggression. We know that tyrannical ambition, once it overleaps itself, will overleap every boundary, whether it be mountain or sea

Knowing these things, and realizing the strength of the enemy, we entered the conflict—English-speaking Canadians, French-speaking Canadians—as a united nation.

FRENCH CANADIANS UNITED

Don't let anyone dare to tell you that French-speaking Canada is not on the side of freedom in this war. The union of the children of New France and their English-speaking brothers which fashioned the Canadian nation remains unbroken and will always so remain.

The generosity of our citizenship, into which men of many races have been freely welcomed, has been repaid by unquestioned loyalty to our institutions and our cause.

As soon as the cloud on the horizon, no larger than Hitler's hand, resolved itself into the storm of conflict, we determined that we would not wait until the enemy was at our gates. We went to meet him at sea, in the air, and on land. Against total war, we have brought, and shall continue to bring, total efforts.

For nearly 2 years we have been at war. In the war we have had from the beginning two major tasks. We continue to play two major parts. Like Britain, we are a nation at war with all the power of our resources and all the strength of our will. For nearly 2 years we have gathered our strength as we have taken our allotted place in the conflict. Our soldiers, our sailors, and our airmen are with Britain and her other allies in the front line of battle. Our forces on land, at sea, and in the air have been, and are being, equipped and maintained at our own expense. In addition, like the United States, we are helping Britain by sending to her, to the limit of our capacity, the products of our factories, our farms, our forests, and our mines.

CITES CANADA'S WAR EFFORT

The task of arming and fighting as a nation is our own free contribution to the cause of freedom. The task of aiding Britain with munitions and money is an additional effort which Canada is also making for the common cause.

With the United States, and like the United States, we are helping to provide the tools. With Britain and like Britain, we are doing our utmost to help finish the job.

May I now give you some concrete facts and figures. I make no apology for giving them in almost the same terms I used in our Parliament just before it adjourned last week.

In the nearly 2 years Canada has been at war, our own effort in men and materials has steadily gained in momentum, in volume, and in power. Every month sees more Canadian troops, more Canadian sailors, and more Canadian airmen added to the number of the defenders of Britain, the defenders of freedom.

For a considerable time we have had an Army corps of two divisions in the British Isles. They are in key positions, helping to guard and to garrison the vital citadel, the retention of which may well decide the war. We have made known to all the world that our forces overseas are ready to go, and that we are equally ready to have them go, wherever their services may count for most. We shall, within the present year, dispatch to Britain two additional divisions; one, a third infantry division; the other, an armored division. We are also sending a tank brigade and many reinforcements. Some of these forces are already in Britain, others are on their way. This is apart altogether from the active forces we are retaining in Canada.

SHIPS AND PLANES ACTIVE

Ships of Canada's Navy have been engaged with British ships in the coastal waters of Britain. They are now taking an increasingly important part in the defense of the Atlantic coast, and in the duties of convoying supplies and men on the great passageway of the Atlantic so vital not only to the present of Britain, but also to the future of Canada, and of the United States. You already know that some of our destroyers—like a much larger number in the British fleet—were, only a few months ago, flying the Stars and Stripes.

Canadian airmen and Canadian squadrons have, from the beginning, been taking their part in the Battle of Britain. Every day their number is being increased by graduates from the British Commonwealth Air Training Plan. This plan is in the nature of a partnership under which Canadian, Australian, New Zealand, and British pilots and airmen, and, I am happy to say, hundreds of young Americans as well, are being trained as air fighters in the flying schools of the wide spaces of Canada. At the present time about a hundred establishments are in full operation. From this source is flowing to Britain an evergrowing stream of pilots, observers, and gunners. They have crossed to Britain in thousands, and will continue to cross in ever increasing numbers.

We have recently sent to Britain 1,000 radio technicians.

Let me give you a few figures to show what our nation of 11,500,000 people has contributed in manpower. In order that their significance may be fully appreciated, let me resolve those figures in terms of the 130,000,000 who inhabit the United States.

THREE HUNDRED THOUSAND IN ARMED FORCES

We have in our active armed forces 300,000 men. In comparable figures the 300,000 men in the Army, Navy, and air forces are equivalent to well over 3,000,000 in the armed forces of the United States.

We have in the Royal Canadian Air Force 55,000 men. That number is equivalent to far more than half a million men in the air services of this country.

Service outside Canada in the Canadian army, navy, and air force is voluntary. Eighty thousand volunteers are already in Britain. For home defense we have compulsory military service. Today every able-bodied young man of 21 is called up for training for service in Canada for the duration of the war, unless he chooses to enlist for service overseas. Some 170,000 men are enrolled in the reserve army and are subject to call for local defense. In the defense of our Atlantic and Pacific coasts, the army, navy, and air force act in close and constant cooperation. Canada's armed forces are sharing, too, in the defense of the island outposts of North America, the West Indies, and Newfoundland. For a year, Canadian troops were also stationed in Iceland.

We have therefore prepared ourselves for a twofold duty. One duty, as we see it, is to meet the aggressor in the front line of aggression. That is our duty to freedom and humanity. Another duty, which is a part of that already mentioned, is to be prepared to resist the aggressor if he reaches the shores of America. That is a duty we share with the people of the United States. I believe I am not overstating the position when I say that each day helps to make it increasingly clear that what we have done, and are doing for ourselves and for Britain, is likewise a contribution to the defense of the whole Western Hemisphere.

WAR PRODUCTION PUSHED

It is commonly said that this is a war of machines. In new factories, in old factories, in converted factories, we are making machines for Britain's armed forces as well as for our own. Canadian motor transport vehicles, machine guns, aircraft, corvettes, minesweepers, as well as shells, explosives, and chemicals are being sent in growing volume across the Atlantic. We are sending and will continue to send to Britain all the food which ships can be found to carry. We have launched a great merchant shipbuilding program. Canada, like the United States, is determined that North America will not only be the arsenal of democracy but also the shipyard of the freedom of the seas.

War production in Canada is a partnership between Canada and Britain. Since last April there has been a partnership in war production between Canada and the United States. That partnership, I am happy to recall, was established during my last visit to this country, as a result of the agreement reached by President Roosevelt and myself at Hyde Park. I am even happier to reflect that the Hyde Park agreement is a logical sequel to the far-reaching agreement arrived at between the President and myself at Ogdensburg in August last. Under the Ogdensburg agreement, as you are aware, matters pertaining to the defense of the northern half of the Western Hemisphere became a subject of special study by the Canada-United States Permanent Joint Board on Defense.

A major result of the Hyde Park declaration is that both countries are now in a position to produce more of the weapons and munitions of war and to produce them more rapidly. This is all-important when time is of the essence of the conflict.

FINANCIAL BURDEN IS HEAVY

The arming of our country and the establishment of a great war industry in less than 2 years have placed upon the people of Canada a tremendous financial burden.

Our own war effort alone has already cost us more than a billion dollars. Unless that figure is stated in terms of the population and income of the United States, it may sound small in American ears. In those terms, it is roughly equivalent to an expenditure of $15,000,000,000. In this current year we expect the cost of our direct war effort to be on a scale equivalent, in United States terms, to between twenty-one and twenty-two billion dollars a year. Every dollar of that is paid by Canada and is raised in Canada, mainly by taxation.

Canada, in addition, is raising huge sums of money to help Britain. The money is needed to pay for the great quantities of food, raw materials, and war equipment we are sending to Britain on her account. The value of Canadian shipments this year, it is estimated, will reach a billion and a half dollars, or the equivalent of nearly $23,000,000,000 worth of goods measured in terms of American population and income.

It is not, perhaps, surprising that there should be, in other countries, some persons who do not fully understand what is happening in Canada, or some who do not wish to understand. For example, it has been asserted that Canada is demanding "cash on the barrel head—for its aid to Britain"; that "Canada still sells to Britain for cash at a profit," while the United States is leasing and lending to Britain. Such a statement ignores entirely Canada's direct participation in the war at her own expense. They take no account whatever of what we are contributing in human lives, as well as in those material things which it is possible to lease or lend.

ENTIRELY A FREE-WILL OFFERING

If our war effort is to be construed as a contribution to Britain, rather than what in reality it is—our contribution to the common cause of freedom, the "cash on the barrel head" statement overlooks the fact that the whole of Canada's direct war effort is a contribution which is neither leased nor lent, but is an out and out free-will offering—a gift to the hard-pressed people of Britain, gladly and proudly made, to assist them in maintaining the world's citadel of freedom, and in fighting freedom's battles in other parts of the world.

The "cash on the barrel head" allegation, the alleged "selling to Britain for cash at a profit," equally misrepresents the nature of Canada's indirect participation through financial aid to Britain—the very part, in fact, which parallels, in kind, though not in amount, the lease and lend contribution of the United States.

Canadian producers must, of course, be paid for the goods sent to Britain, just as American producers must be paid. Out of what we send to Britain, Britain pays for in British goods shipped back to Canada. We have reduced our tariffs to make that easier. What good hard cash the British did pay us—in gold—we have had to pay, along with a great deal of our own gold, to the United States for our war purchases in this country.

But by far the largest part of the Canadian dollars needed to pay Canadian producers of goods for Britain have been raised and must continue to be raised from the Canadian people in taxes or loans. We have told Britain not to worry about her shortage of Canadian money—that with the enemy at her gates and approaching our shores, there will be time enough to reckon costs and credits once we all know whether this world is to be slave or free. Meanwhile, we will do our best to find for Britain's Canadian purchases Canadian dollars out of Canadian pockets.

Apart from British goods sent to Canada, Britain has already needed a billion Canadian dollars to cover her purchases in Canada. About a quarter of this sum Britain paid Canada in gold. It has cost us in the United States more gold than this to enable us to fill our British orders.

The rest of the Canadian dollars Britain needed in Canada, Canada herself has supplied. Some of these dollars were exchanged for Canadian securities held in Britain. The remainder amounts, in effect, to a loan by Canada to Britain.

It is only when we add together the cost to Canada of our own war activities and our financial support for Britain that we reach the total financial burden of war which the Canadian people are shouldering. Translated into comparable American figures on the basis of our relative population and incomes, this total burden would amount within this fiscal year to something like $35,000,000,000. To carry this load has required very heavy increases in taxes, even on those who are not well off. I am proud to say the Canadian people have willingly accepted this taxation as a part of their contribution to the cause of liberty.

Ladies and gentlemen, I have tried to explain to you in these few minutes some of the material things which we Canadians have done, are doing, and will do.

FIGHT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

I have tried to tell you why. We believe that everything which freemen value and cherish on this side of the grave is in peril in this war. The right of men, rich and poor, to be treated as men; the right of men to make the laws by which they shall be governed; the right of men to work where they will, at what they will; the right of womankind to the serenity and sanctity of the home; the right of children to play in safety under peaceful heavens; the right of old men and women to the tranquillity of their sunset; the right to speak the truth in our hearts; the right to worship in our own way the God in whom we believe.

We know that if we lose this fight, all fruits will wither and fall from the tree of liberty. But we shall not lose it. We shall not lose it because the people of Britain stand and will stand in undaunted fortitude and magnificent resistance. We shall not lose it because, although some nations may lie crushed today, their souls can never be destroyed. We shall not lose it because we, on this continent of North America, who have been the pioneers of the frontiers of freedom, have already begun to stamp out the prairie fire of tyranny, anarchy, and barbarism which every day draws close to our homes.

For today, whether we will it or not, we are all roof watchers and fire fighters. As Canadians, we are proud to fight the flames with the people of Britain who have maintained for freemen their faith in freedom, and kept inviolate the majesty of the human spirit.

GRATEFUL TO GOOD NEIGHBOR

As Canadians, we are proud of our great and good neighbor, and grateful to know, as all the world knows, that she is with us heart and soul; that her genius, her skill, and her strength work against time for those who fight for freedom.

Some day peace will crown the sacrifices of all. When that day comes the peoples of the British Commonwealth and the peoples of the United States will be found at each other's side, united more closely than ever in one great endeavor to undo the wrongs that have been done mankind. For it is, I believe, the unshaken and unshakable purpose of both that there shall be established upon this earth, now so rapidly becoming hideous with the blackened ruins of civilization itself, a freedom wider and more deeply founded than ever before in human history.

Surely we have all come to see that the present conflict is something more than a war between Germany and other powers; that it is "a struggle between permanent and irreconcilable claimants for the soul of man." On the one side stands spiritual freedom with its high regard for human values, the dignity of manhood, the worth of honest toil and the sacredness of human personality. On the other side is the spirit of nazi-ism and fascism with their "coarse material standards," their "cult of power as an end in itself," their "subordination of personality to mechanism" and their "worship of an elaborate and soul-destroying organization." This false and evil spirit has, in our own day, in our own and other lands, permeated all too deeply many phases of social and industrial life. It must be the purpose of our high endeavor to destroy it for all time.

While that work is being done, it will be ours, as well, to do all that lies within us to make supreme upon the earth that friendship among men and nations which has ever lain hidden in the heart of mankind.

The Nation's Job

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALEXANDER WILEY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, June 19 (legislative day of Tuesday, June 10), 1941

ADDRESS BY HON. ALEXANDER WILEY, OF WISCONSIN

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a speech by me before the Central Retail Feed Association Convention at the Schroeder Hotel, Milwaukee, Wis., on June 9, 1941.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE NATION'S JOB

Mr. Chairman, my friends, I am happy to be your guest speaker today. It is well that the public servant render an account of his stewardship.

It is well also for each of us at frequent intervals to calmly and dispassionately attempt to analyze the problems which confront us as a people.

That is why I am particularly gratified to speak on the Nation's job today.

We hear a great deal about the job which confronts the Nation today. Just what is that job?

WHAT IS THE NATION'S JOB?

The Nation's job today is defense. Does that mean defense in the narrow military interpretation of the word? No; it means defense in its broadest aspects.

It means not only a military defense, but an economic defense, a social defense, and an individual defense. It means building not only the steel armor plate of mechanized defense, but also of building the bombproof barriers of mental and spiritual defense. Man does not live by bread alone. In our defense program we must remember that.

IF DEFENSE IS THE NATION'S PROBLEM, WHAT ARE WE TO DEFEND?

Before we consider the nature and extent of the Nation's job—the nature and extent of our defenses—we must first know what we are to defend. To have a good defense, there must be something precious requiring protection and preservation.

In the known history of man, there have been more than eight thousand "eternal" peace pacts, but their average life has been only about two years. Probably the reason has been that too often they have been concerned with territorial disputes rather than the great abiding freedoms.

Our defense is not always a military defense. The things we defend are not always corporeal things, which we can hold aloft in our hands. Battles are not always fought because of territories. Defense is not always limited to the protection of life and property.

Sometimes defense is for a way of life—a way of life which we might not even be able to define. Sometimes defense is for an ideal which we cannot reduce to words.

The Nation's job today is the defense of those things we hold most dear. Our lands, our buildings, and our people are all part of these things we wish to defend.

But they are not the only part. The forces which threaten them are not always military forces.

The Nation's job today, in a world of collapsing values, in a tortured world of force and fear, is to retain and develop for ourselves a way of life which we have cherished ever since that sweltering Fourth of July in 1776.

WHAT IS THIS WAY OF LIFE?

What is this way of life? It is a way of life in which "all men are created equal." That means that there shall be no special privileges for any group or class. It is a way of life where there are certain inalienable rights which government cannot deny to any man. It is a way of life where government derives its just powers from the consent of the governed. It is a way of life where there is freedom of religion, speech, press, assembly, and petition. It is a way of life where government is the servant and the people are the masters.

It is a way of life which has given to our people the highest standards of living the world has ever known. It is a way of life which has given us more economic opportunities than the people of any land have ever had since the beginning of time.

These are the things we defend today. Their preservation and their continued dynamic growth constitute the Nation's job.

EACH INDIVIDUAL HAS A JOB WHICH IS A PART OF THE NATION'S JOB

You and I are part of 131,000,000 people. Each of us has a great job to perform. It may be a job that is unheralded and unsung. It may be a little job as the world evaluates success. Nevertheless, to the degree that we give it our best efforts and to the degree that it squares with our American concepts it is a great job.

The tenement-house mother who has reared her sons in the love of America; the crossroads country doctor on his lonely circuit; the workman whose grimy hand guides a machine lathe; the farmer; the businessman; the small-town preacher—men and women in every walk of life—each contribute to the Nation's job.

Coming from Washington, the vortex of all the economic and political currents of this country, I say to you that this job of ours divides itself into a number of challenges.

THE FIRST JOB OF THE NATION TODAY IS PREPAREDNESS

The No. 1 job of the Nation today is preparedness—adequate defense of the Nation—and now, a bulwark against war. This calls for the creation of national unity, strengthening our morale.

In my judgment, we have made great strides in our preparedness, but we still have a tremendous task ahead of us.

I think that Government has a job of coordination to do. The Chief Executive has created a collection of defense agencies. The Defense Commission, the Office of Production Management, the Office of Price Administration and Civilian Supply, and a number of other agencies.

I have no quarrel with the objectives of these agencies. I do say, however, that they overlap. I do say that our governmental defense agencies have lacked authority and power to act. It cannot be denied also that after almost a year of defense effort, there is still no directly responsible defense head other than the Chief Executive. There is still no completely coordinated defense staff, though it may be that there will be a better coordination under the present "complete" emergency set-up.

The greatest need in our defense set-up is for some kind of mechanism which will secure responsibility for integrated defense agencies.

We have made great strides in our defense effort, and I feel that our governmental defense agencies have accomplished great progress, but greater progress is possible—indeed, it is vital, and that is why I urge a greater coordination of governmental defense agencies.

SECOND, WE NEED PRODUCTION

Once the governmental mechanism for our defense agencies has been clearly defined, once the machine has been oiled and put into running order, we must produce at top speed. Wars today are machine wars, and if America is to remain safe, we must increase our machine output.

To increase our machine output, we must utilize our machines to a greater extent. That need not mean overtime for the trained men who handle the machines. It should mean instead, that we train more men, from the ranks of our unemployed, so that the machines can be used 24 hours a day without imposing inhuman hours on the American workmen.

The first problem, in increasing production, then, is to utilize all of the existing facilities of production, both machines and men. We must further break down the unhealthy concentration of defense orders in the East.

There are idle machines and idle facilities in the small factories which must be employed. Defense must be decentralized still further so that the machines of the small factory are used and the idle workman of the small town is employed.

Government must do its part, in keeping the wheels of industry turning. Industry must not be compelled to wade knee deep in red tape. There must be a decisive, businesslike policy in our defense agencies.

Now that a complete emergency has been declared there must also be a decisive governmental labor policy, so that labor and industry know where they stand. Our labor policy must be taken off 24-hour notice, if we are to have any stability in our production.

My criticism of the existing defense program is that we have scrapped the industrial mobilization experience of the first World War. At that time, we found out that we needed a centralized, unified, and coordinated program both in industrial mobilization and in procurement.

The coordination of our defense activities is definitely a vital part of the Nation's job.

THIRD, THERE IS NEED FOR INTELLIGENT COORDINATED PLAN

As a part of our coordinated effort, the great crying need for our defense activities today, is a plan. The spectacular success of the totalitarian machine has not been purely accidental.

Since the days when Hitler was an agitator in a Munich jail, and in fact long before Hitler ever launched his beer-hall revolution, the geopolitical experts of Germany were formulating long-range plans.

Hitler was sold on the necessity of long-range planning as far back as the days when he began to dream in the Munich jail of Mein Kampf and conquest of the world.

The geopolitical planning of the Third Reich has been almost unbelievably thorough, and it would be senseless for us to suppose that this planning has not already instituted measures weakening our control of the Western Hemisphere.

We know also that as a part of this plan Hitler has encouraged Russia to look with covetous eyes on Alaska. We know that Hitler has goaded Japan to consider longingly the American and British possessions in the Pacific.

We know also that every one of our Latin-American nations has been listed in Hitler's Strategic Index of the Geopolitical Institute.

We know that there have been recreation camps built around Buenos Aires. We know that the long hand of German planning has been stirring up quarrels between the Americas. We know that South American leaders have been wined and dined by the Nazi leaders.

All of this brings us to one fact: Hitler has a plan of offense. We don't seem to have a plan of defense.

I believe we need a great defense laboratory, involving the Navy Department, the War Department, and the State Department, and embodying a first-class observation system.

It isn't enough for this administration to write our defense plans in the shifting sands of day-to-day expediency.

With reference to our South American relations, I do not believe you can buy South American friendship. South American friendship must result from mutual confidence, trust, and understanding, born of a common need. Economic leaf-raking will not bring us a good South American defense.

FOURTH, WE NEED A BETTER UNDERSTANDING OF WHAT OUR MILITARY JOB MUST BE

Because our defense plans have never been clearly defined, and because we have never determined accurately what we want to defend, our military plans have been vague and indefinite.

At the time when selective-service legislation was considered, I spoke against the conscription bill. At that time—on September 14, 1940—I spoke against the idea of hysterically attempting to assemble a mass Army. I believe that the assembling of such a mass Army does not answer the problem.

I believe that the assembling of such an Army represents an antiquated idea today. I believe that it represents thinking in terms of 1914 rather than 1940.

Whatever we are going to defend, we may as well realize the fact that defense today is a different matter from 1918. Hitler's forces which broke the French line at Sedan; the forces which cut off the British and the Belgians in Flanders; the forces which conquered France's Army of 3,000,000 men; those fighting forces did not exceed 150,000 men.

I made that statement on the floor of the Senate in September of 1940, and a few days ago I was gratified to see it confirmed by the statement of a Member of the House subcommittee directly in charge of military appropriations.

I believe in the finest possible training for our Regular Army and National Guard. I believe in orderly training for an efficient Army protected by all of the weapons of mechanized forces, but I cannot subscribe to the haphazard idea that merely by assembling a huge semitrained Army we can intimidate smaller but highly efficient mechanized forces.

OUR NEED IS FOR MODERN MECHANIZED EQUIPMENT

Part of America's job today then is for modern mechanized equipment rather than for a tremendous Army of infantry and cavalry and field artillery. We need more motorized divisions. We need more armored divisions. We need more highly trained men to mobilize these motor divisions.

I am not interested merely in learning that we have a tremendous number of men being trained. I ask precisely the same question today that I asked on September 14, 1940, and I quote from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of that day:

"Have they modern equipment, tanks, antiaircraft guns, and so forth? The answer is no. Has the Army a supplemental air arm such as the spearhead Hitler had? It will be remembered that he had 150,000 men equipped with super-land dreadnaughts, followed by tanks and mechanized units of men with machine guns, and over and above this land organization he had a synchronized air force of Stukas and bombers. Is our Army prepared in that way? The answer is no. Where is the equipment? Whose business was it to have it for the Army? Whose business was it to tell this country what we should have?"

Last year I said that the greatest job for our Army to accomplish was to make our forces blitzkrieg conscious. I say it again today.

"Let us be equipped and trained accordingly. Then take the National Guard and do likewise. We will then have 750,000 men in the third line of defense and if we get the first line—a Navy, invincible, with a coordinated air arm—and a second line of defense, another air fleet such as is being used now in Europe; and our third arm of defense, an Army of men properly trained, equipped, and mechanized, then nothing in the world will touch these shores."

I have voted against the administration's foreign-policy measures. That does not mean that I am not interested in America's defense. I believe that like many of you here today—we believe fervently in defense of those things we hold dear.

Merely because we do not subscribe to the administration's chest pounding does not mean that we are not realistic.

We are realistic. We can see the possibilities for trouble in South America, but we can also see the fact that a tremendous army alone would not be able to suppress such trouble. We know that the need there would be for a small highly mechanized efficient army like the Hitler panzer divisions.

We know that if the United States were ever invaded—and that may be impossible—we would need a mobile, efficient, mechanized army which could move rapidly. No foreign power could land a large army on our shores if we have a first line of defense—the Navy with coordinating air arms—and second line of defense, an independent air arm, and third line of defense, a sufficient number of mechanized divisions.

The Nation's job is to live today in terms of today and tomorrow rather than in terms of yesterday. A tremendous army of mere marching men is out of date. It is an expensive luxury, and moreover it is dangerous.

It constitutes a perpetual invitation to foolhardy action. It constitutes another danger—a danger to any man who is a part of any army which places its reliance on manpower rather than on mechanized power.

I have the most deep-rooted and wholesome respect for our military leaders. I have a profound regard for their patriotism and their loyalty. But, my friends, while I accept their moral integrity I cannot accept their mental lock step.

I cannot accept the "ruttist" approach of the military brass hats.

Defense today must be written in the mechanized terms of invention and initiative. Defense today is written in the progressive terms of today and tomorrow, not in closed minds, antiquated caste systems, and red tape.

They cashiered Wisconsin's own Billy Mitchell for his foresight. You will remember that some 15 years ago Brig. Gen. Billy Mitchell, a good Milwaukeean, blasted the Army and Navy mossbacks with a scorching broadside for their criminal negligence and their bungling incompetency.

General Mitchell, a brilliant soldier and a pioneer flier, rebelled at the criminal blindness of his superiors. He urged the establishment of a separate air branch for national defense.

ESTABLISHMENT OF SEPARATE AIR BRANCH FOR DEFENSE IMPERATIVE TODAY

I say to you today that the necessity which General Mitchell saw more than 15 years ago for the establishment of a separate air branch is more imperative than ever before.

Mitchell was a farseeing man. He commanded the A. E. F. air forces in France. He was convinced that the airplane would be a decisive factor in all future wars. More than a decade and one-half ago he advocated aerial torpedoes, parachute troops, troop-transport planes, heavy-gun combat planes, and air bases in Alaska.

On October 17, 1918, he urged troop transport and parachute armies, and a greater use of the tanks, and that was expert prevision. Mitchell was a prophet. He was ahead of his time. He never "pulled his punches." In 1920 he literally stunned officials in Washington with the statement that he could sink a battleship with airplane bombs. Rocking-chair admirals and swivel-chair generals scoffed at the idea, but they arranged a demonstration. He sank the dreadnaught which the infamous Von Tirpitz said could not be sunk.

Mitchell issued a bitter blast against the hide-bound officials who held down the development of the air defense of this country, and as a result he was arrested, court martialed, and suspended from the service for 5 years.

He was cashiered by what has been called a packed court. One of the greatest military minds of all time was crucified.

He was pilloried by military martinets. His ideas were stifled and his beliefs entombed. If he were alive today he could say, "I told you so." We know today that "where there is no vision, the people perish."

I fought for the vindication of Billy Mitchell in June of 1940, and I reopened the battle last month. I did so not because Billy Mitchell needs vindication. He stands vindicated at the great bar of public opinion.

I am fighting for his vindication because I don't want to see men like him crucified again in 1940 and 1941.

We must scrap outmoded ideas, red tape, and mossback thinking. We must insist on open minds, receptive to new ideas. We must slough off the dead timber in our military system. We cannot follow our outmoded thinking of yesterday.

If we are to defend America, we must think in terms of today and tomorrow. We need a great experimental laboratory to supplement the activities of our free forces of defense. We need to draw even more upon industry for the research experts who know more about some of our defense mechanisms than the War and Navy Departments themselves.

FIFTH, WE MUST GET OUR FINANCIAL HOUSE IN ORDER

We must get it in order not simply for the immediate present, but for the period that is up ahead. We must get it so well buttressed that it will be able to stand the economic jolts of the economic war which will follow the European military conflict.

We are living today in what may be the twilight zone for free enterprise. It is my hope that our traditional system of free enterprise will emerge strengthened and revitalized from this twilight zone, but there is a menacing possibility that in the economic developments up ahead we may slip through the flimsy barriers of the twilight zone into a different period, where there may be no semblance of our traditional system of free enterprise.

We are today living in a "no man's land" somewhere between a free-enterprise past and an unknown future.

I believe that there is a great deal of misunderstanding about the American system of free enterprise. I believe that too often we have an idea that the American system produces only an unwarranted concentration of wealth in a limited group of people.

I do believe that today there is too great a concentration of wealth and specifically too great a concentration in limited industries, but I believe we must also recognize the fact that our system has effected the most widespread distribution of the benefits of our type of economy.

AMERICAN WORKER GETTING A LARGER SHARE OF WHAT HE PRODUCES

Recently a great American corporation published its annual statement for 1940. The report recorded the history of this corporation for 39 years. It was organized in 1902, and from 1902 to 1910, inclusive, out of all the money to be divided between owners and workers—the workers got 65 percent. In the decade from 1911 to 1920 the workers got 73.4 percent, and from 1921 to 1930, 80.9 percent.

What is most impressive, however, is the fact that from 1931 to 1940 the workers received 94.6 percent of all the money to be divided between the owners and the workers.

Our system of free enterprise has enabled the American worker in each succeeding decade to get a larger share of what he produces. That, to me, is an impressive reason for fighting to retain the American system of free enterprise. I feel that that, too, is a great part of America's job.

I might add also that employees of this corporation worked 21 percent less hours to earn 4 percent more wages in 1940 than was necessary during the boom year of 1929.

THERE MUST BE NO SEIZURE OF INDUSTRY BY GOVERNMENT

In the lands where this has been done the seizure of industry by Government has left a lengthening shadow of want, pillage, privation, starvation, terrorism, and stagnation.

We are in that twilight zone—that no-man's land where our future will be determined by the course we take now.

OUR FUTURE COURSE TO BE DIRECTED BY APPROACH TO DEFENSE ECONOMY TODAY

In my judgment, aside from the problems of Government ownership and Government control over business, our future course will be directed largely by our approach to defense economy today.

That approach must be a sane approach, and that also is part of America's job.

In the last World War Congress was never completely successful in preventing war profiteering. In 1916, 1917, and 1918, Congress was not completely successful in stopping inflation.

At the present time Congress will make the decisions on tax policies which will determine whether our fiscal policy is geared to the realities of the situation. At the present time we are making decisions which will determine whether or not we will have another group of war millionaires and whether or not we will have a new, unbridled orgy of inflation.

During the last World War inflation made $1 worth only 50 cents. During the last World War in 4 years we established a war debt of thirty-nine billions, and that debt without inflation would have been only thirteen billions.

We know that during the World War our taxes were never sufficient to meet the cost of the war and never enough to prevent war profiteers or to prevent inflation.

Our problem now is not to repeat the mistakes of the World War. At the present time our tax structure is overbalanced with levies on the consumer. In 1940 we hurriedly passed defense taxes.

MUST FACE TAX PROBLEM REALISTICALLY

I believe in a tax which has some relationship to the ability of taxpayers to pay. I don't believe in levying taxes merely because the line of least resistance says that it is easier and better politics to impose a hidden, indirect tax.

Probably the backbone for a wartime tax program ought to be an airtight excess-profits tax. Along with this tax there ought to be a progressive system of personal and corporation income taxes.

We all know that we have a much better chance of avoiding inflation if we "pay the freight" now. I don't like high taxes, but as long as we spend on a lavish scale we have to tax on a lavish scale. The way to cut down taxes is to cut our nondefense spending.

Our problem now is to do a sane job of social engineering in our fiscal policies, as we consider the tremendous new emergency tax structure.

That is a man-sized part of America's job.

I would like to emphasize one lesson which we should have learned after our experience in the first World War. We must begin thinking today about the conditions which will follow the present European conflict.

We know that the last World War brought inflation. We know that after that inflation there came deflation and depression. We know that they were periods of economic readjustment.

The unstable world economy makes it very probable that there may be a fierce economic war in the international markets. Whether we will be able to meet that economic war will be determined by the course we adopt at the present time.

It stands to reason that we will be in a better position to wage that economic war if we maintain our financial equilibrium today. We must not permit an inflation of prices. We must not permit a tremendous increase in the public debt.

We must continue to do everything we can to produce more at lower costs. We must shun the easy way of borrowing more and more funds.

We must reduce our nonmilitary expenditures. We must try to pay as much of the bill as we go. This is a vital part of America's job.

THE NATION'S JOB IS PREPAREDNESS TO MEET ANY MILITARY THREAT, ANY ECONOMIC WAR, OR ANY IDEOLOGICAL BATTLE

The Nation's job is essentially preparedness to meet any military threat, any economic war, or any ideological battle. Thus far we have discussed for the most part America's job as it confronts the Nation.

Let me emphasize, also, that the job which confronts the Nation must be done by individuals, and our success or failure in accomplishing America's job is bound up with our individual efforts. These efforts may not be military efforts, but they will require sacrifices nevertheless.

Wordsworth said: "Peace hath tests of manhood which battle never knew."

I am certain that in these troubled days we fully realize our responsibility. The obligation each of us owes to this Nation, to our concept of government, to the future of this Nation of which we are trustees, demands that you and I be fit—fit soldiers—to meet whatever emergency may arise.

It calls for vision, judgment—it calls for casting out intolerance and class hatred. It calls for perspective.

THIS IS A TIME WHEN EACH OF US CAN DO OUR PART TO CREATE UNITY THROUGH TOLERANCE

Our part is to create unity through a spirit of tolerance and understanding. This is not a time for wild-eyed intolerance—soap-box ranting.

This is possibly the bitterest social era the world has ever known. The part of the citizens today must not be to add to the world's bitterness, but to create a spirit of tolerant understanding.

It is written in Isaiah: "They helped every one his neighbor; and everyone said to his brother, Be of good courage."

This land of ours was founded in the belief that it was vital to rid ourselves of intolerance, hatred, bigotry, and persecution. We have not always been successful in that ideal. There have been periods of witch-hunting in American history; there have been periods of intolerance, sectionalism, and racial and religious rioting.

Lincoln lived in such a period, and he saw its dangers. It was Lincoln, on February 27, 1860, in his famous Cooper Institute speech, who said:

"Even though much provoked, let us do nothing through passion and ill temper."

And, again, on March 5, 1860, at Hartford, Conn., Lincoln said:

"Our portions of this Confederacy should act in harmony and use careful deliberation."

Mr. Chairman, I can think of no greater appeal to the people of the United States in these troubled times than those words of Lincoln's, and so I say to you that the first part which we can play in national defense is a tolerant role—a role which seeks to mend the social fabric rather than tear it asunder by creating class castes.

WE CAN REAFFIRM ALLEGIANCE AND FAITH IN AMERICAN IDEAL

We, as citizens, can play a part in our defense program by reaffirming our allegiance and our faith in the American ideal, possibly in the words of the American Creed:

"I believe in the United States of America as a government of the people, by the people, for the people; whose just powers are derived from the consent of the governed; a democracy in a republic; a sovereign Nation of many sovereign States; a perfect Union, one and inseparable, established upon those principles of freedom, equality, justice, and humanity for which American patriots sacrificed their lives and fortunes.

"I therefore believe it is my duty to my country to love it; to support its Constitution; to obey its laws; to respect its flag; and to defend it against all enemies."

In other lands, youth is bludgeoned into a dreary acceptance and finally into a fervently fanatical subservience to totalitarian philosophy. How much more inspiring will our crusade be, to create in every boy and girl of this land an intense loyalty to our way of life.

WE CAN PREPARE TO SACRIFICE

The average citizen can do his part in national defense by being prepared to sacrifice; and, I might add, government also must make sacrifices.

I hold no brief for those political gold-brick salesmen who evade their responsibility by letting the American people believe that we can retain our way of life without sacrifice.

These supersalesmen, these glib-tongued prophets of economic self-indulgence are literally playing politics with American lives and American homes when they refuse to tell the American people that they are facing sacrifices unprecedented in American history. I think this is the time to be prepared for a big jolt.

WE WILL HAVE TO MEET STAGGERING BILLS WITH HIGH TAXATION

All of this means that we are in for a period of sacrifice. We are going to have staggering bills with higher and more painful taxation.

WE CAN AID IN CURBING INFLATION

I believe that we can play a definite part in national defense and aid to Britain by doing everything in our power to curb inflation. If we do everything we can to prevent inflation, we will be making an outstanding contribution on the economic front.

I don't believe that the question of whether or not we have inflation is entirely dependent upon Government policy. I believe we, as individuals, can do a great deal toward maintaining stability. Probably the most obvious way in which we can help maintain stability is by deferring satisfaction of some of the wants which we are now able to gratify.

We can also make a contribution toward stability by saving and by refraining from going into debt. We know that the demands on the market will be heavy enough, without adding any demands based on abnormal borrowing.

In the past we have had booms, because of debt making. We have had depressions intensified by debt paying. The tremendous increase in our Government debt and the possibilities for private debt in our defense program involves very serious dangers. That makes it all the more necessary that the average citizen should resist the temptation to expand the individual debt.

WE CAN AVOID GOING INTO DEBT

That means that we individuals may have to buy out of current income instead of on the deferred-payment system. That means less credit and more cash purchasing. We know that it is easy to borrow at the present time, but if this borrowing is not conservative it may involve dangers to both the borrower and the lender, particularly in times of rising prices. Thrift is still a virtue. Debts still have to be repaid. The Government has not set a good example, but that does not alter the fact that we should.

I believe, also, incidentally that business can join with the citizen in a policy of exercising restraint in inventory accumulation.

OBLIGATIONS OF STATES AND CITIES

That means that cities and States must accumulate projects (not undertake them now) which will absorb the returning soldiers, sailors, and men who come from the defense plants when this war is over. It means that these cities and States must accumulate, during this period, reserves to take care of these projects. In other words, it means that cities and States should inculcate the doctrine of saving into their politics. For them as for individuals, I repeat—thrift is still a virtue.

WE CAN FIGHT SUBVERSIVE FORCES

Daniel Webster once said:

"There are persons who constantly clamor * * * They carry on a mad hostility against established institutions. They would choke up the fountains of industry and dry all its streams. In a country of unbounded liberty they clamor against oppression."

Against these subversive forces we can wage an effective battle. When we join in a spirit of unity with our fellow citizens our combined voice is the voice of public opinion—a force sometimes more potent than government itself.

John Milton once said: "Awake—arise—or be forever fallen."

Gentlemen, are the American people awake to all of the dangers which menace our way of life—the dangers from without and and the dangers from within?

I believe that recognizing these dangers the American people will answer the challenge they present—answer them individually and collectively in the ways we have discussed.

It is my fervent hope that out of the Gethsemane ahead, the United States and our way will emerge strengthened and revitalized, both to a recognition of our opportunities and our obligations.

I believe that our republic democracy is a dynamic living thing. That it may continue to work—and to grow—and to live—each citizen must dedicate his highest efforts.

Let me emphasize that in the ultimate analysis the Nation's job will be accomplished because of the strength and vitality of our American character. In the continued growth of that national character, each of us can play a role.

I do not subscribe to the dirge of defeatism. Regardless of what the immediate future may hold, I feel certain that America will accept the challenges and meet them fully.

It is my hope that in accepting those challenges, we will set a living example for the rest of the world, an example which I hope will be followed by other lands in that day, "When men shall beat their swords into plowshares, and their spears into pruning hooks: nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more."

Pensions for Widows and Dependents of Deceased World War Veterans

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JARED Y. SANDERS, JR.

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 16, 1941

Mr. SANDERS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to express my wholehearted support of H. R. 4. There is nothing nearer and dearer to the hearts of those of us who served during the World War than the widows and orphans and other dependents of our deceased comrades. This bill is merely a step toward rendering justice to these dependents, and provides somewhat more adequate compensation for the surviving dependent widows, orphans, and the dependent mothers and fathers of these deceased veterans.

The monthly compensation provided in the measure is as follows:

Widow but no child, $20; widow and one child, $28; widow and two children, $34 (with $4 for each additional child); no widow but one child, $12; no widow but two children, $18 (equally divided); no widow but three children, $24 (equally divided) (with $3 for each additional child; total amount to be equally divided); dependent mother or father, $20; or both, $15 (each).

This measure has the unanimous endorsement of the Committee on World War Veterans. Some opposition has been voiced on the grounds of the expense. The cost of this measure will be relatively small. The Veterans' Administration has submitted an estimate of cost of the proposed measure for the first year, as follows:

	Number of cases	Estimated cost first year
Widows alone	29,300	$7,032,000
Widows with children	60,000	24,689,000
Children alone	20,800	4,199,000
Total	110,100	35,920,000
One-half cost	55,000	17,960,000
One parent	28,300	6,792,000
Both parents	4,900	1,764,000
Total	33,200	8,556,000
One-half cost	16,000	4,278,000
Estimated cost		22,238,000

This measure deserves to be passed without a dissenting vote.

St. Lawrence River Development

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LISTER HILL

OF ALABAMA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, June 19 (legislative day of Tuesday, June 10), 1941

EXCERPTS OF TESTIMONY BEFORE RIVERS AND HARBORS COMMITTEE ON H. R. 4927, GREAT LAKES-ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY AND POWER PROJECT, JUNE 17 AND 18, 1941

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD excerpts from the testimony given before the Rivers and Harbors Committee of the House on the St. Lawrence River development, by Secretary Hull, Secretary Stimson, Secretary Knox, Assistant Secretary Berle, and others.

There being no objection, the excerpts were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Secretary of War STIMSON. So far as the benefits to this country at this time of emergency are concerned, as I see them in my Department, they are, first, the increase in our shipbuilding capacity by taking in the shipbuilding capacity on the Great Lakes; second, so far as transportation of munitions to Great Britain is concerned, there is a slight improvement, comparatively, in the distance which such munitions could be transported in a protected route. * * * Third, the great advantage is the fact that this waterway will produce an estimated total horsepower of 2,200,000. Now, that is a very important matter at this time of strain.

This horsepower produced by this proposed project is, I am informed by the engineers, the largest block of undeveloped power at one site in the United States, as well as the cheapest in its operation.

* * * I can only say that in my opinion it is necessary to prepare for a very long emergency. We all hope that it will be briefer, but it is not safe to act on hopes in such a case as confronts us today.

* * * There is a very good chance, a very strong chance, in my opinion, of the emergency lasting long enough to enable this country to reap the benefits of this construction of the seaway.

* * * I think the matter of electric power would certainly be a very large factor in the industrial development necessary to produce the mechanized warfare of the present day.

* * * I think the main bulk of the construction of this waterway is of a different matter and will use different materials than are involved in our present bottlenecks.

My estimate is that a very large part of the construction necessary for this project will not interfere with our defense program. A great deal of it will be excavation work and such as that which would not interfere with the bottlenecks we have at present.

When I saw the estimate of the engineers for the share of the United States cost of this project, which I think was $200,000,000, and when I contrasted that with some of the hundreds of millions that we are paying for various items of national defense, I thought this was quite a cheap project.

I think that, while I am aware of the enormous expenditures that this country faces, I believe that the emergency which it faces is so immensely more vital that we have got to take every possibility that we can to prepare for meeting that emergency successfully, even though we know that it is going to be a tremendous strain and burden on the United States to do so.

Secretary of State HULL (letter to the committee).—I am glad to inform you that I am in full accord with the proposed legislation and I trust that the bill will receive prompt and favorable consideration.

Assistant Secretary of State BERLE. * * * The need, of course, of additional shipbuilding, in view of the losses due to the war, is well known. And, finally, the information in the possession of the Department appears to indicate that, should the Axis Powers be victorious, they would commence a shipbuilding race against the United States with the shipbuilding facilities of the entire European coasts, which are several times larger than our own. In that event, as indeed at the present, we should be faced with a situation in which every shipbuilding facility we might have and all that we could easily construct would be taxed to the limit.

Naturally, no one of us can predict the inscrutable future. All I can say is that there is no information in the Department which would lead to the belief that the present conflict will come to a speedy end. We have no basis which would lead us to assume that there would be a rapid conclusion. We cannot, of course, say how long it would last.

* * * I should like to state that no responsible person in this Government would undertake to take any chances on its being of short duration. Whatever your possible guess might be the only sane, safe, and prudent course that responsible men could take would be to prepare for a long period of stress. And if a kindly providence lets us off we should be very happy.

In that regard I should think that the Secretary of War made the only answer that could be made, which is that every dictate of prudence, precaution, and foresight would require preparation for a very long period which would seem to be indicated by present circumstance.

* * * If we had had this (the seaway) in 1934 and the construction had now been finished, as it would have been, we should have had the huge resources of power; we should have had a tremendous accretion to our ferro-alloy and aluminum industries, either in existence or readily, very readily possible and, of course, we should have had the navigation resources of the Great Lakes ready at hand. I think every student agrees that it was a mistake from the point of view of the national defense, not to have done it in 1934.

* * * The only men that prophesied a speedy end to the war that I know of were the German high command, and they talk about that, naming a new date every few months or so. But we cannot, and we have to be prepared, then, for a long pull here.

* * * Were the entire continent of Europe to be mobilized against us, there would not be a single resource in the United States that we could afford to overlook. And if you want to have that when you need it, you are going to have to begin now, and not later. You cannot have any interference or handicaps in defense. It is a continuous process, and you have to have your material and your resources ready all the time. If there is a lag in between there, the consequence to the country might be such that I think you and I would not care to share the responsibility of it.

* * * The bulk of the materials that are needed are not materials in which there is any shortage, principally cement. The bulk of the labor is not the labor of which there is a shortage. A large part of it is unskilled. The skilled construction labor much of it will be freed in the coming months and years, as the defense plants which have been under construction cease to be construction jobs and go into operation, freeing those men.

* * * if we try to bear out a little here or have a special interest there, in an industry or a section, each for himself, what we propose quite rationally will be impossible to do, and therefore prevent this country from developing at the time when it needs it. The reference I have is that we would be headed for the same result as another sister republic. I can only say that that kind of reasoning is never permitted to enter into the consideration of a subject like this.

Secretary of Navy KNOX. My recent experience as Secretary of the Navy emphasizes in my mind what a great boon it would have been to national defense now if when this project was first proposed it had been agreed to and put into effect. If that had been done it would not have been only along the 12,000 miles of coast line that we now have scattered our shipyards for building combatant ships, but it would have been along additional thousands of miles of inland waters, completely safe from any dangers from without, where we could be building cruisers, destroyers, submarines right now.

There is an advantage in construction in the interior, not only one of security, one of nearness to raw materials and in a region where there is an abundance of skilled labor, but it would have been of tremendous advantage to me as the Secretary of the Navy, in letting these contracts for these combatant ships which we are now building in such large numbers, had this resource been available, as it might have been had this project been adopted then.

* * * we are going to live in a disturbed world for a long time, no matter what the outcome of the war may be, and in that world which is out of balance and struggling for a new and secure footing the control of the seas is going to be of immense importance.

Along with the development of modern sea power has come a new power—that of the air. To have a region in a time of turmoil and disturbance and of possible threatened war, where we could proceed with reasonable security in maintaining that predominance in sea power, which such a state of the world might require, would be an immensely invaluable national asset. So in your consideration of this whole question I hope you gentlemen will bear in mind the tremendously increased importance of sea power in the world for the next 25 or 50 years at least.

* * * I cannot in my judgment—in my opinion—overexaggerate, overemphasize, the importance to that entire region (the Midwest) of having access to salt water in vessels of sufficient size to carry their cargoes unbroken from the point of loading to the point of unloading.

All of you no doubt have studied Europe and visited Europe and are aware of how that intensified industrial region of middle Europe has developed its river communications. They are of first importance, for instance to Germany.

We are going to be living in a world thoroughly disjointed, pretty well destroyed by the activities of war for years after this war is over. * * *

I don't know how long this war will last. It is pure speculation. But this thing I think I can be fairly confident of: That the need for protection on the high seas will be here for a long time to come, and anything we do which will enable us to build more rapidly and particularly build more securely, and which will enable us to spread the work around the country in a more equitable fashion, I believe takes on the character of good, sound statesmanship.

Governor HERBERT LEHMAN of New York, * * * We have been frankly advised and have been put upon notice by the highest authorities of our Government, charged with responsibility for the national defense, that we are today faced with existing or threatened shortages in such essential materials and facilities as power, aluminum, railroad equipment, steel, and shipping. To every one of these needs the St. Lawrence project will contribute, either directly or indirectly, in a very substantial way.

The question, therefore, of sectional, local, or group advantages sinks into insignificance and is entitled to no consideration whatever at a time when we must utilize every means to contribute to the economic strength and security of our country and to protect our very way of life.

Careful study of the impartial and exhaustive reports of the Department of Commerce and other public agencies which have considered this project convince me that there is no foundation for the claims that the improvement of the St. Lawrence River will have a harmful effect upon our ports or existing transportation facilities. But even if these false and exaggerated fears were in any degree justified, we could not afford to trifle with our country's security by obstruction, on such narrow grounds, of a project which promises to contribute so much to the safety and well-being of the entire Nation.

* * * I think that it is tremendously important that we use every possible means that is available to us in our defense. I think you might say, What is the object of building a two-ocean navy when the Navy will not be ready—these new ships will not be ready—until 1946, 1947, or 1948? What is the use of putting in additional locks in the Panama Canal when they will not be completed for a number of years? But it is assuming now that we are going to require a defense in what Secretary Knox described this morning as a very disordered world. I think that this thing is going to be of very great use * * *. I think I would be willing to say vital.

Admiral GEORGE H. ROCK, Retired, U. S. N. * * * I visited four of the larger lake shipyards, those at Cleveland, Lorain, Detroit, and Toledo * * * the four yards visited have capacity, yard facilities and plant to build the larger ocean-going ships which they could build if there was channel to the sea through the St. Lawrence waterway project * * * they could build destroyers and small craft but I found that, in my judgment, the two larger yards anyway, at the River Rouge and Lorain plants, could build now the 10,000-ton 8-inch gun cruisers and, of course, the smaller cruisers.

There is to this say about the yards which may not have been brought out before, and that is that they are well equipped, well organized, well staffed shipbuilding yards. They are going concerns and they have been going concerns, some of them, for 40 years. * * *

There is a great liability to stress much too strongly the thought that by the time we get the St. Lawrence waterway project finished we will not need this additional shipbuilding capacity that we will have acquired.

I cannot think of anything more shortsighted or more foolish from my viewpoint, than that. I am old enough to have lived through the Spanish-American War, and, of course, our first World War and now we are well into this war that is spreading everywhere, but in our own country. The one dominating demand in our country and by our people has been for ships and more ships—a continuous output of ships, and it seems to me that if with all these experiences so recent, we cannot have the ability to plan a moderate distance ahead and be prepared for what may happen when the next war comes, then I think we are woefully shortsighted.

* * * I consider the waterway a matter of a very great national asset and a project which adds to our national safety and for that reason I consider it of the utmost importance, regardless of whether we finish it before this present war ends or not.

Meeting of the American Business Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES E. MURRAY

OF MONTANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, June 19 (legislative day of Tuesday, June 10), 1941

ADDRESS BY HON. THURMAN W. ARNOLD

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, some days ago I asked unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a very able address delivered by Hon. Thurman W. Arnold, Assistant Attorney General of the United States, before the meeting of the American Business Congress in New York City on June 13, 1941. The address, which deals with the problem of the practical exclusion of small business enterprise in the program of national-defense production, slightly exceeded the limit of two printed pages. The estimated cost is $112.50. I renew the request that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

This is a war between industrial armies, not between military armies. It is a war in which the country which produces the fastest will win. It is a test to see whether an industrial democracy can make itself more efficient than a dictatorship.

The backbone of our industrial democracy is the small businessman. It is in small business that the great bulk of both production and distribution is found. Small business must pay the taxes to keep our war effort going. Indeed, it is for the existence of small business as against economic dictatorship that we will be fighting if we get into this war.

Today the small businessman needs representation in Washington by a governmental agency devoted to his interest as he has never needed it before. If he does not have such representation he is going to be crushed by the forces which always operate when a nation is in such a hurry to expand production that it turns to a few established groups which dominate our industrial structure. When we turn exclusively to such groups we not only destroy our industrial democracy, we also slow up production itself. This is shown by the grand jury investigations of big business cartels which the Antitrust Division is conducting today. Of course, big business is not unpatriotic. I will not say either that its loyalty is divided, but I do say that it instinctively fears expansion. It fears that overproduction will hurt its dividends after the war is over. Expansion may mean that its dominating position will be lost. Letting the little fellow in means future competition and lower prices. Above all, big business thinks that it alone can do the job. Such patterns of thought have resulted in the sluggish tempo of advance that have put the great industrial democracies so far behind Germany in the race for production of basic supplies.

For example, there are very few small independent fabricators of aluminum or magnesium today. Why is this? It is because the Aluminum Co. of America first obtained a monopoly upon the supply of that essential product. It then sold ingots to independent manufacturers at about 100 percent more than its own cost. This margin enabled the Aluminum Co. at any time it desired to go into the manufacturing business itself, continue to make a profit, and squeeze out immediately any independent that it allowed to get started.

Even the collapse of France failed to wake up the aluminum industry to the dangerous shortage which their policy of limiting production had created. Last fall, when the Antitrust Division was attempting to prove a shortage of aluminum for war needs, the Aluminum Co. of America denied it. Wishful thinkers in industry, instinctively fearing overproduction of basic materials, swallowed those statements with relief. The story was broadcas in the press that it was unpatriotic to suggest an impending shortage of aluminum. And thus the pressure to build up competing production was relieved.

Now we know there is a shortage, but we could have saved precious time and precious materials had we not listened to the wishful thinking of the men whose financial interest lay in preventing new production in order to preserve their monopoly control after the war.

But the same patterns of thought, the same fear of competing production, the same antiproductive ideas have made our economy sluggish and slow to respond to the need in other basic materials.

Last year steel was already running from 92 to 97 percent capacity. But those in control of the industry did not like to think of a coming shortage because it meant we should have to build new plants, each of which would be a competitive threat to the orderly control of the industry after the war by those already established in it.

In other words, perhaps we had better not build up the steel production that we so imperatively need today because it might give steel to buyers of automobiles and tin cans and steel construction at too low prices after the war. Steel companies during the war should not be expected to expand plants which might hurt their dividends after the war.

Last February the expected survey of steel appeared. Unconsciously colored by the antiproductive interests of the closely knit group that did not wish their control disturbed, it gave the impression that no more plants were needed. It estimated there would be a surplus for both civilian and defense needs in 1941 and even in 1942. No hurry for new production—no pressure on the dominating group to expand. So only 3½ percent additional plant capacity was planned. But only a month after the report, with the war program still in its early stages, steel operations reached 99 percent of capacity. Now we know there isn't enough steel. Yet the industry is still reluctant to expand.

One of the reasons given for not expanding was that we could turn back to the obsolete Bessemer process and put obsolete equipment into production. This is exactly the same mistake England made in the breathing space before the blitzkreig, when they thought it better to keep obsolete mills in operation rather than to expand modern methods.

Let me give one final example. Gerald Firth, president of the Firth-Stirling Steel Co., stated in 1941:

"The control of the tungsten carbide patents by the General Electric Co. and the Krupp Co. has resulted in keeping the price at exorbitant levels. Now, when the emergency has come, industry has not learned how to use tungsten carbide and has not the machines, the skilled men, or the technique which it would have had if the material had been available at the same low price at which it was available to German industries."

The Antitrust Division indicted the General Electric Co. and the Krupp Co. in New York. Immediately the cost of tungsten carbide dropped from $205 a pound to $48 a pound even in an emergency demand. Tungsten carbide is still in an experimental stage in this country. We have not developed it as Germany has because we have never allowed the competitive small businessman to have a chance at the metal. It will take at least a year to make up the loss because we wouldn't allow the small competitive businessman to get into the picture.

I can give many more illustrations but these are enough to prove my point. We will get no real expansion of production until we free the market so that the competitive force of small business, each anxious to produce and get a share for itself, may operate. New enterprise does not have accumulated capital structures to pay dividends on. It knows that it must be better than its competitors in order to survive. It cannot restrict production even if it wanted to because it lacks the power to dominate the market.

We will fail in our defense program if small business and new enterprise is not allowed to share in defense orders. And not only will we fail but we will destroy the system of independent competitive enterprise which we are trying to defend.

In other words, we must let little business into the picture. I am here to tell you that little business cannot get into the picture without protection. It is not sufficiently organized to get that protection for itself. There is, however, one instrumentality in the Government, backed by 50 years of tradition, which stands ready to free the market for new enterprises. That instrumentality is the Antitrust Division of the Department of Justice.

This is a generalization. Let's get down to concrete cases. What are the practical dangers which confront small business and how can they be guarded against?

First, there is the system of priorities in basic materials which have to be imposed because past neglect has led to present shortages. Today hundreds of small factories are finding themselves in difficulty because last year we hid our heads in the sand and refused to recognize the fact that a disastrous shortage of aluminum was already on us. This is happening in other basic materials.

But if we allow matters to take their course, if small business is not represented by an independent agency of government, each priority will have a tendency to hit the big factory first, each scarcity report on raw materials may forget the hundreds of small businesses that need them. The increases of cost will be felt by the little man in his labor and in his raw materials, and each upward surge in price will squeeze him either against an administrative price ceiling or against the buying habits of his customers. And incidentally, it will be the small businessman whom the consumer will blame for all the price spirals of the war. Unless there is some organized effort to represent the interests of small business, to see that priorities are not used in such a way that they lead to monopoly control, little business may have to go out of business. It is the duty of the Antitrust Division to keep abreast of this problem of small business and to work in cooperation with other defense agencies to see that the man who cannot afford an agency in Washington is not swept out of the picture by the persuasive ability of those already established in the industry combined with the pressure for speed on those directing the defense effort.

The second hazard to small business is the danger that he will not be allowed to share in the production for national defense. This will not be the fault of those in charge of production if they are not furnished guidance and advice from that public defender of the small businessman, the Antitrust Division. They do not have time to consider all problems. In great emergencies with shortages of material and labor only the most vocal, to wit, the largest elements of business, can make themselves heard. Washington corridors are so long that those who are not trained to find their way are lost. What was more natural, for example, than to call on the Aluminum Co. in the early stages of the defense production to supply all new capacity for aluminum. It was almost treason 6 months ago to suggest that the small businessman might be able to produce aluminum if you gave him the chance. The same is true of other essential materials, including zinc, copper, manganese and steel. Where the small businessman is frozen out on his orders, on his supplies, on his labor, on his transportation problems, it is not delivered. It is only the result of the short-time line of least resistance.

Let me give you a case history taken from the syndicated column of that brilliant commentator, Ernest Lindley, published on May 23. I quote:

"Here is a brief case history which illustrates two of the most serious criticisms of the direction of our defense production program. It is the experience of the head of a midwestern manufacturer of brass, aluminum, and zinc castings and stampings.

The firm has 460 employees, including an engineering staff and 16 tool-and-die makers, and about 200 machine tools. Its normal business is making such things as parts for refrigerators. The firm is in excellent financial condition. Until recently it was working around the clock: some departments on three shifts and others on two 10-hour shifts.

Some months ago its president sized up the dimensions of the defense program and decided they would put a dent in his regular business. He saw that there probably would not be enough brass, zinc, and aluminum to meet all civilian needs. He suspected also that considerable amounts of steel would have to be diverted from civilian to military channels. Some of his business friends belittled his fears, but as the days passed and it became harder to get the metals he needed, he set out to try to get some defense business.

Knowing a little about the Government and the defense agencies—which are completely unknown to many small manufacturers—he lost no time in learning what steps he should take.

He was told to offer his services as a subcontractor to the large concerns which had the big defense orders. He was informed that the policy of O. P. M. was to bring these smaller facilities into use by encouraging the big concerns to subcontract parts.

So he wrote to a selected list of prime contractors—500 in all—stating exactly what his plant was set up to do. He did not get even one serious nibble, much less a subcontract.

He filed with the Defense Contract Service Office in Detroit a complete survey of his plant. All he got there was a suggestion that he write to the other regional offices, making sure that he told them he had already been in touch with the Detroit office, since otherwise his letters would be forwarded to Detroit.

Finally the Detroit office invited him to submit bids on two fuses for the British. Neither was of a type that previously had been manufactured in this country. Of the 200 machines in his plant, 8—all automatic screw machines—could be used in making the fuses. He submitted a bid, but with it the statement that he could not produce the fuses unless he also got business to keep the rest of his plant going.

Meanwhile, the real pinch has come in supplies of metals. He can get almost no brass, zinc, and aluminum. His refrigerator-making clients have realized that they are going to have to find substitutes—including substitutes for a large amount of steel—or else suspend production.

Last week our exhibit X had to lay off his night shift. His 18 highly skilled tool and die makers are idle.

He has machines and men of exactly the type and training desperately needed for defense production. But they are not being used. And unless they are put to work quickly, he will have to suspend business entirely and let his organization go to pieces.

Early this week, he arrived in Washington to make the rounds of the defense agencies—the Army, the Navy, and O. P. M. He received sympathetic hearings, but, up to the time this was written, no action.

Billions of dollars' worth of defense orders have been poured forth, largely into big corporations. Huge new plants are being built from the bottom up at a cost of hundreds of millions of dollars. The machine-tool industry is staggering under a record-breaking load of orders.

Here is a plant ready to go. It has the machines, the trained men, the engineers, and management. It doesn't need a dollar from the Government, either for expansion or working capital. It can make any number of items important to defense without adding even so much as one machine to its equipment, and with a few new machines here and there its scope could be greatly expanded.

It is organized and manned for two and three-shift operation, while many other producers are still working only one shift.

Our exhibit X is confident that there are hundreds, perhaps several thousands, of small manufacturers who are getting caught in this double squeeze. Many are less well equipped than he is to move immediately into defense production. But, for lack of metal for civilian use, they will have to suspend operation and disband their organizations. Whether they would ever come to life again is doubtful.

What was the trouble? Who is to blame for this situation? The O. P. M.? Emphatically not. The agency devoted to production in a hurry cannot find the time to take care of the problems of monopoly control at the same time. The trouble was that this businessman and the public generally did not know that the Antitrust Division is set up to see that the monopoly tendencies illustrated in this case history did not occur. No complaint was sent in. Where complaints have been sent in we have been able to get results. For example, the McKeesport Bulletin of May 10 contains an announcement by Mr. Philip McKenna, president of the McKenna Metals Co., that at the present time his production is 10 times as great as it was a year ago; that he has 182 employees who operate 24 hours a day and 6 days a week, that his rates of pay have advanced. If it had not been for the action taken by the Antitrust Division Mr. McKenna's company would have been unable to survive because of a private N. R. A. code formulated, dominated and policed by the General Electric Co. Mr. McKenna generously gives us credit in the following statement:

"The present test of the productive strength of free enterprise under American principles against the productive strength of dictatorship-controlled people will prove the effectiveness of private initiative and free workers in the present struggle for the future of the world. It may be remembered that the McKenna Metals Co. owes its existence to protection under American law, and that the Department of Justice disclosed the monopolistic practices contrary to American antitrust laws."

The third thing that is going to hit the small businessman is restrictions on the distribution of necessities and artificially fixed prices. At first glance it may appear that the small businessmen are fabricators and distributors, and can pass the increase on to the consumer. Unfortunately for you, however, the consumer has an out—he can tighten his belt and go without, while you whistle. Even where consumers have increased purchasing power to spend on higher prices, yet their old price habits will squeeze you against price ceilings if artificially fixed distribution costs are not eliminated. For example, in the Rocky Mountain region lumber and cement prices were higher than anywhere else in the country, due to the fact that no one who did not belong to the ring and follow its policy could get a foothold in business. Only antitrust prosecutions will clean up situations such as this.

Small business need not fear efficiency of mass production. Where the savings of large organizations are passed on to consumers the increased purchasing power which results from making the consumer's dollar go further will give opportunity to thousands of small businessmen. But where there is an artificial spread or a restriction of production the small businessmen will disappear because they cannot survive in a dominated market.

In the scarcity period ahead little businessmen without protection will become littler unless there is an organization to protect their interests, which also happen to be the interests of consumers.

And, finally, there is another set of organizations restricting production and keeping more efficient methods out of the market against whom small business must have the protection of the Sherman Act. I am referring to the middlemen of labor, the unions that control transportation, installation, and distribution, who have gotten themselves into a position that they may tell consumers what they may buy and businessmen what they may sell; who determine what goes into a house; who determine the cost of distribution of food products in large cities. I am not talking about strikes in the defense area. This is an entirely different problem. It is a problem which affects chiefly the small businessman and consumers.

Labor organizations today—I do not say all labor organizations, but some—are putting protective tariffs around cities. They are restricting skills. They are preventing the use of more efficient methods; they are charging the small businessman for unnecessary labor; they are preventing the use of more efficient materials; they are crushing small businessmen in jurisdictional wars between rival unions; and, finally, by the force of coercion, they are eliminating entirely from the field such new enterprise as they desire to keep out.

For example, in one large city recently a labor leader told some contractors that they could not go into business at all; in another, three manufacturers were forced out of business. One small businessman in a large city attempted to redecorate his display rooms. He was not allowed to use a spray gun to put on paint because it was too fast. The telephone union wouldn't enter the place until the painters got out. The electrician union would not work until the telephone union got out. And, finally, to cap the climax, when he wanted to move in some refrigerators, the teamsters' union delivered them to the curb, and he had to get another union to haul them in. He told me that it took him almost double the time and cost 50 percent more in this time of rising prices.

I quote from the bylaws of a bakers' union, located in a large city, which is typical of what some unions are doing:

"Article 6, section 7:

"Whenever in the judgment of the Bakers Local Union 118 any firm or combination of firms are engaged in unfair or unwarranted competition for trade and in the selling of bakery products and against the best interests of the bakery industry, it shall be authorized and it shall be its duty to have such practices stopped even to the extent of withdrawing our members from employment of such concerns as will persist in such detrimental and ruinous practices.

"WM. WARNER POOLE.
"J. A. SMITH.
"CHAS. N. MILLER."

I quote from testimony given in an investigation of another union verbatim, except I left out the names:

"A prominent labor leader said in the presence of all those at this conference: 'Why don't you fellows get wise and play ball with us. You know that prices for your products in your home State are too low and you ought to do something about it. If you do, we can control the price of these products in your State just as we do in the two adjoining States. We can control them through combinations with the teamsters' union. It will take time. It may take a year or two, but this can be done by raising the prices 5 or 10 cents at a time.'"

What is the use of talking about protecting small businessmen and consumers against price spirals in the face of a situation where unions are permitted to impose protective tariffs, keep out more efficient methods and materials, to crush small businessmen between the claims of rival unions in which the businessmen have no concern, and to eliminate such small businessmen that they do not happen to like. Under recent Supreme Court decisions, the unions claim that they are completely immune to many prosecutions for restrictive practices of the character I am describing. Thus given their head, these practices are increasing all over the United States. They are not accompanied by strikes because strikes are unnecessary. The unions able to exercise this power are unions like the teamsters, the carpenters, the glaziers, the electricians; unions connected with the distribution and processing of food. Such unions stand between the consumer and the producer. They have the same power that a railroad would have if we allow railroads to tell businessmen and consumers in New York City what could be shipped in.

In the furore which has been created by defense strikes this exploitation of consumers and small businessmen has been forgotten in the public press. But the Antitrust Division has not forgotten them. We are trying to bring it to the attention of business and I am trying to bring it to your attention now, so that necessary amendments to the law can be had to compel powerful labor organizations to confine themselves to the legitimate purposes of those organizations.

We are for the legitimate purposes of those organizations, and we regard such organizations as a part of the competitive system which we are trying to protect. We have no desire to limit the right to strike for wages, hours, health, safety, collective bargaining or any legitimate purpose. We simply are trying to protect the small businessmen from being crushed and the consumer from being exploited to gain objectives which have no connection with any purpose of a reasonable labor movement.

No one defends these practices, not even the labor leaders. They say, however, that they do not trust the courts to decide such simple questions as the difference between compelling the employer to use unnecessary labor on the one hand and enforcing rules of safety, health, and the prevention of speed-up systems on the other hand. I reply, that democracy is in danger when any powerful organization stands before the public and says that it cannot trust the courts.

Congress has recently shown its realization of the importance of the problems dealt with by the Antitrust Division by increasing our appropriation about 60 percent. We must build an organization for greater service to small businessmen and to consumers. We are going to use part of this appropriation to set up a separate section in the Antitrust Division which will contact business organizations so that the Division can become a more efficient public defender and public agent of the small businessmen, who otherwise might be lost in the complexities of the vast organization in Washington.

That organization will have the following functions: First, it will try to be a clearing house of complaints from small businessmen all over the country. It will offer an office to which small businessmen can present their complaints in absolute confidence, it will offer them a skilled service in order to solve their problems where those problems concern monopoly control. It will use all the forces of law at the disposal of the Division in order to get small businessmen into the market and to free them from the restrictions of organized groups

This organization in the Antitrust Division will not be effective without the help of groups like your organization. You must organize and let your members know that a public defender for your interests does exist and that they can come to us for relief.

We have been assured of complete cooperation from the Office of Production Management and from Mr. Leon Henderson's Office of Price Administration and Civilian Supply. We will not work in opposition to these defense agencies but we will aid them. They are as interested in getting full production from both large business and small business as we are. They are interested in the assistance which the Antitrust Division can give them to these ends. Large business has always had offices in Washington, small business has not. The Antitrust Division is going to try to fill that gap. We will be successful if small business will organize to help us.

All of us, inside and outside of Government, want to cooperate in the great national-defense effort. Cooperation is not easy. The techniques of cooperation involve the highest kind of statesmanship. If this were a dictatorship each one of us would be told what to do and we would not have any responsibility of our own. But this is not a dictatorship, and our free enterprise democratic system forms the framework for our defense program. This means that each one of us has a responsibility to discover how we can fit into this tremendous program of production. With your help, the Antitrust Division intends to see that the small businessman can play his part.

The So-Called Union Now Movement

REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANK B. KEEFE

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 19, 1941

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Speaker, it is perfectly apparent that a well-financed, well-organized but very small minority group, masquerading under the title of "Union Now" is attempting to destroy our independence and our system of government by actively advocating an immediate coalition under a supergovernment with England and her dominion colonies.

Mr. Speaker, this Congress either by separate committee or through the Dies committee should investigate the background of this organization known as Union Now. Let us find out who is furnishing the money and who are the people that are putting in ads in the newspapers all over America demanding that we surrender our Constitution and our form of government. I am glad that the editor of one of the leading newspapers of my district has written a timely editorial on this subject.

His comment is as follows:

[From the Sheboygan (Wis.) Press of June 17, 1941]

WE WILL NOT SURRENDER

From an organization of women in the East comes the statement that a recent poll showed that 5 percent of the women who answered a questionnaire, favored a union with the British, carrying us back to the days before separation with the mother country.

So far as the two governments are concerned there is little in common. The United States is a democracy, the outgrowth of a free and independent Nation that rebelled against oppressive acts of the mother country.

In the present crisis some people forget the price we paid to gain our liberty, and it is well to recall history, if no other reason than to renew our pledge to George Washington, the Father of Our Country, and to hold high the torch of liberty which has been a sustaining force in the United States.

The questionnaire was sent to every section of the country, and it is not at all surprising that a sprinkling of our citizens—5 percent voted as they did. This Nation, the melting pot of the world, has within its borders those who still fail to recognize that they can serve but one country. Some still hold with Hitler, others think in terms of England, and so we could name minorities favorable to every nation on the face of the globe. To all of these we would say you have cast your lot here in America, and loyalty demands that you support but one government and one flag—these United States and Old Glory.

The surprising part of the Union Now movement which brought about a vote of 5 percent for merging the two countries—the United States and England came largely from the Eastern and New England States, formerly comprising the colonies. This is all the more surprising, when you consider that American liberty was born as the result of the heroism of the men and women of the Colonies who fought oppression and dethroned it.

In this European war it is natural that people will take sides, for dictatorship has little or no appeal on this side of the water. But to advocate a union of England and the United States, would be suicide for our form of government.

The Declaration of Independence is a live and living document, with certain truths that we cannot, no we must not forget. Let us quote:

"We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. That to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed; and that whenever any form of government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the right of the people to alter or to abolish it, and to institute a new government.

* * * "When a long train of abuses and usurpations, pursuing invariably the same object, evinces a design to reduce them under absolute despotism, it is their right, it is their duty, to throw off such government, and to provide new guards for their future security. Such has been the patient sufferance of these colonies, and such is now the necessity which constrains them to alter their former systems of government. The history of the present king of Great Britain is a history of repeated injuries and usurpations, all having, in direct object the establishment of an absolute tyranny over these States. * * *

"And for the support of this declaration, with a firm reliance on the protection of Divine Providence, we mutually pledge to each other our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honor."

If the Declaration of Independence is not a sustaining influence which should guide us in keeping faith let me quote from Daniel Webster:

"My judgment approves this measure and my whole heart is in it. All that I have, and all that I am, and all that I hope, in this life, I am now ready here to stake upon it: And I leave off as I began, that, live or die, survive or perish, I am for the Declaration of Independence. It is my living sentiment, and by the blessing of God it shall be my dying sentiment, independence now, and independence forever!"

If we forget the words of the Declaration of Independence, our Daniel Webster and the men who made this declaration come true by their heroic action on the field of battle, then we do not deserve to enjoy the fruits of a free democracy. To turn back the pages of history to despotism would be renouncing all that the ages have given us—our Washington and our Lincoln.

We will fuse only with those who come to our shores and are true Americans. In this crisis we will meet every issue and we will fight every effort made to take away the liberty given us by men like Patrick Henry, who said, "Give me liberty or give me death."

This is our answer to the movement for a union with any other country.

We are building our defenses to the end that any threat from anywhere in the world to our liberty will be met and defended. Let us keep our feet on the ground and follow the worthy example set by the founders of the colonies—later the United States of America.

Closing of German Consulates

REMARKS

OF

HON. JOE HENDRICKS

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 19, 1941

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the people of this country are applauding the President for the action taken in regard to the strike situation and also for closing the German consulates in this country. Both of these acts will have a remarkable effect, but I do not think that the job is nearly done. When the strikes are settled I am afraid that we are going to have a wave of sabotage, and I am not the only one of this belief. Many Members of this House, and also high officials, are of the same opinion. With this in view, I have introduced a bill making sabotage a death penalty upon the recommendation of a jury. We are holding hearings on this bill before the Judiciary Committee tomorrow morning at 10:30 and I will appreciate any support which the Members may offer on this bill. In addition to this I have also sent letters to the President and Secretary of State today suggesting that they inform the German Government that Wilhelm Tannenberg, first secretary in the Germany Embassy in Washington, is persona non grata and that the Government recall him at once. I think that Tannenberg is another Boy-ed and should be gotten out of this country.

The letter to the President follows:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., June 19, 1941.

Hon. FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT,
President of the United States,
The White House, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: The American people are applauding the action of the State Department and the President in closing the German consulates in this country and tightening the regulations for admission of visitors from Germany or any other countries dominated by the Nazis. At the same time they are looking forward to a general housecleaning.

I suggest that one step in ridding this country of dangerous men would be for the President and the State Department to inform the German Government that Wilhelm Tannenberg, first secretary to the German Embassy in Washington, is persona non grata and request his recall immediately.

I may point out that over a period of years Wilhelm Tannenberg was the representative of the German Government, before the German American Mixed Claims Commission, on the Black Tom and Kingsland, N. J., sabotage cases. In addition to this Wilhelm Tannenberg assisted some years ago in the organizing of German-American bunds or at least similar organizations in this country. He finally withdrew because of pressure.

Wilhelm Tannenberg could take the position that he should not stand convicted because he represented his Government in these sabotage cases or because he was active in assisting in the establishment of German-American bunds, but I may point out that in confidence prominent people in Washington and high officials in Government who are in position to know Wilhelm Tannenberg are convinced that he is a very brilliant man and that he would not hesitate one moment in taking action that would assist his government to the detriment of our national defense, if he were convinced he could not be convicted of his acts.

I would also like to say that while the Government's action in having the Army take over the Inglewood, Calif., aircraft factory and its strong stand concerning further hampering of the defense program will no doubt have a very remarkable effect on subversive activities, it is my opinion and the opinion of many others that when the strikes are settled we will have a wave of sabotage throughout the country, and it would not surprise me at all if Wilhelm Tannenberg were to become the chief agent of the German Government in directing these activities. I therefore firmly suggest that for the best interest of this country the President and the State Department ask the German Government to recall Wilhelm Tannenberg, and at the same time that the actions of the German Embassy in Washington be watched closely.

With kindest regards, I beg to remain.

Respectfully,

JOE HENDRICKS.

Protecting the Women of the District of Columbia

REMARKS

OF

HON. STEPHEN M. YOUNG

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 19, 1941

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Speaker, the mothers of this Nation are shocked and terrified over the unsolved criminal assaults upon and murders of young women in Washington. In the District of Columbia working for their Government are young women from every State and Territory of this Union. We in Congress are determined that their stay in the District shall be safe. We in the Congress have confidence in the District of Columbia Committee of the House of Representatives. I personally hope that our District Committee will put aside everything else and concentrate its efforts upon the solution of these unsolved murders. If additional detectives are needed and if certain streets should be better lighted, let us provide the necessary legislation immediately.

Incidentally the committee should know that eight policemen are detailed every moment of the day and night to protect a little group of picketeers before the home of the President of the United States.

For about 6 weeks now the police have permitted a group of publicity seeking, nonworking morons to parade in front of the home of our President bearing placards denunciatory of our Chief Executive. Residents and visitors here become righteously indignant over the reprehensible tactics of these paraders. They are disturbing the home life of our President. Whether you support or oppose his domestic or foreign policies, you will concede that he is entitled to have his home life respected. Furthermore, the White House is an American shrine. Constituents of mine from Ohio bringing their children here—perhaps upon the only trip they will ever make to the Capital of their country—are distressed and angered to see this ugly, un-American group of parading picketeers the first and last time they look at the White House.

These police officers detailed to afford protection to a publicity seeking, un-American group who are abusing the right to peaceably assemble and petition, which every American enjoys, could be detailed to more important work in preventing crimes of violence and making the streets of Washington safe for women who live and work here.

Each morning as long as this picketing parade lasts, a patrol wagon should gather in the picketeers and their placards and haul them to the police station for investigation. Are they citizens? What are they doing in Washington? Are they suspicious persons? Are they vagrants? Why are they not working? Who pays them to picket? Don't they know if they picketed any embassy they would be thrown into jail immediately? Have they ever been arrested and convicted of crimes? These and other questions should be hurled at them. Then for those against whom there are grounds for further detention, I would suggest that the police place appropriate charges. The others could be released after about 6 hours' detention, preferably in an inside room without any air-conditioning advantages; and a patrol wagon driver and one policeman should continue this process each day until the President's home is respected. Let this un-American group picket the Capitol and the House and Senate Office Buildings if they feel they must undertake picketing exercises. The mothers of this Nation and women who work and live here should have protection ahead of a communistic group of picketeers.

Section 117 of the Code of the District of Columbia forbids, among other things, crowding, obstructing, or incommoding—

The free use of any such street, avenue, alley, road, highway, or any of the foot pavements thereof or the free entrance into any public or private building or enclosure.

Possibility of Increased Federal Gasoline Tax Viewed With Apprehension

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ESTES KEFAUVER

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 19, 1941

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. Speaker, the serious practical difficulties which confront the public authorities in the raising of revenues are appreciated fully, because a few years ago I had the good fortune to have been selected as State commissioner of taxation and finance by Gov. Prentice Cooper during his first term of office in Tennessee. Because of this background of practical experience, moreover, there is even a more natural tendency for my attention to be focused more forcefully upon considerations of equity and justice in apportionment of the tax burden than otherwise might be the case.

HIGH STATE LEVIES

Tennessee is one of the three States which collect the highest gasoline tax in the Nation, 7 cents per gallon. The other two are Florida and Louisiana. For this reason alone residents of Tennessee believe that they are qualified eminently to participate actively in any discussion of gasoline taxation.

SIZABLE BONDED DEBT

There may be some wonderment as to the specific reasons why such high rates of taxation are imposed upon gasoline in Tennessee. The answer is mainly the same one which is found in several of the other Southern States; that is, sizable bonded debt for highways. In Tennessee, for example, the State's share of the gasoline tax, which amounts to 5 cents of the 7 cents, specifically is pledged in its entirety for retirement of these bonds. Fortunately for the State and its highway system, in recent years all of the revenue from this portion of the tax has not been required for this particular purpose. As a result it has been possible to utilize the excess in maintenance of the highway system and, through matching of available Federal aid, to carry on a limited program of new construction as well. The remaining 2 cents of the tax is allocated to the counties for their use in improvement of secondary roads.

POSSIBLE EFFECTS OF INCREASED FEDERAL TAXATION

Citizens in Tennessee are inclined to view with disfavor any further increase in the Federal gasoline tax for certain very cogent reasons. They recognize only too clearly that any such action conceivably might affect the revenue producing capacity of their own State tax. If that should happen, then the State and its citizenry would be confronted with either of two eventualities. In the first place, the State's ability to meet payments of interest on its outstanding debt and the prompt retirement of maturities as now scheduled might be made more difficult. Likewise the continued improvement of the county roads also might be affected because of the direct dependence of these local units upon their 2-cent share of the gasoline tax for this purpose. In the one case, the State's position from a fiscal standpoint might be made more difficult; in the other, the counties might be required to forego certain improvements in roads which may be needed badly.

POSSIBLE NULLIFICATION OF BENEFITS OF T. V. A.

It is with mingled feelings that this plea is being presented. Because my constituency is in the heart of the region benefited most directly by the Tennessee Valley Authority, the far-reaching benefits which have been conferred upon the populace through such beneficences of the Federal Government are appreciated thoroughly. This factor in itself, however, prompts even stronger emphasis of the inequity involved in an increased Federal gasoline tax.

Through the activities of the Tennessee Valley Authority many of my constituents have begun to enjoy life for the first time. Transportation by truck and the private automobile are relied upon to an unusual degree in this area. Increased Federal taxation of gasoline, therefore, when added to the very high rates which residents of this area even now must pay to the State, therefore, would tend to preclude further extension of the use of these media of transportation and thereby might nullify much of the progress which has been achieved by the Federal Government in this area. It is difficult to understand why the same government which has conferred such marked benefits upon the residents of Tennessee on the one hand now suddenly should forestall full enjoyment of these same benefits with the other hand.

INEVITABLE CONCLUSIONS TO BE DRAWN

Certain inevitable conclusions, therefore, must be drawn from the above discussion. One is that such increased Federal taxation would impose a further burden upon residents of Tennessee in addition to the one which they now must bear in order to provide the State and the counties with required funds for highways. The other is that it is difficult to envisage the logic of the Federal Government's endeavoring to confer benefits upon the people of Tennessee through the T. V. A. on the one hand, and then nullifying many of those benefits through unwise taxation on the other. So far as residents of Tennessee are concerned, therefore, the only possible conclusion which can be drawn is that any increase in the Federal gasoline tax would be most adverse in its effects upon the State and the citizenry.

Denison Dam Decision of United States Supreme Court Points Way to Inevitable Arkansas Valley Authority

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLYDE T. ELLIS

OF ARKANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 19, 1941

EDITORIAL FROM THE SOUTHWEST AMERICAN, FORT SMITH, ARK.

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Speaker, the decision of the United States Supreme Court on June 2 upholding the authority of Congress in its effort to harness the Red River and to build the Denison Dam points the way to the inevitable Arkansas Valley authority—or some other authority, by whatever name it is known.

Herewith, I insert a most excellent editorial from the Southwest American, Fort Smith, Ark.:

[From the Southwest American, Fort Smith, Ark.]

DENISON DAM WINS

All the Southwest is vitally concerned with the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States Monday holding the Federal Government has the power to construct and operate the Denison Dam on the Red River between Oklahoma and Texas.

By unanimous vote, the Court extended its interpretation of Federal power over navigable streams to include tributaries of navigable streams. The power of the Federal Government to build the Red River dam is based, at least in part, upon the fact that the Red is a tributary of the Mississippi, which is navigable in fact as well as in theory.

Incomplete reports of the court's decision do not clarify the Court's holding upon various questions raised in the attack by Gov. Leon Phillips on the Denison Dam project. Apparently, all the questions were resolved in the Government's favor.

The question which received most attention in the recent oral argument before the Court was whether or not the Federal Government could build a dam higher than is necessary for flood control in order to provide power production at the same time. Apparently, the Court has decided that the Federal Government has that power.

The questions presented in this case were vitally important to the whole program of flood control, power production, and intelligent use of the water resources of the Nation.

The Denison Dam is a dual-purpose project. It is designed to protect from floods all the valley of the Red below the dam, including lands in Texas, Arkansas, and Louisiana. It is designed, too, to produce a great amount of electric energy which is needed for the industrial development of the Southwest.

It is similar in purpose and effect to the Norfolk Dam in Arkansas, now under construction, the Nimrod Dam in Arkansas, which is further along toward completion, and a number of other dual-purpose dams which the United States engineers have recommended for the valleys of the Arkansas, the Red, the White, and the St. Francis.

If the Supreme Court's decision had gone the other way, great damage would have been done both to existing projects and to those which are yet to be authorized.

Since the court's decision approves the Federal power in this field, the way is open to a concerted program of flood control, power production, and conservation of water, soil, timber, mineral, and human resources—all embraced in the proposed Arkansas Valley Authority proposal.

The legal right of the Federal Government to construct and operate dams for power production as well as flood control is the foundation of such a project as A. V. A., just as it is of the T. V. A., now in its eighth year.

Governor Phillips of Oklahoma has waged a hard fight to keep the Federal Government from building the Denison dam. He had a right to present the arguments he has presented to determine the extent of the Federal Government's powers. He has lost. A great many people in the Southwest—we believe the majority—do not agree with Governor Phillips' viewpoint. The matter has been tried out in the approved American way and decided. Now let's get together and try to get the full benefit of Federal development and the use of our water resources.

Reciprocal Trade Agreements

REMARKS

OF

HON. ALLEN T. TREADWAY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 19, 1941

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, on page 5244 of the RECORD the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. COFFEE] called attention to the need of the agricultural congressional group appearing before the Committee on Reciprocal Tariff Information to protest against the trade agreements with Argentina and Uruguay, protection needed on products of this country.

I want not only to protest against that agreement but against every other trade agreement in the name of agriculture and of industry as well. I am sorry the gentleman from Nebraska did not include industry as well as agriculture, for I have consistently defended both and objected to all trade agreements. It is my opinion that trade agreements do not provide the way to deal with tariff changes.

My only purpose in rising at this time is to say that the same protest should be registered in connection with the reduction of the tariff on any competitive foreign product, whether of the farm or factory. The American farmer and the American wage earner are equally entitled to the benefit of the home market to the full extent of their ability to supply it.

Of course, as the gentleman from Nebraska said, all that a mere Member of Congress can do under the present program is to register his protest, since under the New Deal the tariff- and treaty-making powers of Congress have been transferred to the executive branch. We have no power to stop these reductions, or to overturn them after they have been made.

I just want to remind the Members that while these two treaties were dropped just prior to the time the resolution to extend the trade-treaty program came up for consideration, I predicted that they would again be taken up after the extension was granted. I urged at that time that Congress reserve to itself the power to approve these treaties before they become effective, but that advice was not heeded. Now we have the treaties in the process of negotiation again, and we are powerless to do anything about them except register our protest.

Do not forget that these treaties will be binding for 3 years, and that in the meantime the hands of Congress will be tied against taking any steps to protect domestic producers. If the present emergency throughout the world should end, and the men who are now under arms go back to work, we can expect a tidal wave of competitive foreign imports of all kinds under the thousand-odd reductions in the tariff that have already been made. We should not make matters any worse by entering into any more treaties, but should take appropriate steps to get rid of those which now threaten our home market.

Communism in Industry

REMARKS

OF

HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 19, 1941

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, Members of Congress and the country generally were shocked this week by developments in the defense strikes. With overwhelming evidence that Communists are working through the unions, particularly through the C. I. O. unions, to wreck the national defense, and with the Government having to move troops into the North American Aviation plant at Inglewood, Calif., after the leaders of the striking workers had flagrantly defied the President of the United States and the national security, it was expected that there would be a cleaning out of the subversive influences in the labor unions, and that sabotage by these subversive agents would be brought to an end.

It was, therefore, a great shock to the Congress and to the American people when C. I. O. President Philip Murray, on June 16, vehemently denied press reports which he termed "fantastic," and the work of "labor's enemies," that his organization was embarking on a purge of communistic members. Murray implied that the charge of radical leadership, in the recent strikes, including the Inglewood, Calif., strike, and the woodworkers' strike in the Northwest, was "malicious slander of duly elected officials."

The Congress and the country had a right to expect that Philip Murray, along with President William Green, of the A. F. of L., and other labor leaders, would be among the very first to move to purge the ranks of organized labor of Communists, Fascists, Nazis, saboteurs, and other fifth columnists. The Congress and the people had a right to expect that the country's interest would be placed above the selfish interests of greedy, power-lustful racketeers who have been using the unions to feather their own nests and further their own schemes. The Congress and the country had a right to expect that a man who has been honored, as Philip Murray has been honored, in the country of his adoption, and a man who has been elevated to the responsible position he occupies in the economic side of the national defense would be big enough, and patriotic enough, to lead his union back to patriotic effort in the struggle to arm the Nation for its safety.

The Congress and the country now have a right to expect that, regardless of Mr. Philip Murray or any other labor leaders, the Government will move to see that the defense work now so desperately needed goes forward unhindered.

It is futile, and worse than impudent, for any labor leader to contend that the outbreak of strikes on the Pacific coast, which were declared to be "outlaw" strikes by responsible union officials themselves, was not the result of the machinations of Communists and other subversive elements. It is clear that these strikes were the result of deliberate efforts designed to hamstring, and if possible, to defeat, the national defense

I believe the vast majority in organized labor is just as patriotic as are other citizens of this country, and wish to see us provided with an adequate national defense at the earliest possible date, and it serves the cause of defense ill indeed for a man as important as Philip Murray, a member of the Mediation Board as he is a man who has the confidence of several million wage earners, to take a position now that his organization is not going to purge itself of subversive influences, simply because some contingents or minority groups of the C. I. O. oppose such action.

Any man or woman of any race, color, or nationality, who, in these hours of the Nation's peril, conspires or works to overthrow our American form of government, and our American way of life, not only should be scourged off the Government pay rolls—where there are all too many of this ilk—but should be rendered harmless to the national defense by whatever means necessary. To continue to shield these subversive agents under the cloak of union respectability is to give aid and comfort to the most deadly enemies of this Nation.

Mr. Philip Murray must be as fully aware of these facts as any other citizen, and in his position of trust and responsibility he should not only be more cognizant of these conditions, but he should be the more anxious to eliminate them.

If Mr. Murray continues to oppose the purging of subversive agents from the labor unions of the United States, Mr. Murray should himself be purged from the Mediation Board and from any position under the Government in the national-defense plan.

The Nation's safety demands that only those Americans who are first and foremost concerned with the national defense and the security of the Nation shall be permitted to continue longer in positions of power and influence in the Government.

To follow any other course than this, to allow those who are sympathetic to Communists in the labor unions to remain in positions of power and influence, is nothing short of treason to the Nation.

Need for Great Caution Relative to Permitting Aliens To Enter America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LINDLEY BECKWORTH

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 19, 1941

Mr. BECKWORTH. Mr. Speaker, it has been my contention that the time is at hand when the most careful scrutiny should be exercised concerning any person who by any method or under any pretext seeks to enter America.

Frequently we have read that prior to the subjugation of countries by aggressor nations tourists in large numbers have been sent by the aggressor nations to the countries to be subdued and overrun. I am not at all sure America and the Western Hemisphere are not now being subjected in part to the same or a kindred procedure.

I desire to include in the RECORD a memorandum I have recently received from the Visa Division of the State Department:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
VISA DEPARTMENT,
June 5, 1941.

MEMORANDUM CONCERNING NUMBER OF VISAS ISSUED FROM JULY 1, 1940, TO JUNE 4, 1941

There have been received in the Department from consular offices throughout the world 209,756 copies of visas issued. Approximately one-third of this number are immigration visas—quota and nonquota. Approximately two-thirds or about 140,000 are nonimmigrant, that is 3 (1) Government officials; 3 (2) temporary visitors; 3 (3) aliens in transit; 3 (4) aliens entering from transit across foreign contiguous territory; 3 (5) alien seamen; and 3 (6) treaty aliens. Of this number the greater majority are 3 (2) temporary visitors.

NUMBER OF PASSPORTS RENEWED AND ISSUED TO AMERICAN CITIZENS

During the entire year of 1940—January 1 to December 31—there were 26,253 American passports renewed and issued. Of this number only 1,576 were for Europe.

It is highly significant that the great majority of those people accorded the privilege of coming to this country are temporary visitors. In this connection it might be pertinent to inquire as to what is the difference in tourists and temporary visitors. As a member of the Immigration and Naturalization Committee, I have observed that many of the temporary visitors who are here now contend they cannot leave America because there is no country to which they can go. Also, a fact worth considering is that whereas we have permitted 209,756 visas to be issued from July 1, 1940, to June 4, 1941, to people seeking to come to America, the authorities of the countries of the world renewed and issued for our citizens only 26,253 passports in the calendar year 1940. Of this number only 1,576 were for Europe.

Thus far I have not been able to obtain statistics indicating the number of people coming to America from each of the foreign countries. However, I did request Mr. George L. Warren, of the President's Advisory Committee on Political Refugees, to give me the statistics pertaining to the first 1,000 people approved by this committee to be given the privilege to enter America.

I herewith quote a telegram I received from Mr. Warren on June 7, 1941.

NEW YORK, N. Y., June 7, 1941.

LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House of Representatives,
Congress of United States:

Information you request has not been compiled. Compilation will require several weeks. Best estimate foreign nationalities represented in order of numerical importance: German, Austrian, Czech, Polish, French, Belgian, stateless. Letter follows

GEORGE L. WARREN.

At this point I wish to quote two paragraphs from the letter written June 16 by Under Secretary of State Sumner Welles to the first secretary of the German Embassy:

It has come to the knowledge of this Government that agencies of the German Reich in this country, including German consular establishments, have been engaged in activities wholly outside the scope of their legitimate duties. These activities have been of an improper and unwarranted character. They render the continued presence in the United States of those agencies and consular establishments inimical to the welfare of this country.

I am directed by the President to request that the German Government remove from United States territory all German nationals in anywise connected with the German Library of Information in New York, the German Railway and Tourist Agencies, and the Trans-Ocean News Service, and that each of these organizations and their affiliates shall be promptly closed.

In view of the contents of the paragraphs above, again I desire to emphasize how necessary and imperative it is that every person charged with the responsibility of preventing undesirables from coming into this country be doubly careful in approving requests of aliens to enter America.

Farm Tenancy—Farm Ownership Should Be Encouraged—Small Farms Now Squeezed Out—Large Farms Becoming Larger

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WRIGHT PATMAN

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 17, 1941

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I had a feeling of triumph when I looked at some of the 1940 census figures the other day and saw the figure for farm tenancy. But that feeling died quickly when I looked a little further. At first sight it seemed as if we had made a good gain in our battle against increasing farm tenancy. The census showed that 38.7 percent of the Nation's farmers were tenants in 1940. In 1930 the census gave the proportion of farm renters as 42.46 percent. That looks like progress, but it is not.

FAMILY-SIZE FARM DISAPPEARING

There is a very revealing table in the census on the size of farms in the United States in 1940 as compared with 1930. It shows that there has been a startling decrease in the number of farms between the size of 20 acres and 500 acres. These are what we commonly regard as family-type farms, depending upon their locality and the sort of crops grown upon them. They are considered family-type farms because they will yield an adequate living for an average rural family and will require no more labor than that family can supply from its own resources, except for the need of an occasional hired hand at harvest time.

To illustrate these reductions in American family farms, I would like to quote to you the census figures on the three sizes of farms showing the most alarming changes. During the past 10 years 219,382 farms of 20 to 49 acres disappeared. Also gone into limbo were 83,917 farms ranging from 50 to 99 acres, and 59,994 farms of 100 to 499 acres.

BIG "FACTORY FARMS"

The table doesn't say, in so many words, what has become of the acreage represented by these farms that have gone away from the hands of families. But the table shows, in its next three lines, where a vast amount of the acreage must now be found. It is in the large, commercial, and often corporation farms, which range in size from 500 acres to 999 acres, from 1,000 acres to 4,999 acres, and from 5,000 acres on upward. These huge holdings showed just as amazing increases in numbers as the smaller farms showed decreases.

Since 1930 there have grown up in this country 3,998 new farms of 500 to 999 acres. There has been an increase of 16,144 in the number of farms of 1,000 to 4,999 acres. And there are now 3,767 more farms of 5,000 acres or more than there were in 1930. These big "factory farms" have swallowed up the acres of the 360,000 little farms which have disappeared.

FEWER PEOPLE OWNING ACREAGE

We have a lot of rural acreage but it is apparently going into the hands of fewer and fewer people. We find our tenancy rate decreasing. But what is becoming of the tenants? Are they becoming owners? I would like to believe so, but I cannot. I know that some of them are. I am aware that the farm-tenant purchase program of the Department of Agriculture has been helping many deserving American families to own their own farms during the past few years. But I have a strong conviction that appallingly few of the people who ceased being tenants since 1930 went up the agricultural ladder to ownership. The evidence indicates that they have gone the other way. I believe that most of them have slipped down the ladder to the condition of hired hands or day laborers, and a great many—many more than we like to think about—have slipped all the way off the end of the agricultural ladder. They have gone, I am afraid, into the ranks of agricultural migrants—that flood of pitiful Americans who are of the land but not on it, who shuttled back and forth from State to State in an earnest but aimless pursuit of a living as seasonal laborers on the big "factory farms." Below them are even more of the people who once had a foothold on the land, producing their own living, before times got bad and big farms ate up little ones. These folks are on relief now, mostly in the cities. They are farm people who have come to town to try to keep alive. It used to be the other way around. City people went to the country when times got hard for them. Now country people are coming to the cities.

BANKHEAD-JONES ACT HELPING

I have spoken of the 1940 tenancy figure—38.7 percent of our 6,096,799 farmers—as if it were something to be proud of simply because it is lower than the tenancy percentage of 10 years ago. When we understand why this figure is lower, however, we must realize that we still have this tenancy problem with us and another on top of it. One ray of hope is the fact that we have a weapon to use against this flight of tenancy which afflicts more than a third of our farmers. Maybe if we use that weapon—the Bankhead-Jones farm-tenant-loan program—in the right way to relieve tenancy, we will also find ourselves relieving the plight of these unfortunates who have fallen even lower into the ranks of the migrants.

Sixty years ago only about one-fourth of the farmers in America were tenants or sharecroppers, and in that era tenancy was generally regarded as a step toward farm ownership. Today the more than a third who are tenants have little, if any, hope of ever owning their own land.

FARM OWNERSHIP ENCOURAGES GOOD CITIZENSHIP

Most tenants have no real stake in the country; no homes of their own; no roots in any community. More than a third of them move from one farm to another after every harvest. Their children have little opportunity for decent education, and in many tenant and sharecropper families the standard of living is little better than that of a Balkan peasant. The dangers of such a situation in a time of national emergency must be plain to every American.

OWNERSHIP DISCOURAGES WASTE OF SOIL

The system of tenant agriculture is extremely costly. The mere cost of the annual shifting of tenants from farm to farm has been estimated at $50,000,000 a year, without the slightest benefit to anyone. Far more expensive, however, is the waste of soil and property which results inevitably from the tenant system.

OWNERSHIP INCENTIVE TO PROTECT LAND

It is perfectly plain that the average tenant has little incentive to protect the land, keep up fences, or repair farm buildings. He has no assurance that he will be on that piece of property next year. He is likely to mine the soil for the largest possible cash return, no matter how much damage that kind of farming may cause.

SOIL EROSION SERIOUS PROBLEM

In the South this has meant one-crop agriculture, the planting of cotton or tobacco in the same field year after year. As a result, at least 22,000,000 acres of Southern farm land have been worn out and eroded until they are worthless for agriculture; and an additional area the size of Oklahoma and Alabama combined has been seriously damaged by erosion. This spendthrift wastage of our most-precious capital asset—the soil—must be blamed very largely on our system of tenancy.

TENANCY DANGEROUS TO COMMUNITY AND CHURCH LIFE

Almost equally serious is the damage which tenancy is inflicting on our community life. A tenant who pulls up stakes and moves to another part of the country every few months can hardly be a good citizen, or take an active, responsible part in the affairs of his State and neighborhood. Even the churches have been seriously affected by this aimless drifting. Not long ago a study of religious institutions was made in two sections of North Carolina—one which had a high degree of tenancy, and the other which was settled largely by farm owners. In the low-tenancy area, there were found 257 churches with more than 21,000 members. The area where tenancy was widespread had three times as large a population but it was served by only 218 churches. And only some 17,000 persons claimed membership in them. The plain fact is that religion suffers in any community where tenancy is the common way of life.

HEALTH UNDERMINED BY TENANCY

Another evil growing out of this situation is the gradual undermining of the health of many of our citizens. The one-crop farming which ordinarily is associated with tenancy means that most renters and sharecroppers do not raise the vegetables, chickens, and cows necessary to give them a proper diet. Too many of them are living on the fat pork and corn meal they buy over the counter of some store.

MANY TENANTS DO NOT OWN A COW

In one Southern State, where about 65 percent of the farmers are tenants, there are 71,000 farmers who do not own a cow and cannot provide milk for their children; 73,000 farm families in that State do not have a single hog, 18,000 are without gardens, and 30,000 lack even a single chicken. That kind of living is producing too many pellagra-ridden, weakened people—the kind of folks we sometimes unfairly call shiftless and lazy when they're really sick. It is alarming to think what this means to our national manpower in a time of world crisis.

TENANCY NOT JUST A SOUTHERN PROBLEM

Although the tenancy problem has become especially acute in the South, it would be a mistake to assume that it is purely a Southern problem. Even such wealthy Midwestern States as Iowa and Nebraska have tenancy rates of close to 50 percent. The percentage of tenancy in Iowa in 1940 was 47.5 and in Nebraska 52.8. In my own State of Texas the rate was 48.9 percent. Throughout the Nation approximately 2,800,000 families are working somebody else's land.

A distinguished southerner, F. M. Reeves, Cornelia, Ga., not long ago remarked that—the social, political, and economic problems of Southern cities cannot be solved until the far-reaching problem of Southern agriculture is solved intelligently. Without the solution of this great problem of agriculture, this American democracy is doomed to disastrous failure. No nation in all the annals of history has ever been able to survive the death of its agriculture.

MORAL FOR AMERICA SUGGESTED

The moral for America seems plain: A society of independent farmers, proud in the possesison of their own soil, is one of the strongest defenses against both foreign armies and subversive propaganda.

STEP ALREADY MADE IN RIGHT DIRECTION

Fortunately, the United States has already made a start toward solving its tenant problem. Four years ago the Congress enacted the Bankhead-Jones Farm Tenant Act, which provides for loans to a limited number of competent tenants and sharecroppers each year to enable them to buy land of their own. This program was undertaken on an extremely cautious, conservative basis. By the end of the current fiscal year, some 21,000 families will have been established on their own homesteads under the Bankhead-Jones program. This is obviously only a beginning, but it is a sound beginning which has demonstrated that the program is ready for gradual and steady expansion.

I believe the Farm Tenant Act provides an effective means of combatting the destructive tendency of absentee ownership. With neither the tenant nor the landlord much concerned about preserving the vitality of the soil, all Americans lose, because all the land is vital to the welfare of all the people for as long as they depend on it for their food and their fibers.

WILL ESTABLISH PATTERN OF FARM OWNERSHIP

The operation of this act eventually will establish a pattern of farm ownership throughout the Nation. It is a channel through which farm tenants of character and ability can settle themselves permanently on the land, derive a living from that land, and protect it as a source of future productivity. The program is an investment in the welfare of our farm people and a guaranty of the protection of the soil. It is a true economy.

TECHICAL GUIDANCE PROVIDED

With each loan the borrower and his family receive technical guidance in sound farming methods. The farm wife plans a program which will result in preservation of an amount of home-grown foods to meet her family needs. The farmer can build up the fertility of his soil through long-time management plans. He can use crop rotations, permanent pasture, diversified cash crops, and soil-conserving tillage practices which are impossible for a tenant who stays on a farm for only a year or two. Tenant purchase owners plan to stay on their farms permanently, and they are not going to risk depleting their own soil.

SOME WORTHY TENANTS GIVEN OPPORTUNITY

Under the Bankhead-Jones Act, the funds provided for tenant loans are allocated among the States on the basis of farm population and the prevalence of tenancy. To illustrate, it will be possible for the Farm Security Administration, which handles this program, to make loans totaling about $4,800,000 to 768 worthy tenants in my State, Texas, by the end of the present scal year. The loans are made only to American citizens who have exhibited ability to make a success of a family-type farming enterprise; and preference is given tenants with family and those who can make a down payment or own the livestock and tools necessary to operate a farm.

CAREFULLY SELECTED

These 768 families receiving Texas loans this year were selected from among nearly 20,000 applicants, so that we can be pretty sure they are the cream of the crop. Moreover, they are chosen by committees of local farmers who are thoroughly familiar with the character and capabilities of the applicants in their neighborhood. These same local committees approve the farms to be purchased and the farm valuation is carefully checked by expert Government appraisers.

I believe you would be interested in knowing just a little more about the demand for these tenant purchase loans. Since the program began there have been 26 applications in the State of Texas for each available loan. The ratio in the United States as a whole, I am advised, is 22 applications for each loan made.

NINETY-NINE-PERCENT COLLECTIONS

One result of the careful selection of borrowers is a rather surprising record of repayments. Installments due from Texas tenant borrowers at the end of the program's third year of operation, June 30, 1940, totaled $105,391. Repayments on these maturities totaled $104,341, or 99 percent of the amount due. In addition, because of operation of a variable repayment plan which enables borrowers to pay in advance when they are able, extra payments amounting to $28,017 had been made. In other words, the average Texan who borrowed money under the Bankhead-Jones Act not only has met his installments on schedule, but also has been able to make a small advance repayment.

SELF-LIQUIDATING LOANS

Throughout the country as a whole the repayment record is just as impressive. Regular collections have been 97.4 percent of maturities and prepayments have brought up the total of payments considerably above the amount due. It is apparent that these Bankhead-Jones loans are completely self-liquidating and that the program involves no drain upon the Treasury.

DEMOCRATIC PLATFORM

This program, which is making it possible for many American farmers to lift themselves from difficulty by their own bootstraps, is contributing as greatly as its statutory limits permit to fulfillment of an important pledge of the agricultural plank of the 1940 Democratic platform:

To extend and enlarge the tenant-purchase program until every deserving tenant farmer has a real opportunity to have a farm of his own.

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

SAVING DAYLIGHT ON NATIONAL SCALE

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, unlike Joshua, Congress has no power to make the sun stand still, but it does have power to fix time. It used this power during the World War and placed the entire Nation on a daylight-saving basis. By an act passed in 1918, it marked the Nation into five zones, namely, Eastern, Central, Mountain, Pacific, and Alaskan. These correspond to the seventy-fifth, ninetieth, one hundred and fifth, one hundred and twentieth, and one hundred and fiftieth degrees of west longitude.

Except for the Alaskan zone, you will note that each zone is separated by 15 degrees of longitude to correspond to 1 hour of clock time. Congress delegated the Interstate Commerce Commission to define the various zones and then placed them all on a daylight-saving basis. Three bills are now pending in Congress to do the same thing. The Federal Power Commission is making a study of the matter to determine how much electricity would be saved by such a move—all of which proves that even Old Man Time may be enlisted in the cause of national defense.

SOME FISCAL COMPARISONS

Pending in the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives and steadily moving toward consideration on the floor is one of the most gigantice tax bills in world history. It will constitute an effort to produce more than three and one-half billion dollars as partial payment on the enormous defense expenditures which are now being incurred to make this country ready for any eventuality. The existence of the pending bill has stimulated comparison between tax revenues, debts, and income between the United States and Great Britain, and the following figures which are derived from an authentic comparison compiled by the joint committee on Internal Revenue taxation, and issued as a Government publication on May 21, 1941, may be of interest. Net debt of Great Britain, in all forms, national, state, and local is approximately 63.8 billions as compared with sixty-seven billions for the United States. British per capita debt is $1,357, whereas in the United States it is $493. British national income is 122.3 billions as against 95 billions in the United States. British per capita income is $475, compared with $699 for the United States. British internal revenue tax receipts for the fiscal year 1940–41 is 5.6 billions, compared with 5.4 billions for the United States. Income taxes in Great Britain are as follows: On a net income of $800 a single man pays $130, a married man $52; a part of this, however, is to be refunded at the end of the war because it constitutes the so-called purchase tax. On a $900 income a single man pays $159, a married man $81. On a $1,000 income a single man pays $188, a married man $110. On a $1,200 income a single man pays $265, a married man $164. On a $1,600 net income a single man pays $444, a married man $324. On a $2,000 income a single man pays $624, a married man $504. The refund on this tax, because of so-called purchase tax reduction, would be $106 for a single man and $126 for a married man. Truly here is an onerous tax.

THE GEOGRAPHY MAKERS ASSEMBLE

Did you ever hear about the Scotchman who refused to buy an atlas until the war was over? Which reminds us that the map makers are in convention in the Nation's Capital. It includes official government mappers from Canada, Mexico, South America, and the United States, and they will discuss the complex problems of mapping which have been raised by the war. How, for instance, will new maps show Greenland and indicate our interest in view of the treaty signed with the Danish Minister, whose authority to negotiate over Greenland was challenged? What about Greece and Crete? When the present push in Syria terminates what will new maps show concerning these areas in the eastern Mediterranean? It is a fair bet that as the map makers assemble for tea they will wish for the days when the world remained put.

THE BATTLE OF THE ST. LAWRENCE IS ON

Was it Job who said, "Oh, that mine enemy would write a book." Were Job alive today he might amplify that a bit by saying, "Oh, that mine enemy would write a book, issue a statement, make a speech or write an article for a magazine or for the press." What we mean to state is that in connection with the battle now brewing over the St. Lawrence Seaway and Power project, everything that has ever been said or written by any person or group now opposed to this project is being hauled out, dusted off, reprinted, and laid upon the desks of Congressmen and Senators. Statements and speeches made by railroad executives a generation ago are now being reprinted in quantities to show that at that time they were not opposed to the idea. Statements by Harding, Coolidge, Hoover, and Taft are now being reprinted to indicate their approval of the project. All this is the groundwork for the debate which will take place if the project should be favorably reported and laid before Congress. Not a day goes by but that the mailman brings literature on this subject. Noses are being counted to determine who is for and who is against. The campaign to secure congressional approval and funds for the seaway has all the earmarks of a campaign of military strategy. It will be a billion-dollar fight when the issue is finally joined. Hearings on the bill are now in progress.

MEN PASSING THROUGH TIME

How often we say, "Time flies." Students of relativity say that it is not time but mankind which flies. They say it is not time that passes away, but, rather, that humankind passes through time. A glance at these figures of the last World War, made pertinent by the present conflict, gives substance to that statement. In round numbers, it is estimated that in 1952, 3,460,000 veterans of the World War will be living. In 1962 the number will be reduced to 2,516,000. By 1972 to 1,119,000. By 1982 to 164,392. By 1992 only 563 will still be alive, and by 1996 there will be but 1. Thus after the elapse of 44 years, according to the mortality tables, which are based upon many years of human experience, 3,458,421 men, ranging in ages from 45 to 99, will have marched through time, and the traditions which they kept alive must be fostered and nurtured by those who follow.

Neutrality of Ireland

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RICHARD J. WELCH

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 19, 1941

LETTER OF GEN. FRANK AIKEN, IRISH MINISTER FOR COORDINATION OF DEFENSE MEASURES

Mr. WELCH. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to permission heretofore granted by the House, I append hereto a letter written by Gen. Frank Aiken, Irish Minister for Coordination of Defense Measures, on the subject of Ireland's neutrality and the reasons therefor.

Members interested in this matter are urged to read this illuminating communication.

The following is General Aiken's letter and the reasons therefor:

The following letter signed by General Aiken, the Minister for Coordination of Defensive Measures in the Irish Government, who is in this country on a special mission for Mr. de Valera, has been sent to the New Republic in reply to an open letter to Mr. de Valera by Prof. Francis E. McMahon, and also to the Reader's Digest, which reprinted Professor McMahon's letter:

SIR: In his open letter to Mr. de Valera, published in your issue of May 12, Prof. Francis E. McMahon asks "merely" that three Irish ports be given to England for the prosecution of the war. He bases his appeal upon the grounds that the cause of England "Today is the cause of all humanity"; that she is fighting for justice, human dignity, the Christian religion, true culture, and the freedom of small nations, including Ireland; that her victory depends upon getting possession of three Irish ports.

First of all let me point out that the giving of facilities to one belligerent for an attack upon another is an act of war. Therefore, the professor's proposition is that Ireland should join in the war. The Irish people, in the free portion of Ireland, decided against this policy after weighing fully what both belligerents said, and refrained from saying, about their war aims; and after weighing carefully what both belligerents did, and refrained from doing, to give practical effect where and when they could to the admirable principles for which Professor McMahon says England is fighting.

Our decision to remain neutral was supported by 99.9 percent of our people of all classes and creeds as well as by every Catholic bishop in the State. Professor McMahon may know better where our duty lies than we do ourselves, but as a small and very democratic people we would not peacefully submit to the judgment of three millions of us being overruled by the opinion of one man 3,000 miles away. Even if Mr. de Valera agreed with Professor McMahon's views, he has no moral or constitutional authority to commit our people to war. According to our constitution the right to declare war or to engage the state in war belongs solely to the Dail, and for anyone deliberately without due and proper authority to give our ports to a belligerent or to do anything else which would inevitably bring about a war situation, involving the sacrifices of the lives of our soldiers and of our people, would be nothing short of unjustifiable homicide.

As for the strategic importance of the three ports in free Ireland, I fear Professor McMahon does not realize that the British still occupy six of our northeastern counties—against the will of the Irish people. In these occupied counties are situated ports and air bases covering the only Atlantic route which the British have used to any important extent since the fall of France. If ports and land-based planes can protect shipping, the British are strategically as well off as if they were in occupation of all Ireland.

We do not forget, as Professor McMahon says, "Centuries ago Eire rolled back a tide of barbarism, as her scholars and saints spread over Europe instructing the ignorant in faith and sound philosophy." Perhaps, if with God's help we survive the present European holocaust, our young men and women will once again undertake the noble work of missionaries in Europe. They are at present doing missionary work in many countries. Even if it were desirable, we have not the military strength to enforce Christianity throughout the world by the sword.

The best we can hope to do in the present circumstances of our partitioned country is to protect against aggression the portion for which we secured freedom after such a long and arduous struggle, and in which we are trying to put into practical operation the principles of Christianity, democracy, and social justice which are contained in our constitution.

Yours very truly,

FRANK AIKEN,
Irish Minister for Coordination of Defensive Measures.

St. Lawrence Seaway

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALFRED F. BEITER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 19, 1941

LETTER FROM RACINE, WIS.

Mr. BEITER. Mr. Speaker, an interesting letter from Racine, Wis. has come to my attention. Under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include that letter. The man who wrote it has been in the boat-building business for many years, and his remarks are based on practical experience. His feeling on the subject of the necessity for the construction of a St. Lawrence seaway, I believe, is the same as the most of the clear-thinking people of Wisconsin. They realize that the enormous investment in ships and harbors in order to meet the requirements for shipping facilities on such a seaway, would offset any possible slight savings over present transportation costs.

The letter follows:

Tribune article on seaway plan carried in Sunday's Tribune prompts this letter.

I have never had a dollar invested in any railway, steamship, or utility investment. I have owned small boats all my life, and as president of the Racine Boat Corporation, built hundreds of them. For a number of years I flew the pennant A 140 of the United Shipmasters Association of America. I have fought the consummation of the St. Lawrence waterways for years.

Several years ago I wrote a questionnaire and furnished a list of 25 captains, 5 from each bordering State, which was sent out by the Racine Manufacturers' Association. Every one was returned, and there was not a favorable comment made to the subject any many very scratching remarks.

May I add my might by adding to your objections the fact that last year three tramps docked at Milwaukee in 1 week from Oslo, Norway (6,600 miles), with pulp which was reloaded and shipped by train to Green Bay and reloaded on ground which had stored Wisconsin and Michigan pulp for the last 50 years—quite evident what the competition of pulp and labor would be.

There is a section in Lake Huron at present which is very hazardous due to fog. If the seaway were completed and a highway made of this section, it is reasonable to believe that insurance rates would be raised to a prohibitive height, if not refused altogether.

I believe the best reason for not completing this project and the easiest argument to sell its uselessness to the general public is that there is nothing to be gained as far as lower freight rates are concerned. Car loadings leave Racine on Wednesday and are in New York City Saturday morning. A miscellaneous belly full of foreign-bound merchandise from Racine would be worth about $6,000,000, and the best time that could be expected would be around 14 days. The investment on the cargo and the difference in time would offset any savings in freight which might hope to accrue.

When I was a newsboy 40 years ago, William McKinley was promising the same lure, and every Presidential candidate since. In 1928 Hurley, speaking for Hoover at Fond du Lac, promised it, and two nights later Roosevelt, speaking at the Twin Cities in his own behalf, also hung out the bacon as bait for the farmers' vote, which makes it possible to speak before practically anybody without having the opposition shout, "Red herring."

Senator WILEY promised it in his campaign, but I have been advised by one of our industrialists that he has since changed his mind on the matter.

If there is anything I can do in this section to help you and others to kill the completion of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence waterways, consider my services at your command.

Sincerely yours,

WM. H. ROHAN.

Resolutions of Tennessee Federation of Labor

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ESTES KEFAUVER

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 19, 1941

RESOLUTIONS PASSED AT JUNE 2 MEETING

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include herewith five resolutions passed by the Tennessee Federation of Labor at its meeting on June 2, at Knoxville, Tenn.:

Resolution No. 15

Be it resolved, That the State Federation of Labor of Tennessee, in convention assembled June 2, 1941, call upon the Congress of the United States to enact laws immediately that will outlaw the Communist Party, Nazi and Fascist organizations or any other organization which owes its allegiance to a foreign government, and to provide severe penalties for all individuals who are members of any or all of these subversive groups; and it is further

Resolved, That our immigration laws be strictly enforced, and to this end we hereby call upon the President of the United States to have these immigration laws strictly enforced, as a measure of national defense, and have deported all enemy aliens whose presence in America is in violation of the law; it is further

Resolved, That the secretary of this State federation of labor be instructed to send copies of this resolution at once to President Franklin D. Roosevelt; to President William Green, of the American Federation of Labor; and to the United States Senators and the Congressmen from the State of Tennessee; and now we Resolve, That our national-defense program can best be served and the security of this Nation best defended and protected by outlawing the above-named groups and by sending from these shores all enemy aliens illegally in America.

Resolution No. 1

Whereas the southeast is now facing a serious power shortage which may jeopardize our entire defense program and prolong the day when peace and democracy may again be restored to the world; and

Whereas the Cumberland River and its tributaries have great power potentialities which could be developed within a short period of time: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Tennessee Federation of Labor, duly assembled, in the city of Knoxville, Tenn., on this the 3d day of June 1941, That the Congress of the United States be memoralized to enact legislation at the earliest possible moment to bring the Cumberland River and its tributaries and territory adjacent thereto under the jurisdiction of the Tennessee Valley Authority for immediate development; be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of the Tennessee Federation of Labor transmit to the Vice President of the United States and the Secretary of State, Cordell Hull, and to the Senators, McKellar and Stewart of Tennessee; Senators Barkley and Chandler, of Kentucky; Senator Norris, of Nebraska, and to each of the Congressmen from the State of Tennessee copies of this resolution.

And, further, that a request of concurrence and a copy be sent to our respected native son, Cordell Hull, for his specific notice and action.

Resolution No. 19

Whereas there seems to be a general effort being made by railroads to defeat the purpose of the Wages and Hours Act of 1938. This was first apparent by their refusal to pay time and one-half at the rate made effective under the Wages and Hours Act for work performed in overtime hours; and now they are cutting the time worked each day to less than 8 hours, so the total daily earnings at 36 cents per hour are not more than before this rate became effective March 1941; and

Whereas on March 1 Senator Sheppard introduced a bill in the United States Senate, which is identified as S. 1015, which reads as follows:

"A bill to amend the Wages and Hours Act

"Be it enacted, etc., That the Wage and Hour Act shall not be interpreted in such wise as to require any employer to work any employee any greater amount for any pay period than shall have been agreed between employer and employee: Provided, That such agreement shall specify a rate of pay (herein referred to as regular rate of pay), for all hours worked up to the maximum number specified in section 7 (a), which is not less than the minimum prescribed by this act, and shall assure to the employee for all hours worked in excess of the number specified in section 7 (a) (herein referred to as overtime) compensation at a rate not less than one and one-half times the said regular rate of pay specified in such agreement between employer and employee. Any compensation, bonus, guaranty, benefit, or advantage whatever promised or paid to or conferred upon the employee in addition to the regular rate of pay specified in such agreement between employer and employee shall not be deemed to increase such regular rate of pay for the purpose of calculating the minimum standard of section 7 (a) for overtime"; and

Whereas the introduction of this bill constitutes an admission that the railroads know the practices mentioned above are in violation of the Wages and Hours Act in its present form: Therefore be it

Resolved, That this convention of the Tennessee Federation of Labor meeting in Knoxville, Tenn., June 2, 3, and 4, 1941, go on record as opposing the enactment of S. 1015, and the secretary is hereby instructed to write our Congressmen and the Senators from this State, registering vigorous opposition to S. 1015, and also urge the members of our respective organizations to write their Congressmen and Senators for the same purpose.

Resolution No. 22

Whereas the United States is confronted with a grave national emergency caused by the tragic world situation and is now engaged in a vast defense program for the protection of our democratic heritage; and

Whereas we recognize the great importance of carrying forward this defense program with all possible speed and without work stoppages where possible to avoid them; and

Whereas the Tennessee Federation of Labor is aware of the responsibility of organized labor to do all in its power to promote the welfare of our country: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Tennessee Federation of Labor hereby declares its faith and its love for the American system of constitutional democracy; an economy based upon the institution of private property, with equal rights to capital and labor, with the right of workers to organize and bargain collectively and with the opportunity by honest toil and thrift to live decently and acquire a reasonable amount of property for themselves and families; political, civil, and religious liberty: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we are opposed to all measures calculated and designed to impair or destroy labor's right to organize, to bargain collectively, and if need be to strike, and in particular we are unalterably opposed to the so-called Vinson bill now before the United States Congress, which would destroy the democratic rights of labor and would defeat the very purpose for which all Americans are now united; and be it further

Resolved, That we believe wholeheartedly in the principle of mediation, that we deplore unwarranted and unjustifiable disputes between labor and management and particularly stoppage in defense industries, and we hereby pledge ourselves in all defense industries to meet around the conference table with representatives of management and with disinterested representatives of the United States Government in an honest effort to adjust and settle all controversies; be it further

Resolved, That we hereby pledge our allegiance to the United States Government, and express our willingness to make any and all sacrifices that may be necessary to preserve our Nation and protect its honor; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be mailed to the President of the United States, to the Governor of Tennessee, to the Members of Congress from the State of Tennessee, and to the press.

Resolution No. 20

Whereas the widespread dissatisfaction among employees of all trades in the navy yard service with the wage award handed down by the Navy Department on November 18, 1940, and the subsequent delay in the pending appeal from the decision, District No. 44, of the I. A. of M., has persuaded Congressman WARREN G. MAGNUSON, of the State of Washington, to introduce H. R. 4214 which, if enacted, will in part at least correct the wage situation and establish a system for retention in and reemployment in the service, to take the place of the present unsatisfactory efficiency system;

Whereas the bill H. R. 4214 proposes to limit to a period of 3 months the time during which an employee may receive the minimum or third-class rate of pay, after which he must, if retained in the service, receive the intermediate or second-class rate of pay, and 6 months after receiving the intermediate or second-class rate of pay he shall, if retained in the service, be promoted to the maximum or first-class rate of pay.

Whereas during the period of the depression the navy-yard wage schedule was used extensively by labor representatives of all trades in collective-bargaining negotiations with private industry; wages in private industry now have far outstripped wages paid in navy yards and arsenals, as we see it; and we are therefore strongly urging the various lodges to help their own possible future cause by giving us a lift now. The navy-yard scale was helpful to some of the locals formerly. The use of your political influence now in an attempt to secure the enactment of the Magnuson bill will be very timely.

Whereas the principles of the Magnuson bill have been indorsed by conventions of the A. F. of L.; conventions of the Metal Trades Department; conventions of the I. A. of M. at Milwaukee and Cleveland, and by conventions of District No. 44. Your convention is therefore on safe ground in indorsing this bill, without going contrary to the policies laid down by parent organizations: Therefore be it

Resolved, That this convention of the Tennessee Federation of Labor, meeting in Knoxville, Tenn., June 2, 3, and 4, 1941, is indirectly and vitally interested and we urge that the following actions be taken:

1. That a letter be written by the secretary to our Congressmen urging them to support the Magnuson bill, H. R. 4714, and request them to communicate our views and their own views to the chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee of the House, Hon. CARL VINSON.

2. That the delegates in attendance at this convention from the central labor unions and local unions be instructed to bring this matter before their local bodies, with a view to have similar action taken by them.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LELAND M. FORD

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 19, 1941

LETTER FROM HON. FRANCES PERKINS AND REPLY

Mr. LELAND M. FORD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letters:

DEPARTMENT OF LABOR,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, May 17, 1941.

The Honorable LELAND M. FORD,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN FORD: In the extension of your remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of last Monday, the 12th of May, you quoted an alleged statement of mine as follows:

"The right of the C. I. O. to strike is paramount to the right of the United States to have a defense program."

I have not made this statement at any time, nor have I at any time said anything which could be construed as having this meaning.

I have emphasized in many speeches, letters, and memoranda the obligation and willingness of labor in the United States to cooperate with employers and with the Government to avoid delays in production and to increase efficiency and production.

I am asking you to make a correction of this misstatement in view of my categorical denial, and I feel sure that, as a matter of justice without regard to what your opinion may be, that you will be alert to make this correction promptly on the RECORD of the Congress.

Very truly yours,

FRANCES PERKINS.

JUNE 19, 1941.

Madam FRANCES PERKINS,
Secretary of Labor,
Department of Labor,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MADAM SECRETARY: This will acknowledge receipt of your letter to me of May 17, 1941, with reference to remarks made by me in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of Monday, May 12, 1941, wherein I said that you had said "the right of the C. I. O. to strike is paramount to the right of the United States to have a defense program." No doubt I should have said, "said in substance," together with the balance of the statement, because, in my opinion, you did say it in substance if the report of your press conference on December 27, 1940, as reported by the New York Times, December 28, 1940, on page 13, is correct, which is as follows:

"Secretary Perkins declared today that the right to strike should not be abridged and that the right had not been abused in connection with the national-defense program."

Conditions at that time were these: That strikes were being carried on which were seriously hindering the defense program. Apparently everybody could see it but you. Many of us called your attention and the attention of others to these strikes and to what they were doing to our defense program, not only myself and other Congressmen, but the personnel of the Army and Navy as well. Nobody takes exception to a man's right to cease work if he does not want to work, which is his constitutional right under the Constitution of the United States, but under that same Constitution, these strikers have not the right to say that no one else shall work. A man's right to work is just as important as a man's right not to work.

At that very time, coercion, force, and bodily injury were being practiced by these strikers on those who wished to work. Can you justify that? Can you justify the taking away of the rights of those who wish to work by those who do not, with any part of the Constitution of the United States? Do you think the right to strike is "abridged," using your own language, when a man who wants to work, under the Constitution of the United States, tries to work and is prevented by bodily injury and force? As an example of this, I will quote you from Funk & Wagnalls' new Standard Dictionary, volume 1, which says:

"The law forbids him to murder but that does not abridge his liberty. He never had a right to murder."

The same thing is true with the abridgement of the right to strike, but in striking there is no right to take away another man's constitutional right and say he cannot work.

Now then, when you made the bald statement that the "right to strike should not be abridged," you made it without any qualifications except to say that it had not been abused, but in fact—and this is what we must judge by, particularly in the face of our present defense program—thousands of men were being prevented by force from working on that program and carrying it out, not only denying their right to work, but denying the right of 130,000,000 people to have a defense program within a proper time to be effective and efficient.

Again, under remarks at press conference January 24, 1941, indirectly quoted, from the New York Times, January 25, 1941, page 9, asked whether you believed that an industry-wide meeting of employers in the aircraft plants and all spokesmen for the labor unions might work up a method of peaceable adjustment of disputes, "the Secretary replied that she was not sure that such a proposal was immediately practicable. She expressed the opinion that where an organizational drive was in progress, such as the one in the aircraft industry, and the union demand was for its first contract, an industry-wide agreement was not possible." You certainly should have known what the result of this would be; and if you did not know, the things that happened in the aircraft industry should certainly have shown you the result. Under the conditions then existing, anyone should have foreseen what was coming, and it certainly did not help straighten out matters, nor give this country a defense program, to have the Secretary of Labor make any such statement as that. That, too, is certainly a contributory statement showing how you stood.

After all, there is no use of stalling, quibbling, dilly-dallying, backing, and filling or attempting to stand on technical statements as to what the substance of these statements means. Unfortunately for you, your chickens have come home to roost, and unfortunately for you, the responsibility of causing many of these strikes is placed clearly where it belongs and in your lap.

This is all a result of your coddling and encouragement of the socialistic, communistic outlaw labor leaders, such as Harry Bridges. I believe your handling of this matter is a blot upon the escutcheon of all Cabinets. I believe your one-sided C. I. O. labor-leader policy has brought this all about, because, in my opinion, you have favored these leaders whether they were right or wrong, not only in the administration of N. L. R. B., but all down the line wherever labor relations existed.

You have not helped labor. I believe you have injured labor, I believe you have injured industry, and I believe you have injured the defense program of the United States, because, through your all-out cooperation with this type of labor leader, the rank and file of labor, who have not been to blame, have seen a public sentiment rise against all labor. This public sentiment, after all, is the greatest weapon that labor has and you have helped destroy it by your biased handling of labor matters, namely, your all-out surrender to the subversive leadership of the C. I. O. Now that public sentiment is proven to be against you, it appears to me that you are running for cover. However, it is my further opinion that you will never be able to run to cover and avoid the consequences of your one-sided administration.

Despite all the statements, news items and comment on the communistic agitators and communistic labor leaders, you are quoted in the Los Angeles Examiner of March 28, 1941, section 1, page 12, as follows:

"Our Department doesn't look through microscopes seeking Communist agitators and we have no specific evidence that Communists have been responsible for defense-industry strikes. We concentrate our efforts upon strike settlements."

In the Los Angeles Times of March 27, 1941, page 1, you are quoted: "I do not think the general situation anywhere is too serious."

In the New York City Mirror of March 10, 1941, these are the headlines: "Perkins hid United States report on deporting aliens. She blighted Congress' efforts to rid the country of 'reds.'"

New York City Sun, April 21, 1941, headline "Perkins not moved by strikes." In that same interview, you were asked from the floor, "How can the public be protected against the racketeering type of union?" Your flippant answer was, "How can the public be protected against the racketeering type of businessman?"

In the Cheyenne, Wyo., Tribune, April 2, 1941, headline "'Defense strike not serious,' Perkins tells reporters," and again, in the same paper, "We have had no serious strikes and the progress of national-defense industries has not been held up to a serious degree by strikes." In the same paper, you are asked, "What is the general sentiment of the public in the West coast to current strikes?" Your flippant reply, "What strikes?"

In the New York City Times of March 27, 1941: "Secretary Perkins told reporters today that she doubted if communism had played a large part in the defense-industry strikes."

In the Christian Science Monitor, Boston, Mass., April 9, 1941, under subheading, "Just Bad Behavior," your statement that it "was not alarming, it was just very bad behavior. She said the number of false ballots was not large enough to have been decisive in the strike vote in the Allis-Chalmers strike."

In the same paper, answering question put by J. PARNELL THOMAS, "Miss Perkins minimized the importance of Communist influence in strikes."

Of course, these are just a few of your statements come home to roost. How is it that you have tried to minimize the results of the activities of these communistic outlaws who would destroy the defense program of this country, particularly Harry Bridges' activities? You don't even frown on the use of false ballots, and then you cry for labor's rights. When asked for answers as to how this country can protect itself against racketeer labor leaders you give a flippant answer. Has the businessman or the public at large any right to consideration in your Department? When you were asked about the strikes on the Pacific coast on your return your statement "What strikes?" may appear to you to be very flippant, but if you have not realized it yet, you will find that those on the Pacific coast and throughout the United States know what strikes were meant, and if knowledge of these strikes has not filtered into your brain you should have your head examined.

Well do I believe, and with me many of our 130,000,000 people, that you do not examine with a microscope the communistic activities that are going on under your nose and which you are, either knowingly or unknowingly, helping to promote.

These are sad things to have to say to a Cabinet officer, but I believe the facts to be such as to justify them. Whether you just don't know, whether you are incompetent, whether you have not the courage to carry out the oath of your office makes no difference to the people of the United States. These things are there, the record is there, and the result is there, and, in my opinion, they all point to one thing, the greatest failure that any Cabinet officer has ever made in office, and it is my further opinion that if you do not resign and turn that office over to someone who will handle it like it should be handled, you will be discharged, as you ought to be.

The people in this country are no longer going to put up with your kind of administration, and it is my opinion that that goes for Democrats, Republicans, and the public at large.

Very truly yours.

The English-Speaking Union

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WALTER F. GEORGE

OF GEORGIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, June 19 (legislative day of Tuesday, June 10), 1941

ADDRESS BY AMBASSADOR JOHN G. WINANT

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD the address delivered by Hon. John G. Winant, Ambassador of the United States of America to Great Britain, at the English Speaking Union on Wednesday, May 14, 1941, as reprinted from The Daily Telegraph.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The English-Speaking Union was formed in the summer of 1918 just before the last World War came to an end. That was the first war in which all English-speaking peoples united to preserve their common ideals.

It is because of this fact that I am particularly happy to speak to you with Anthony Eden, the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. We worked in the pre-war days to preserve the rule of law and social justice among nations. We served in the last war in the allied armies. Many of our friends fell in France. There they died, and many are buried, that we and our children might live in a free and peaceful world. But now across the western front an invader holds sway, and over the free France of Lafayette and Foch waves the swastika.

The common ideals of the English-speaking peoples of this world are not ideals from which other peoples of the world are excluded. They are ideals which are alien in no country that loves liberty and hates tyranny. They are ideals which are common to all men and women of this earth who do justice, who love mercy, and who walk humbly with God.

The English-speaking countries of the world are peopled by men and women of diverse nationalities and different religions. Our strength comes from diversity, and our freedom is born of tolerance—tolerance of other people's origins, other people's religions, and other people's ideas.

And that is true of England no less than the English-speaking countries overseas. It was in this little island that the Angles, the Saxons, and the Normans learned to live together and call themselves Englishmen. Even the English language is a mixture of diverse tongues, and the book—the Bible—which has had a greater influence on English life and literature than any other is a book translated from tongues never spoken in this island.

In past centuries, England like other English-speaking countries, has offered sanctuary to the oppressed, persecuted and rejected of other lands. It is therefore no accident that, in our own century, among her Prime Ministers have been those of Welsh, Scott, and American descent, or that one of the most distinguished members of her War Cabinet during the last war should have been a South African of Dutch descent.

It is probably the crowning virtue of English-speaking countries that they recognize and respect virtue wherever they find it and are not inclined to beguile themselves with the primitive and barbaric idea that they themselves have a monopoly of it. That is the reason that today throughout Europe, and throughout the world, the common people of all races and of all religions are hoping and praying and, wherever given a chance, fighting for victory for Britain and for the English-speaking countries which are rallying to Britain's aid.

For today the English-speaking peoples are again being drawn together in a struggle to preserve not only their common heritage but the common ideals of civilized men everywhere.

Only this week in London, in the early morning hours of the Sabbath Day, enemy bombs destroyed the House of Commons room of the Parliament and smashed the altar of Westminster Abbey. These two hits seemed to me to symbolize the objectives of the dictator and the pagan. Across the street from the wreckage of these two great historic buildings of state and church, Saint Gaudens' statue of Abraham Lincoln was still standing. As I looked at the bowed figure of the Great Emancipator and thought of his life, I could not help but remember that he loved God, that he had defined and represented democratic government, and that he hated slavery.

And as an American I was proud that he was there in all that wreckage as a friend and sentinel of gallant days that have gone by, and a reminder that in this great battle for freedom he waited quietly for support for those things for which he lived and died.

With Machiavellian cunning, totalitarian tyranny has sought to divide and conquer peoples and nations that should stand together. By blackmail and terror, by intrigue and deceit, they have sought to weaken and undermine national unity in those countries whose freedom they would destroy. They have sought to revive and inflame old and discredited class and racial hatreds. They have missed no chance to make bad blood between friendly nations in order to delay and frustrate common action against international banditry and aggression which threaten the freedom of all nations.

But make no mistake! So far the totalitarians have been appallingly successful. Experience has proved that they have a way of keeping their threats and breaking their promises. They have destroyed, one by one, one free nation after another. While a few short years ago these lawless men could have been put down by a few simple police measures, had the then free nations of the world had the will and wisdom to act together, now the forces and resources of all the remaining free nations of the world must be employed if we are to look forward to a world freed from the domination of fear and force.

For men and women of good will there is only one choice. When dictators conspire together, men and women of good will everywhere must act together. This is no time for vain regrets or futile recriminations. We have all slept, while wicked and evil men plotted destruction. We have all thought that we might save ourselves from the holocaust and that what happened to far distant countries could never happen to us.

We have all tried to make ourselves believe that we are not our brother's keeper. But we are now beginning to realize that we need our brothers as much as our brothers need us.

The freedom-loving, peace-loving peoples of this earth are coming to realize that this is not Britain's fight alone. When clever, cunning dictators are striking with lightning speed at any and every free nation that dares to stand in their way, the time has come for democratic nations to prove to the world that, while they are free to debate, they have the power and the will to act.

On the wise use of the navies of the world may hang the destinies of the free peoples of the world. A kindly Providence at this time of stress and danger has placed at the heads of the two great English-speaking peoples two men whose knowledge of the sea is probably greater than that of any statesmen of any time. The problems that are before them in the defense of their countries are not simple problems, but complicated problems. In the controversy that has arisen in regard to sinkings of goods manufactured in the United States, I hope that the people here and at home realize that a mere statement of the sinkings of ships from America does not tell the whole story. It only proves, as does the successful transport of troops to the middle east, the protective power of an adequate convoy.

Such figures do not show the necessity of selection. They do not disclose what food may have to be taken from the children of Britain to give her soldiers arms. They tell only a small part of the Battle of the Atlantic and of the shipping problem to be faced in the prosecution of this total war. In total war it is total strength that counts.

We are engaged in the greatest struggle in all history to preserve freedom in the modern world. We have made our tasks infinitely more difficult because we failed to do yesterday what we gladly do today. Much that we must do today would not have been necessary had we done enough yesterday.

The longer the delay the more protracted will be the war and the greater the sacrifices which will be required for victory.

Let us stop asking ourselves if it is really necessary to do more today. Let us, all of us, ask ourselves what more we can do today so that we may have less to do and secrifice tomorrow. If we, all of us, will only not put off for tomorrow what can be done today, victory for freedom will come sooner than we dare to hope.

Our National Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WALTER M. PIERCE

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 19, 1941

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Speaker, when I was Governor of the State of Oregon a newspaper correspondent of one of the large dailies used to take special delight in calling me the "official crepe hanger." I have no desire to appear in such a role, but if there ever was a darker period since man came out of the caves I have failed to find a record of it in the pages of history.

We have abolished distance in transmission of thought. We have almost abolished distance in transmission of articles of commerce. President Roosevelt recently talked from the White House in Washington, D. C., to the entire world. Think what this means.

We have an abundance and superabundance of things to eat and things to wear, not justly distributed, but available, under a Government which desires and plans social security and justice. We have mechanical devices which are almost human in their accomplishments. The people of the world could live in luxury, peace, and plenty unattainable in any other age. Instead of this, we find there are millions of starving and wretched people on this earth. Modern inventions which should make life more worth living are being used to oppress and enslave millions in a more cruel, inhuman manner than ever used by savages of old.

Never was pledged and plighted word of man or nation so lightly held, so quickly, unceremoniously, and ruthlessly violated as in this day of material plenty. Justice and confidence among nations have disappeared. Force alone is master. Might, indeed, now seems to make right under the cruel system which dominates the earth.

Into this maelstrom we find ourselves plunged, not by our own consent or act but by a series of events over which we have had no control. I do not see how any person can question that Hitler is determined upon world domination. He has said so plainly. I know his word means nothing; still, his acts all point in that direction.

There is an alliance, offensive and defensive, among Hitler, Mussolini, and Japan. This alliance threatens our ideals and our very existence. The Axis Powers teach that freedom is a myth and liberty a misnomer, that the individual means nothing, that the state is everything. Actually, every individual is made a slave for the benefit of the state. Our American ideals of life and government are absolutely opposed to the acts of the Axis Powers.

Under such conditions, there is no compromise possible and there can be no peace. It is either "we or they." No sane person wants war, but for me and my kind war and possible defeat would be preferable to submission and certain slavery.

On the Atlantic seaboard a century and a half ago, there was brought forth and instrumented the finest, best conception of government ever devised by man. Men and women by the thousands have suffered and died that the vision of the fathers might be fully realized. Four score years ago, in great battles between the States, it was decided and determined for all time that we are a Nation "one and indivisible," from ocean to shining ocean.

Our achievements in this century and one-half of national existence have exceeded the accomplishments of any other nation in any time for the welfare of its people. Education, governmental institutions, scientific progress—all have contributed to the well-being and comfort of the average man, of our American citizens.

Apparently the world is on the edge of an abyss and may be just ready to plunge over again, into dark ages. Still, there may be a way around the danger spot by following which we can maintain our existence and our honor. The monster who would destroy the fabric of our Government, and who derides our conceptions of right and wrong, has devised a war machine that has swept over everything from the Arctic to the Mediterranean, and beaten down all opposition with a ruthlessness unparalleled by Hun or Turk. Hitler cannot be appeased nor satisfied, except by abject submission. This would mean extinction of everything we hold dear and sacred. Like our fathers of old, we are called upon to defend our ideals, our rights, and our shores. To this defense we must dedicate our accumulation of wealth, our activities, our minds and hearts, our individual liberties, our place in the sun, our very lives if necessary. We must build, as quickly as possible, a war machine of such strength that it can claim and hold unrivaled superiority in the air as well as on the seas. This is absolutely necessary and of primary and urgent importance. The side which controls the air with bombers has, in military terms, that "superiority of fire" which determines the victor. With a firm hand we must control not for revenge but for our own protection all subversive elements, the "fifth columnists," whether on the air, in the factories, or on the farm. At this stage of the game, it is not for us to reason why; it is for us to do with all our might, or our country may die.

A constituent of mine, in a letter, demands an answer to the specific question, "Will you vote for convoys?" Another asks me, "Will you vote to send our soldiers to foreign lands to die on battlefields?" I honestly do not know what questions may come before us, nor how they will be put. Those who talk about convoys are already out of date, as the President, being Commander in Chief, has the constitutional right to decision, and we now know protection must come from the air rather than from ships at sea. One thing I do know is that in this hour of menace and swiftly moving events I will vote to defend our shores, our institutions, our ideals, our homes, and our sacred honor. The battle for our defense may be fought in the Atlantic or in the Pacific Ocean. It may be fought on the coast of Brazil or in New York Harbor. Choice of place of battle may not be ours.

It is folly to talk of isolation when you can span the ocean in a few hours, when you can eat dinner on the Atlantic border and breakfast within sound of the dashing waves of the Pacific. When we shall strike for home and fireside, is the only question and the important question before us. It is largely a military question. Shall we strike for home and fireside while the thin wavering line of Britain holds or shall we hold our fire? Good citizens often say we are not prepared; we are not ready; we are too weak. In the words of Patrick Henry, "When will we be stronger?"

Our fate probably rests upon our ability to produce light metals, aluminium, and magnesium, with which to construct airplanes in overwhelming numbers. The German boys have been riding airplanes made of magnesium and aluminum, and they have been riding them to victory all over Europe. Light metals at this time seem to be essential to success. Our wonderful Columbia River power resources can make the contribution.

Germany has a production of light metals about equal to our own. The German war machine is now compelling Norway, France, and other conquered territories to supplement its production of magnesium and aluminum. This means Hitler can double his production of light metals. We can match this only by immediate completion and utilization of Bonneville and Grand Coulee projects. Defense calls for construction of other dams on the Columbia River, notably at Umatilla and The Dalles. We have the capacity and natural conditions to exceed any possible construction of light metals by the Axis Powers, if our natural resources are fully developed. But the critics say that it will take too long a time. It will take years, perhaps, but who knows when the need will be over? The war has gone on nearly two years now.

It is folly to talk of a negotiated peace. It would be only an armistice, at best. Full well do we know that the Axis Powers would violate any and every provision of such a treaty. "Fifth columnists" would blossom in every village and hamlet, just as Hitler describes the plan in Mein Kampf. His demands would come by slow degrees but would be nonetheless effective. None of those demands singly would be worth fighting for. A year ago France asked for an armistice—France, that has contributed so much to civilization and human welfare, is now disgraced and dishonored. She has become today an open ally of the nation which she knows will cut her throat and bleed her to death. France will sink into oblivion, just as Hitler has outlined it in Mein Kampf.

Honest laborers, organized and unorganized, must know that they will lose everything if Hitler dictates terms of peace or the terms of an armistice. Capitalistic industry must know that it will lose everything if Hitler dictates terms of peace or of an armistice. Complete world domination and world rule is what the German machine is driving toward. Hitler worships no god but force. He knows no law but his own will. Once enthroned, his authority cannot be overthrown by revolt within. Revolts, in the past, were possible, but not in this day of mechanized warfare and the Gestapo. Hitler's secret police, when they once enter a conquered land, remove to concentration camps or graves everyone who could lead a revolt.

We lovers of freedom and liberty cannot betray our illustrious ancestry. We must win this struggle against the Hitler machine or lose everything. The choice is not for us. If the gage of battle is thrown at our feet we will have no alternative. No one thinks Hitler will land on our continental shores should England break. No student can doubt that if England succumbs control of the seas will go where the British Navy goes. We have the resources; we have the men; we have the money; and we must have the will to defend our ideals and our way of life as our ancestors defended their ideals of freedom. This is no time to dwell upon the past mistakes of the British Empire. Those who expand on that subject love Hitler more.

Every true American today must hope and pray that the prophecy of Swinburne may prove true:

All our past acclaims our future: Shakespeare's voice and Nelson's hand,
Milton's faith and Wordsworth's trust in this our chosen and chainless land,
Bear us witness: Come the world against her, England yet will stand.

JUSTICE IN OUR TIME

(By W. C. McGinnis, superintendent of schools of Perth Amboy, N. J.)

Freedom, liberty, justice—these are among the most precious words known to man. "* * * with liberty and justice for all" is a phrase familiar to all Americans. But we are not so familiar with the origin of our concept of justice.

It is the irony of fate and a harsh commentary on world civilization that the people who gave to the world our ideal of justice is the one people to whom, more than to any other, justice is denied, for civilization got its ideal of justice from the Jew. And it is more than passing strange that the nation that in these latter years is crucifying justice and with barbaric and murderous ruthlessness has proclaimed to the world that within her borders the Jew has no right or claim to justice, is Germany, for among the contributions of various peoples to the common store of civilization in days of long ago was Germany's burning zeal for liberty.

The Hebrew's conception of justice which he gave to the world is that justice is an attribute of God Himself. "Justice and judgment are the habitation of Thy throne." A reading of the Old Testament shows that in psalm and prophesy the Hebrew proclaimed to the world the idea that justice is universal and eternal and that regardless of obstacles and reverses justice will prevail.

Contrast the ancient Hebrew's conception of justice with that of any other people. To the Hebrew justice was not a blind goddess weighing unseen things in the balances. Nor did he think of justice as holding the unsheathed sword of vengeance. No; to the Jew justice was not blind and it was not vengeful, because it came from God and "His mercy endureth forever."

Here in America and in other lands where freedom, liberty, and justice have not been abolished by a power-crazed and oppressive dictatorship the ancient Hebrew conception of justice is civilization's ideal of justice.

We all know that the great common store of the good that makes and sustains civilization is made up of the contributions of various peoples. These contributions were the ideals sought for and attained by different nations and handed on to us as a common heritage. They are the foundation of our civilization, and if the foundation is allowed to be undermined civilization itself will fail.

The history of mankind is the history of man's search for an ideal. Sometimes it was the ideal of beauty in art and literature, as with the ancient Greeks; sometimes it was the ideal of religion and justice, as with the ancient Hebrews; sometimes it was the ideal of liberty, as with the old-time Germans; sometimes it was the ideal of constitutional government based on the rights of men, as with the English; sometimes it was the ideal of a representative democracy and equality of opportunity, as with Thomas Jefferson and the American Colonists; sometimes it was the ideal of unity and liberty—"government of the people, by the people, and for the people"; sometimes it was the ideal of "a world safe for democracy" based on equality of opportunity, on the proposition that might does not make right, and on the brotherhood of man, as with Woodrow Wilson and the American people of 1917.

The Jews have made other contributions to the welfare of mankind, as in science, in medicine, and in literature. The influence of the grand and beautiful language of the Old Testament has a predominant place in the literature of all the nations of the world. But the greatest contribution of the Jews to civilization is the Hebrew ideal of justice. The conception of justice that is accepted even if not practiced in the world today is the contribution of the Jew, and it is the greatest contribution any people has ever made to the good in the common store of civilization.

The Jew may be driven up and down on the face of the earth; he may be driven out of his homeland as he has been driven out of Germany; he may be placed upon a ship upon the face of the deep with no port where he is allowed to land; but nothing can ever erase from the pages of history the fact that it is to the Jew that the world owes its ideal of justice. And some day eternal and triumphant justice shall prevail for the Jew.

AN UNSUNG HERO OF 1776

(By William C. McGinnis, superintendent, Perth Amboy, N. J.)

"Each generation freedom's creed[1]
Must be with harshness taught,
And freemen warned that all they have
And are was dearly bought;
And oft must Lexington be roused
And Concord's fight be fought."

Freedom and liberty were never conferred upon any nation. The freedom and liberty of a nation have always been attained by fighting for them. The freedom and liberty of a people can be maintained only by fighting for them. Americanism, the freedom and liberty of the American people, can be maintained only by combating those forces which are enemies of our form of government and it makes no difference whether those forces are communism, nazi-ism, or fascism.

If American freedom and liberty mean anything, they mean freedom and liberty for all. To know what they mean we need to know our history. That is why freedom's creed must be taught and Lexington be roused in each generation. We take too much for granted. We are too complacent in our freedom and liberty. Of late years it has been the fashion to belittle Concord and Lexington and the process by which Americanism was established.

At the recent meeting of the bund at Madison Square Garden, one of the speakers read a list of names of Jews who he said were enemies past and present of the United States. In the list was the name of Haym Salomon.

Charles Spencer Hart in "General Washington's Son of Israel" (Lippincott) tells the story of Haym Salomon. Charles Spencer Hart tells three episodes in the drama of Haym Salomon and the birth of the United States:

1. In a synagogue in Philadelphia. It is Yom Kippur. The most sacred period in the ceremony is in progress. A rider in the Continental Army uniform rides up to the building and enters. "I am a courier from General Washington. Is Haym Salomon here?"

A small man in a Quaker hat steps forward. He receives a letter from the courier. He reads it. Then he speaks in soft Jewish accents, "Tell General Washington that his appeal shall not be in vain." General Washington asks for $200,000. Haym Salomon pledges all his resources. His companions pledge various sums. The total amount is raised and the Hebrews return to their religious exercises and the worship of God.

2. The second episode is in Paris. King Louis XVI and Benjamin Franklin are in conference with regard to the request of the infant American Republic for financial support from France.

"But who," asks the King, "will guarantee the subsidies you ask?" Franklin replies quietly, "Haym Salomon."

[1] Rhymes of Vermont Rural Life—Daniel L. Cady.

"It is enough," the King rejoins.

3. The third episode. In the obituary column of the Philadelphia Journal and Advertiser of January 8, 1785, is a one-line obituary: "On Thursday died Haym Salomon, a broker."

Haym Salomon's history is a history of generous financial and personal service to his country never excelled in this or any other nation. It is an outstanding example of what the Jewish people have done for this country and for other nations of the world.

It is not my purpose here to tell the story of Haym Salomon. Read it as written by Charles Spencer Hart. The three episodes I have cited are only three incidents in Haym Salomon's life of devotion and service to his country. He paid the salaries of three future Presidents of the United States and he paid the expenses of Lafayette's Army.

In 1925 President Coolidge suggested building a memorial to Haym Salomon, but nothing was done.

In Philadelphia on a hill of old and narrow streets one may come to Plum Street and the little old cemetery of Mikveh Israel. Here Haym Salomon is buried.

Farm Labor Shortage

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. H. CARL ANDERSEN

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 19, 1941

RESOLUTION OF THE HOLSTEIN FRIESIAN ASSOCIATION

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following resolution adopted at the annual meeting of the Holstein Friesian Association requesting the deferment in classification of workers on dairy farms. The farm labor situation is becoming very acute and it would seem that the production of food is of the utmost necessity to national defense.

RESOLUTION REQUESTING DEFERMENT IN CLASSIFICATION OF WORKERS ON DAIRY FARMS

Whereas it is vitally essential to the defense program of the United States and to the rendering of necessary aid to Great Britain to enable her to carry on the war against the Axis Powers that the production of food supplies and other materials on the farms of this country be maintained not only at their present high level but increased and expanded to the maximum capacity; and

Whereas the President of the United States and other governmental authorities have called upon the farmers of America to put forth their greatest efforts in the production of foodstuffs and particularly dairy products; and

Whereas it is imperative in the accomplishment of this purpose to have an adequate supply of competent workers on the farms of the Nation; and

Whereas the greatly increased industrial activity with its higher wages to industrial workers has caused many who formerly worked on farms to leave them for employment in industrial centers, and the selective service system as heretofore administered has called many farm youths into the military service, all of which has resulted in an acute shortage of workers on the farms, particularly in the field of dairy farming where trained and experienced help is most important, which shortage is having a serious and increasing effect upon the entire farm program and especially on dairy farms: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Holstein-Friesian Association of America in its annual convention assembled at Lansing, Mich., this 4th day of June 1941, That recognizing the patriotic duty of the farmers of America to do all within their power to operate their farms at their highest possible capacity and to grow, produce, harvest, and market in sufficient quantities the foodstuffs and other materials so vitally needed, and desiring to aid in the fulfillment of said purpose, that consideration be given to the increasingly acute farm labor shortage now existing and that it be recognized that registrants who are trained workers on dairy farms of America are necessary in their civilian activity and by reason thereof should be given deferment in class 2-A:

Resolved further, That a copy of this resolution be immediately sent to the President of the United States, to the Secretary of Agriculture, and to Brig. Gen. Lewis B. Hershel, acting director of the selective service system, with the request that the importance of the deferment of these workers be emphasized to the officials of the selective service system throughout the various States.

Shall We Feed Europe?

HON. EDITH NOURSE ROGERS

OF MASSACHUSETTS

ARTICLE FROM THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article:

SHALL WE FEED EUROPE?

(By Herbert Hoover and Dorothy Canfield Fisher)

MR. HOOVER SAYS—

We are struggling today against terrific odds to preserve the value and sanctity of life for the individual man—what happens to the starving among the 80,000,000 people in the occupied democracies of Europe is but one-half of the impending tragedy. The other one-half of this tragedy is what happens in the process to the soul of America faced with the demand for human compassion. If to the helplessness of the weak is to be added now the indifference of the strong, then I say, upon the outcome of this struggle may depend not only the future of certain nationalities but the questionable permanence of a religion that disowns the brotherhood of man. I have faith that if we understand the danger this tragedy will not be permitted.

On a recent evening Lord Halifax, the British Ambassador, addressed the Pilgrims in New York City. In defining the words freedom and democracy he said: "I would state thus what in varying forms is in many minds today: First the religious principle of the absolute value of every human." I heartily agree with that statement. There is no false humanitarianism in those words when applied to all people. And there will be no false humanitarianism in this struggle today if the teachings of the Prince of Peace are followed. For "every" to me means not only "every" British woman and child but "every" Belgian woman and child; "every" Norwegian; "every" Finnish; "every" Danish; "every" Polish; "every" Dutch; "every" French; "every" Spanish; "every" Chinese and indeed, "every" starving helpless person of "every" nation. That which makes a humanitarianism false is not the supposed necessity of some military strategy but the refusal of human compassion and bread to every starving disease-ridden people.

The other day I read with agreement also a statement by Mr. Adolf A. Berle, Jr., an Assistant Secretary of State. After describing a religion that had the power to change the face of the earth, he said, "Foremost was the conception that no individual was forgotten, none left out." That's the purpose of the National Committee on Food for the Small Democracies. We believe there should be no forgotten Belgian; no forgotten Norwegian; no forgotten Pole, Dane, Dutchman or anyone else. None should be left out if the brotherhood of man is to remain at the heart of true religion. The arguments today against our Christian duty to feed these people I faced in the last war. I say today again what I said then to Lloyd George, Prime Minister of Great Britain, "It would be an ironic thing for the British soldiers to march into Belgium and find her people all dead, or but a shell left." It is upon a people helped to survive by our intervention that the future of Europe has to be built.

General Smuts, surveying what the war and the blockade and counter-blockade had done to Europe, said: "It is the most awful spectacle in history, and no man with any heart or regard for human destiny can contemplate it without the deepest emotion."

And we have agreed to all-out aid for Britain. We have now a responsibility in the policies of this war. We have a right to speak through our Government in these matters. And in a country of precious freedom of speech we have a right to debate its policies.

So I appeal to the compassion of the Christian churches, to her ministers, to her devoted people to come to the assistance of the starving among these 80,000,000 people. Let us not visit the tragedy of the first World War on civilian populations again.

I believe General Pershing and Admiral Pratt (World War leaders) are right when they say our plan confers no benefit on Germany nor disadvantage on Great Britain.

The compassionate example and teachings of the Prince of Peace bid us to answer the prayer of 80,000,000 who cry, "Give us this day our daily bread."

MRS. FISHER SAYS—

In a periodical dedicated, as the Christian Herald is, to keeping open the channels of spiritual life, there is less need than in other magazines to say and then to repeat that Christianity and humane feeling for our fellow human beings are valid motives for trying to get food to the hungry. In fact, it is not only in magazines directly professing Christian principles that one finds a ready admission that, of course, from the religious and humane point of view, those who have more than they need should try to help and share with those who are suffering because they have less. Dr. Polling's ardent, eloquent editorial in the Christian Herald, Imperative—Now! lays a warm-hearted emphasis on the need to try to help the starving. To the credit of the religious leaders of our country be it said, the same attitude is found in a large majority of the statements made by the notables of other religious bodies.

The words of our Lord are too plain to be distorted, "For I was an hungered and ye gave me meat," is as much a part of the fiber of our collective American mind as Lincoln's "Fourscore and seven years ago our fathers brought forth on this continent a new nation, conceived in liberty and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal."

No; nobody needs to think up answers to arguments that it is Christian to refuse food to the hungry. No such arguments can be made, are made. Chapter and verse from Scripture meet with a vague, unwilling assent from practically everyone. The obstacle to be surmounted is just one short, formidable word—"but." How many times do we hear it said, perhaps say ourselves, "Yes; of course, it would be the right thing to do, from the purely moral point of view, to send food to the hungry, but * * *" or "My heart simply aches for the suffering over there, but * * *."

It is with that "but" ringing in my ears that I begin to set down some of the reasons, not the well-recognized, humane, decent reasons for trying to live up to the minimum of decently human principles, but the plain, factual, logical reasons for pushing that "but * * *" to one side and going forward toward the only action of which we won't be heartily ashamed in years to come.

After the "but" what words come next? Perhaps the phrase most often heard is, "but—it would help Hitler." This reason is usually backed up with a statement that the Germans really got most, or a good deal anyhow, of the food distributed by the Commission for Relief in Belgium during the 1914–18 war. Fortunately evidence on this point is available, evidence that would be accepted by any responsible law court in any civilized country. The Belgium Relief Commission was administered by a considerable number of reputable, responsible citizens of the United States, of Belgium, of France. Not one of them—not a single one of them—has ever said that food meant for the starving Belgians was confiscated by the Germans. Seventy-three living members of the Belgian Commission (many of them have become well-known public figures since) who directed the distribution of food from August 1914 to November 1918 have signed a statement absolutely denying the truth of the rumor now darkening our air, that the Germans interfered with their work or took any (but the smallest amounts, and those refunded from German stocks) of the food that was sent in for the starving of the invaded countries. The accounts of the Belgian Relief Commission were published, down to the last detail, in 1925, and never questioned. During the 4 years of the war, the French Government, the British Government, repeatedly and publicly stated that food was reaching the people of the invaded regions only. During the 20 years since the last war, nobody said, anywhere, in any form, that the Belgian Relief Commission had been fooled by the German authorities. Now really * * *.

When somebody gives you as basis for the statement that Germans ate the food distributed by the Belgian Relief workers, a story which was told her by an American soldier who saw—or a report from the friend of a friend who heard that—it is really safe for you to reply with a flat old-fashioned "That just ain't so." There is no evidence to prove such statements, none at all. There is an abundance of undisputed evidence to the contrary. It would clear the air of what is the merest gossip if every one of us would rise up with rather an exasperated snort whenever that "but" is followed by "the Germans got a whole lot of food which was intended for the Belgians in the last war." Here is an argument which really should be ruled out of any ordinarily intelligent discussion.

You will find that, as soon as you have knocked down and dragged out this first absurdity, that the next obstacle is this idea: "Well, maybe the Belgian Relief operated in 1914–18 without interference from German authorities, but the Germans are ever so much more unscrupulous now, ever so much more experienced in lying and falsity of all kinds. They'd soon find a way to get around any sort of precautions which could be invented by our nice, open-minded (rather simple-minded) Americans."

Maybe so. Who knows? Certainly those who oppose the feeding of hungry women and children do not know, for they can't look into the future any more than other people. There's only one way to find out whether the Germans would get around any precautions taken by American relief to get food to the people conquered by the Germans. That's to try. What's the risk in trying? There is a risk, a very small one. It's this—that the Germans might get food for two or three days more. But the carefully made plans of the American Committee on Food provide for a steady flow of small amounts of food, rather than for the piling up of great quantities. If the Germans seized all that is on hand at any one time, and transported it all to feed Germans, they would have just three days' provisions. How much would that influence the outcome of the war? This fact, for it's no theoretical argument, just a plain fact, cannot be too often repeated. It must be repeated over and over, as long as the statement is heard that Germans, not the hungry civilians in the conquered countries, will eat any food sent in from America.

But you will find—there's a regular foretellable progression in the talk about all this—that when you have finally silenced a prophecy advanced as a fact, the next obstacle is a statement phrased about like this, "But the American and neutral people running this attempt won't know—how can they—whether they are getting all the food sent in or not?"

These primitively simple material objections are only the first usually brought out. Just as much to be expected is this argument which might be called political, "Who are we, unbombed in our safe homes, to try to tell England, fighting for her very life, what's the right thing to do? We should do exactly what England wants done." Well, in the first place there isn't the slightest danger of our not doing what England wants. We can't very well do anything else, since England's say-so as to the blockade absolutely decides the matter. So there's no question of doing what the British Government decides it doesn't want done. But not even to talk about what we think is the Christian, decent, and the wisest way to meet a tragic situation! Only totalitarians could wish us to give up our democratic right to think for ourselves about matters involving human welfare, and having thought, to present publicly our reasons.

For, leaving out entirely all the reasons of the heart which come rushing warmly and emotionally to anyone who has been brought up in a civilized country, it seems obvious to large numbers of Americans that as a matter of mere political policy, it would be better for our cause not to leave to their fate those citizens of democracies conquered by dictatorships without making an effort to help them. If we could help them in a military way, how quickly would we act. There is a chance, a possibility that we can help them in a nonmilitary way. If we do, will we furnish them with reason for thinking more or less of democracies? The question answers itself. Some weeks ago—no, it is really some months ago, so completely is this last argument fading and withering in the light of common sense—one heard it said that if the conquered people were starved enough, they would be more inclined to revolt against their German conquerors. But that is seldom said now. The physical weakness and depression which comes from near-starvation is too well-known a fact to overlook. And it has become more and more proved that the conquered peoples of Europe are boiling in resentment and hatred against their conquerors now, ready to revolt at the appearance of the slightest chance of successful rebellion. To enfeeble by lack of food those people more passionately ready than any others to resist Nazi ideas—that is obviously weakening a wing of one's own army. If we could arm them with machine guns and tanks and ammunition to fight their conquerors, what mountains of military supplies would we rush into their hands. To keep up their bodily strength with food, and their spirits by the knowledge that they are not forgotten but cherished by nations still free—why is that not, even from a military standpoint, as useful to the great cause for which we are, all of us, hoping and praying?

United Office and Professional Workers of America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS F. FORD

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 19, 1941

Mr. THOMAS F. FORD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the House to an address made on the floor by the distinguished gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN] on June 9, 1941, in which he charged that the white-collar workers of M. Lowenstein & Sons, Inc., of New York, were "reds," seeking to control this important defense industry for the purpose of impeding national defense.

As a matter of fact, it is my honest opinion that what the so-called "red" workers and union officials were and are seeking to do to better the economic position and preserve their union. In substantiation of this there is being held a National Labor Relations Board election to determine whether Local 16, United Office and Professional Workers of America (C. I. O.) shall represent the workers as bargaining agent. In the course of his remarks the distinguished gentleman from Michigan makes a number of what appear to me to be unwarranted charges against Lewis Merrill, national president, and Peter K. Hawley, president of, and Norma Aronson, general organizer of Local 16.

Lewis Merrill, president of the United Office and Professional Workers of America, in reply to Representative HOFFMAN'S remarks on the U. O. P. W. A., made the following statement:

I have just read the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD containing the vicious attack against myself and my organization by Representative HOFFMAN in the House of Representatives on June 9, 1941. I deny in toto the charges made in that statement. I further state that if Representative HOFFMAN will divest himself of his congressional immunity and make those same statements in a manner which would allow for court action, I will unhesitatingly sue him for libel, as I would any newspaper or anyone else who will take responsibility for these statements.

It is my deliberate judgment that Representative HOFFMAN has accommodated his high office to serve the interest of a unionhating employer who has already been cited for contempt for flagrant violation of the National Labor Relations Act. This firm, M. Lowenstein & Sons, Inc., must appear before the United States circuit court of appeals on June 16 to answer an N. L. R. B. citation for contempt because of its refusal to obey a Board order to disband its company union and cease its unfair labor practices. Representative HOFFMAN'S attack upon our organization has served to encourage a lawbreaker in pursuance of its illegal antilabor acts. The day following Representative HOFFMAN'S statement, M. Lowenstein & Sons discharged an employee, who testified before the Labor Board, for wearing a union button. The gentleman from Michigan and those who give currency to his remarks are responsible for the loss of this man's job and for what may follow.

I am not now, and have not been, a member of the Communist Party. I believe in the American system of free enterprise and seek to preserve our democratic political institutions against all those who threaten it, including those employer interests Representative HOFFMAN so loudly represents. Communism is no issue in our union, and will not become so, despite the apparent efforts of Representative HOFFMAN or the Dies committee or anyone else to divert us from our seeking genuine collective-bargaining contracts.

Peter K. Hawley, president of Local 16, U. O. P. W. A., made the following statement:

In a period of grave national problems Representative HOFFMAN, Monday, June 9, 1941, consumed considerable time on the floor of the House of Representatives to launch an attack consisting almost entirely of misstatements concerning the activities of the union and a declaration in support of a company union in the firm of M. Lowenstein & Sons, Inc. Its purpose was subsequently revealed when, on Monday, June 16 (10 days before the N. L. R. B. election), a copy of the speech was distributed, under the frank of Representative HOFFMAN, addressed to each employee in the firm of M. Lowenstein & Sons, Inc., entitled "Reds Seek Control of Office Workers." The committee of fellow employees in Lowenstein, labeled as a company union by the National Labor Relations Board, has made public admission that the remarks of Representative HOFFMAN were the result of an interview which they had with him in Washington prior to his attack on the union. No effort was made by Representative HOFFMAN to ascertain the facts, either prior to his statement or since. The circumstances under which the speech was made, the manner in which it was mailed, and the time at which it was delivered clearly point to collaboration between a Member of the Congress of the United States and a company union outlawed by the National Labor Relations Board.

On the very day that the letters were distributed among the employees—unjustionably designed to affect the election—leading officers of the company went on trial in the United States Circuit Court of Appeals charged by the National Labor Relations Board with contempt of court, as a result of violating a decree of that court entered into by M. Lowenstein & Sons, Inc., on October 24, 1938. The seriousness of this charge is indicated by the fact that since the Wagner Act was passed there have been less than a dozen such cases brought before the courts. The complaint was signed by Harry A. Millis, Chairman; Edwin S. Smith, member; and William M. Leiserson, member, of the National Labor Relations Board.

On March 26, 1938, M. Lowenstein & Sons, Inc., was found guilty by the National Labor Relations Board of establishing a company union and engaging in other acts designed to interfere with the organizational efforts of its employees as a result of a complaint submitted by Local 16, United Office and Professional Workers of America. The company union was ordered dissolved and the employer ordered to cease and desist from interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of their rights to self-organization. M. Lowenstein & Sons, Inc., opposed the Board order until October 24, 1938, when the circuit court of appeals entered into a decree with the firm, enforcing the order of the Board.

On February 10, 1941, the United Office and Professional Workers of America, Local 16, requested the firm to engage in collective bargaining. Another company union was established, known as the Committee of Fellow Employees. The National Labor Relations Board, after thoroughly investigating, has found that this act is in violation of the existing court order and the contempt of court trial, which is now on, is the result of these investigations.

M. Lowenstein & Sons, Inc., was found guilty of a third National Labor Relations Board violation by a decision handed down on February 17, 1941. The National Labor Relations Board found that the employer foisted a company union among the machine printers in its Rockhill, N. C., plant. Yet, in the face of this record, Congressman HOFFMAN has used his office to defend the Lowenstein firm and aid its company union. One of the consequences of Representative HOFFMAN'S remarks has been the discharge of a National Labor Relations Board witness in the contempt proceedings, John Johnsen, for union activities.

The union has gone on record of its own willingness, following certification as the collective bargaining agent of Lowenstein workers, to submit all differences arising from negotiations to mediation and arbitration. There has never, at any time, been any question of strike action, but every effort has been made to settle the union's differences through the legally prescribed channels.

Representative HOFFMAN has referred to testimony of discredited witnesses before the Dies committee as the basis of his charges against the United Office and Professional Workers of America, Local 16, despite the fact that Lewis Merrill, president of the union, has repeatedly denied any affiliation with the Communist Party and has requested an opportunity to appear before the Dies committee to refute these charges, which has never been granted.

The officers of local 16 and its membership, and specifically Norma Aronson and Peter K. Hawley, named in the Hoffman accusation, are concerned only with exercising the right of white-collar workers to organize and improve their standards. They are opposed to any group which might seek to control or influence the policies of their union in any other direction than that of the program of the Congress of Industrial Organizations.

Congressman HOFFMAN has charged that a section of the membership has bolted from local 16 because of its policies. The records will show that the only persons "who left our organization" were the employees in the office of the International Ladies' Garment Workers Union, at the time when the union itself deserted the Congress of Industrial Organizations and returned to the American Federation of Labor. The white-collar workers in private industry are proud of their union. They look upon such actions as Congressman HOFFMAN'S in the light of the record of the firm which he is supporting, as a union-breaking act which has no place in Congressional chambers, and detracts from the dignity of the Congress.

The above statements are inserted in the RECORD for the purpose of enabling the House to hear both sides and exercise individual judgment in the premises.

The Story of Washington State's Old-Age Pension Law

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN M. COFFEE
OF WASHINGTON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 19, 1941

ARTICLE BY HON. N. P. ATKINSON

Mr. COFFEE of Washington. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include an interesting and provocative article written by the Honorable N. P. Atkinson, president of the Old Age Pension Union of the State of Washington, and the Honorable William J. Pennock, executive secretary of that union, and who is a State representative.

These two gentlemen were recently in the National Capital, where they conferred with the National Social Security Board. They have been among the foremost exponents of a decent State pension act in our State. They promoted the Initiative No. 141, known as the Senior Citizens' Act, which they describe in the following article. But let the article speak for itself.

[From the magazine US week of June 14, 1941]

DESIGN FOR LIVING AT 65

(By Washington State Senator N. P. Atkinson, president of Washington Old Age Pension Union, and State Representative William J. Pennock, union's executive secretary)

There are millions of impoverished old people in the United States, people who have spent their lives in useful work but who are now suffering from lack of proper food and medical attention.

In the State of Washington every person will get a minimum pension of $40 a month, as well as free medical attention, after he has reached the age of 65. And he doesn't have to be a pauper to get it.

He can own his own home. He can have his own car. He can have an insurance policy. But he still needs food and rent money and security, and in the State of Washington he gets these—or at least gets a vital contribution toward these irreducible expenses through a State pension.

BOOST APPROPRIATION

How did we do it? Through organization. We increased State old-age pensions from $22 a month to $40 a month and increased the number of pensioners from 40,000 to 60,000. We boosted the appropriation for old-age pensions from $22,000,000 to $55,000,000 per biennium at one session of the legislature.

This is the victory which the Washington Old Age Pension Union has just wrung from a reluctant Democratic legislature and from the backers of Republican Governor Langlie. Here are five factors which led to this victory:

(1) Our pension plan, known as the Senior Citizens Act (initiative 141). In the State of Washington we do not have to depend upon the legislature entirely. By securing over 100,000 valid signatures of voters we put the Senior Citizens Act on the ballot. Now it cannot be repealed or even changed for at least 2 years.

The act contained no "funny money" clause. It contained no clause at all for raising necessary funds. It simply gave a mandate to the legislature for that body to do its appropriating duty. Enemies attempted to make a great deal of the fact that we did not place all our eggs in one basket of an exclusive taxing clause. If we had followed the exmple of some other States and done so, these same enemies would have been the first to attack the taxing clause, no matter what method was provided. In fact, they had beaten a previous pension plan in 1935, by praising its general intent, but criticizing its revenue-raising clause.

So we had a good, sound initiative, with strong specific provisions, such as a $40-a-month minimum at 65, free medical and dental care in addition to the pension, a standard of need that would double the number of recipients on the rolls, and exemptions for a homestead, for a person's car, for insurance policies with $500 cash surrender value. In addition, we provided a simplified method of hearing on grievances, and for court appeals for which the State pays the cost.

The minimum of $40 was important, for with a $30 maximum pension during the preceding biennium the State social-security department has simply taken the legislature's appropriation, divided it into 20 equal parts, and spread the resulting poverty over 40,000 pensioners at an average of $22. Under the Senior Citizens Act, the first $40 checks were sent out March 1, 1941, and while some deductions were made that the Pension Union deems unauthorized, the present level shows that at least 60,000 pensioners will receive an average of $34 each.

ALLIES HELP DRIVE

(2) Another factor: We searched for and found allies. If it had not been for the communications we sent to trade-unions and the speeches we made before them, many of them would not have sufficiently realized our victory was also a victory against antiunion forces. They would not have worked and contributed as they did.

Other allies we won included the Townsendites, who wanted to eat while they worked for a national pension, and who knew the Pension Union supported 100 percent their drive for a national pension; the small merchants, who saw the new pension grants would flow into their tills; the education associations, aware that the tax dodgers were as much opposed to education money as to pensions; the farmers and granges, so impoverished they eyed $30 for a married couple with delight; and our political friend and guide with whom we are affiliated, the Washington Commonwealth Federation—broad people's movement.

(3) Another factor was the political education of our members. The Washington Old Age Pension Union encouraged all discussion which broadened the general political and economic outlook of its members, and related the pension to other social gains for which unions and other people's organizations are fighting. Thus our locals discuss taxes, prices, profits, wages, and farm and labor problems. We wanted to be sure after we got $40 for our senior citizens that that $40 would buy more than the previous $22. We have not tolerated red-baiting in our locals.

(4) The fourth factor was pension organization. At no time in the legislative campaign did we let it divert us from getting new members. With the payment of the $40 pensions on March 1, and the filing of tens of thousands of new applications, and the resulting work by grievance committees in every local, we have insisted that the only guaranty of holding our gains and getting new ones is to build the pension locals. This has resulted during the last year in a 60 percent increase in membership, and a growth of active locals to 150.

(5) The final factor was militancy. This is the spirit which refused to be intimidated by the attacks of Tory newspapers and the calamity-howling of the paid propagandists of the power trust, who spend hundreds of thousands of dollars trying to discredit and invalidate Initiative 141, according to direct testimony at the recent investigation held by the Federal Power Commission.

This militancy is what kept the pensioners firm to defend the rights of those off the pension rolls as well as those on, to fight for aid to dependent children and their mothers, for the physically handicapped, for those on general relief, for every category of public assistance.

For instance, the Pension Union doubled the grant to dependent children through a determined fight at this year's session of the legislature, although the Republican governor later vetoed the increase. A picket line kept going on the capitol steps, and packed the corridors so tightly with our members on State Capitol Mobilization Day that legislators almost had to crawl over their heads to get out of the house and senate chambers.

FIGHT FOR INTERPRETATION

The fight will be carried forward for a better interpretation of the senior citizens act. There are still too many and too large deductions, including $6 from each check where pensioners live together, and a deduction of $12 for the estimated rental value of shacks in Hooverville, etc. We are bringing test suits in these cases.

We've made a good start in Washington, and now that we've done it, we can say it was easy. We believe it was only a start. We believe there will be schemes aimed at nullifying our gains. But we're going to be alert. And we know that it's a Nation-wide problem. Wherever there are old people or people who expect to be old, there the pension movement will grow. And that is all over.

Tribute to the Flag

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES V. HEIDINGER

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 19, 1941

ARTICLE BY J. A. HILLIARD

Mr. HEIDINGER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include therein a Tribute to the Flag, by Mr. J. A. Hilliard, published in the Wayne County Press, of Fairfield, Ill., on May 29, 1941:

[From the Wayne County Press, Fairfield, Ill.]

TRIBUTE TO THE FLAG

(By J. A. Hilliard, Spanish-American War veteran and national historian of Veterans of All Wars Association)

That flag presents the most beautiful combination of national colors that was ever unfurled.

It has carried more joy to more humble hearthstones than any insignia of government that ever floated in the sun-kissed breezes of heaven.

The red in that flag is redder than the rising sun when it bursts above the eastern horizon with a face of insufferable splendor; redder than the carnation whose colors are brewed in the workshops of Nature; redder than the flush of joy that mantles the cheek of the young mother when she feels for the first time her first-born's breath.

It typifies the blood that flowed down the slopes of Bunker Hill; stained the snows of Valley Forge; gushed from wounds at Lundys Lane and Buena Vista; the warm heart current that reddened the sod at Gettysburg; consecrated the apple blossoms at Appomattox; freed the oppressed at Santiago and Manila and poured over Flanders Fields.

The White in that flag is as white as the driven snow when it flows uncontaminated from the hand of God; whiter than the calla lily that blossoms beneath the fostering care of the loving housewife; whiter than the sacred veil that envelops the blushing bride; whiter than the silver beam that shoots the evening star.

It typifies the purity of the patriotism that animated American manhood on a thousand blood-bought fields and a hundred crimson seas.

The blue in that flag, is as blue as the arched dome of heaven; bluer than the modest violet that blossoms in the wood glen; bluer than the mellow radiance that flashes in the human eye.

It typifies the sacrifice of the mother who laid her stalwart first-born on the altar of his country, and kneeling at his vacant chair, prays to God, to comfort her lonely and aching heart; then seizes the sword that has fallen from the lifeless hand of the dead hero, buckles it to the waist of her remaining son and bids him go forth to conquer.

Priceless principles go with that flag:

For them, Washington, Taylor, and Grant fought; Webster and Borah plead and Lincoln died.

EDITORIAL FROM THE NEWARK (N. J.) STAR-LEDGER

Mr. VREELAND. Mr. Speaker, I was very much pleased on Friday of last week upon the rewarding of a well-deserved advancement to a very close friend of mine for services so well rendered in his chosen profession. Monsignor Kelley, though extremely busy, still finds time for many outside activities and has served well as the vice chairman of my selection board for the appointment of candidates to West Point and Annapolis.

The following editorial appearing in the Newark Star-Ledger on June 12, 1941, is a fine tribute to a fine person:

[From the Newark (N. J.) Star-Ledger]

THE RIGHT REVEREND MONSIGNOR KELLEY

In every community and among every group of men there are always certain individuals who stand out because they best personify qualities or aspirations common to all. Such personifications of abstract qualities take on distinctness with time and achievement; sometimes they are acknowledged on appropriate formal occasions, but always they are felt with a growing degree of consciousness by the community.

A formal occasion of recognition of a uniquely important personality will occur within the Roman Catholic community of New Jersey tomorrow night when the Most Reverend Thomas J. Walsh officiates at investiture ceremonies for the Right Reverend Monsignor James F. Kelley at the Seton Hall College Auditorium. On that occasion the president of Seton Hall will be invested with the robes of office to which he was named by Pope Pius XII recently.

A formal occasion is in itself a symbol; those participating represent and typify a far wider community of interest, and the occasion is but a focusing upon time. The man to be honored tomorrow serves within his faith and church, but belongs to a community as broad as the human race and personifies to those who know him and feel his influence the aspiration of all good men to understanding of their fellows.

Good citizenship has never been better exemplified than by the president of Seton Hall in his activities on behalf of his college and many other patriotic, civic, and educational efforts that have commanded his interest. With him civic duty has never been a matter of doing a share in certain conventional civic undertakings; he has never counted, measured, or budgeted his energies except for the purpose of stretching them to conform to his sense of duty.

As a priest he has earned great distinction and recognition; as an educator he has helped to build a growing and growingly progressive institution of higher learning; as a citizen he has preached and practiced an ardent, neighborly, and dynamic Americanism; as a man he has been unsparing of himself and understanding of others.

No community has so many such great citizens that it can remain unaware and unappreciative of any; the people of metropolitan New Jersey, men and women of all races and religions, must feel gratified by the honor being bestowed by the Roman Catholic Church upon a neighbor and civic leader in whose achievements all may take pride and comfort.

B'nai B'rith Aids Civilian Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SAMUEL A. WEISS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 19, 1941

ADDRESS BY HENRY MONSKY

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, District No. 3 of B'nai B'rith, considered one of the largest Jewish service organizations in the world, just concluded one of its most successful conventions in Atlantic City, N. J. The highlight of the convention was the principal address delivered by Henry Monsky, president of the supreme Lodge of B'nai B'rith, who is one of the most distinguished Jewish leaders in America, and an outstanding American. Mr. Monsky pleaded for national unity, and offered the facilities of B'nai B'rith to help the President of the United States in our great national-defense program. In discussing civilian defense, he said:

Anticipating that the time would come when all Americans would be given the opportunity to participate in the furtherance of the national-defense program, the recent triennial national convention of B'nai B'rith adopted a resolution placing at the disposal of the President and the people of the United States the entire strength and resources of the 150,000 men and women enrolled under the banner of B'nai B'rith.

That was nearly 2 months ago.

Today the millions of civilians not already engaged in some aspect of national-defense activity have been given the means for contributing their share to the defense program. Last week the President of the United States issued an Executive order creating the Office of Civilian Defense, with New York's Mayor La Guardia as director. This new arm of the Government is the President's answer to those men, women, and children who have been asking: What can we do for national defense?

All of us have been asking that question; the family man who has been deferred from military service wants to help; the housewife would like to pitch in too; the shopkeeper and the professional man would like to find a niche for themselves; even those too young to wear their country's uniform are begging for the opportunity to do their bit in civilian defense.

Civilian defense is a threefold job. It involves the organization of communities throughout the country for the maximum industrial defense; the stimulation of morale among the civilian population; and, most important of all, it calls for setting up skeleton civilian organizations for actual physical defense in the event that should become necessary. It is in this latter phase of the program that the civilian can be most helpful.

Men can learn to act as air-raid wardens, how to guide people into air-raid shelters, how to put out fires, how to quell hysteria, how to administer first aid, how to guard public utilities, and can serve in home-guard units. Women can knit, man feeding stations, serve as emergency telephone operators, conserve the food supply, and guard against profiteering. Our youth can help collect scrap metal and rubber, pinch hit as traffic guardians, help reduce fire hazards, and take over various household duties to relieve adults for more responsible tasks.

All of us, regardless of age or class or sex, can make sacrifices to buy national-defense bonds. All of us can do our share to make things more comfortable for the families of men called into the armed service by cooperating with the home-service division of the American Red Cross. All of us can help by maintaining morale on the home front and contributing toward the welfare of the men in uniform.

To do all these things, and many more, a huge civilian army of volunteers—a part-time army of democracy—is required. Millions of men, women, and children will be asked to give up their time, talents, and treasure for the common good and the common safety.

To enroll such a vast army will require careful planning. These volunteers should be given the opportunity to register on a free will basis, if possible, on a single day throughout the length and breadth of the land, a day which should be made the occasion for a great national civic demonstration. And, if practicable, why couldn't that day be July 4th? Independence Day is already our national holiday of freedom. Today when we are girding all our strength to preserve that freedom, let all who call themselves Americans, who enjoy the rights and privileges born on that July 4, 1776, celebrate Independence Day in this year 1941 by registering for national service.

Such a mighty outpouring of civilian volunteers on Independence Day would show the world that in this democracy we regard service to the nation as the highest form of patriotism in action. A mighty demonstration of national unity in action and purpose on July 4th, through the registration of the world's greatest army of civilian defenders, would be an inspiring thing. It would be an army with no uniform other than the cloak of patriotic devotion. It would be an army with no arms other than the heads, hearts, and hands of a people firm in their conviction that a democracy worth preserving and enjoying is one for which they are prepared to make any and all sacrifices.

Americans have never been found wanting in an emergency. This is an emergency. The times call for sacrifice and more sacrifice. Let us register our faith in the democracy we cherish and want to hand down to our children by a vast human mobilization for civilian defense.

All can serve. All will serve. Let us tell our Government that with a united voice. All we want to know is where and how we can serve. If we answer this call to national service it will be written that the civilian defenders of democracy were its first column.

As for the B'nai B'rith and the American Jewish community, of which it is a cross section, every last man, woman, and child belonging to B'nai B'rith and the Jewish community will be found in the ranks of the civilian defenders, as they have always been found in the ranks of those who served America in times of crisis and emergency.

Gasoline Tax in the District of Columbia

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RAYMOND S. SPRINGER

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 17, 1941

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, on the 28th day of April 1941 I introduced H. R. 4549, which, when passed, will raise the amount of gasoline tax paid by the people in the District of Columbia from 2 cents per gallon, as now, to 4 cents per gallon. Each 1 cent increase in the gasoline tax in the District of Columbia will raise from $1,000,000 to $1,500,000 in revenue for said taxing unit. With the tremendous increase in appropriations for governmental purposes in the District of Columbia this proposed increase in the gasoline tax will be welcomed, I am certain, by the people generally throughout our country.

The pending bill, H. R. 5049, is the present appropriations measure for the District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1942. It calls for the total sum of $52,547,081, and it is admitted to be the largest amount which has been sought to be appropriated for the District at any time. This bill contains an appropriating provision of $6,000,000 out of the Federal Treasury to help bear the cost of government in the District. It is a sad situation in which the taxpayers of our country find themselves when it is apparent that they are required to meet and pay their own State, county, and city taxes within their own governmental taxing units at home, and then be called upon to aid in the payment of the taxes in the District of Columbia.

Let us analyze this tax situation very briefly, and let us keep the record straight on this point. If the people within the District were now paying taxes equal to, or nearly equal to, those now paid by our own taxpayers at home, I am confident there would be no complaint from our people on this subject. But that condition does not exist. The people in the District do not pay taxes equal to, or nearly equal to, the taxes paid by the people in the several States. The tax rate on real estate in the District is but $1.75 on each $100 of value. There is an exemption of $1,000 on personal property. There is no poll tax, no income tax of any kind, and no other tax, except the gasoline tax at the rate of 2 cents per gallon, which is far below that in every State other than Missouri, which has a gasoline tax of 2 cents per gallon. This collection of taxes, which the residents of the District of Columbia pay, is far below the average of taxes paid by the people of the various States.

Respecting the gasoline taxes in the various States, I have made a survey of these items, and while each State pays the Federal tax on gasoline, which is now 1½ cents per gallon, they pay the additional amounts to their State government, which is as follows:

	Cents
Alabama	6
Arizona	5
Arkansas	6½
California	3
Colorado	4
Connecticut	3
Delaware	4
District of Columbia	2
Florida	7
Georgia	6
Idaho	5
Illinois	3
Indiana	4
Iowa	3
Kansas	3
Kentucky	5
Louisiana	7
Maine	4
Maryland	4
Massachusetts	3
Michigan	3
Minnesota	4
Mississippi	6
Missouri	2
Montana	5
Nebraska	5
Nevada	5
New Hampshire	4
New Jersey	3
New Mexico	5
New York	4
North Carolina	6
North Dakota	4
Ohio	4
Oklahoma	4
Oregon	5
Pennsylvania	3
Rhode Island	3
South Carolina	6
South Dakota	4
Tennessee	7
Texas	4
Utah	4
Vermont	4
Virginia	5
Washington	5
West Virginia	5
Wisconsin	4
Wyoming	4

In making an analysis of the various amounts of gasoline tax paid by our people for State government, we find the following:

One State, Missouri, has a gasoline tax of 2 cents per gallon, payable to the State; however, a pending bill will no doubt increase the amount of that tax; then 10 States have a gasoline tax of 3 cents per gallon; 17 States have a State gasoline tax of 4 cents per gallon; 11 States have a State tax of 5 cents per gallon; 5 States have a State gasoline tax of 6 cents; 1 State has a gasoline tax of 6½ cents per gallon; 3 States have a State gasoline tax of 7 cents per gallon.

The average for the States is 4.4 cents per gallon.

Therefore, the present rate in the District of Columbia, of 2 cents per gallon on gasoline is far below that of all contiguous States, and of all States, except Missouri.

May I say that the States of Maryland, Virginia, and West Virginia, which are adjacent to the District, each have a much higher gasoline tax than is now in force in such District. Maryland has a 4-cent tax on gasoline, while Virginia and West Virginia each have a 5-cent gasoline tax. This variance in such tax imposes a very great hardship upon those engaged in the sale of that commodity in nearby Maryland, Virginia, and West Virginia. They are faced with a heavier tax burden, and the selling price of gasoline must be increased to meet it. This gives a distinct advantage to those engaged in the sale of gasoline within the District over those so engaged in the nearby States.

While the District calls upon the taxpayers of our Nation to make an annual contribution of millions of dollars with which to maintain her government, yet the District of Columbia fails to require her own taxpayers to pay an amount of taxes equal to that which is now paid by our own citizens in our respective States. That policy is entirely unfair. It should not be tolerated in the future. If the gasoline tax should be increased an additional 2 cents per gallon in the District, that small increase would raise, annually, from $2,000,000 to $3,000,000, which would be available for use in maintaining her government. This amount of money would not then be required from the Federal Treasury, and our taxpayers within our respective States would be discharged from making this annual contribution to the District for her governmental functions.

I appeal to each Member of the House to aid in the passage of H. R. 4549, which I introduced, to the end that this unjust discrimination against our own taxpayers may be terminated.

Flag Day Address

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HERRON PEARSON

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 17, 1941

ADDRESS OF HON. HERRON PEARSON OF TENNESSEE

Mr. PEARSON. Mr. Speaker, under permission previously granted I am incorporating in the RECORD a Flag Day address delivered by me under the auspices of the B. P. O. E., Jackson Lodge, No. 192, on June 12, in Jackson, Tenn.:

Mr. Chairman, brothers, and friends, we meet today under the auspices of the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks to pay homage to the American flag and all that it means to us, and I feel honored to be permitted to have a part in such a ceremony.

I shall not undertake to outline the history of our flag, but rather to discuss some of the things which it brings to mind, for which it stands and which today mean much to the people of America.

The Order of Elks has pinned its very destiny to this flag. Upon its altar is always to be found the red, white, and blue—such red as never human shed in blood, such blue as exists only in azure skies, and such white as lives only in the purest of hearts. Our flag is the indestructible emblem of freedom, democracy, and happiness, the symbol of liberty and the spirit incarnate of American independence.

I give thanks today that our form of government fosters and encourages the great spirit of fraternalism that interweaves its very life with the preservation and protection of a symbol of a nation's way of life, and that we do not live in a land where fraternities, civic pride, and patriotism have by law been prohibited as undesirable activities.

Within a few short days we will celebrate the one hundred and sixty-fifth year of national sovereignty and independence, and only a week ago we observed the one hundred and forty-fifth anniversay of Tennessee's admission to the Union of States. These anniversaries, as well as Flag Day, have more than ordinary significance this year because of conditions which make us more conscious of what it means to be citizens of a great State and a great Nation—competent parts of the millions who recognize as their first duty the obligation of preserving and perpetuating the cardinal principles of government which bind us together into a union indisoluble and indivisible.

What we may say and do in these critical days as we commemorate the milestones in our history should not be said and done in thoughtlessness and indifference. Rather should we earnestly and prayerfully consider their significance, utilizing the inspiration which they bring to sustain us in our desire and determination to keep forever inviolate the governmental processes which have brought us thus far down the highway of a peaceful and successful national life.

I am not an alarmist, but it is my humble but well-considered judgment that never before in our history have our flag, our independence, our freedom, our form of government, our chosen way of living been faced with such threats as are being made against them at this very hour. Twenty-five years ago we undertook to "save the world for democracy," but now we may be called upon to "save democracy for the world."

We are in the midst of a momentous period of human affairs. Our prophesied appointment with destiny has apparently arrived. The hour of decision is at hand.

The fierce light of history is beating down upon us.

All the conflicts of centuries past and the age-old story of man's search and struggle for liberty and self-rule comes rushing into our memory.

Standing in that light and with those dark pages of history burning and ringing in our conscience, we face another and perhaps more serious crisis in our national history.

Here and now as Tennesseans and Americans we do well to rededicate ourselves to Americanism. Inspired by the sacrifices of the founding fathers out of which this Nation was born we do well to reaffirm our intention and desire to protect and defend our liberties and our institutions and to say to all the world that nothing shall deter us in our determination to resist and repel any designing aggressor who rears his ugly head or offers his might against us.

"The drama of the world moves on and on Flowing like an endless river without pause.
And never, never will it turn aside
That we see its face in brief repose
All varieties, all certitudes
Belong to other days, to instants fled:
Each moment we must build anew."

For 18 months the United States has been a sad but wary and suspicious spectator of European civilization crumbling and crushed before the onslaught of a power mad militarist, merciless and ruthless, equipped with instruments of death and destruction the like of which the world has never seen. He has challenged every civilized nation to either submit to a single master or be overrun, conquered, and enslaved.

Some have submitted, others have refused, and today practically all of continental Europe is at the feet of this Gargantua bleeding and torn, helpless and hungry, pitiful slaves to an overlord in whose veins flow the chilled blood of an oppressor who grows more menacing with every victorious conquest.

Boundary lines no longer outline what was once proud Austria. She was the first victim. Czechoslovakia was subdued before she had a chance to defend herself. Poland was left a veritable shambles and blazing inferno. The peace-loving, neighborly countries of Norway, Denmark, Holland, and Belgium were guilty of nothing except owning lands and resources which Hitler wanted, and overnight they exchanged freedom for serfdom.

Bulgaria and Rumania, permeated with disloyal influences, were easy prey for an overwhelming power.

Yugoslavia was taken by blitzkreig.

France, plagued by disloyal leaders, communism, and inadequate defense, saw her vaunted erstwhile impregnable Maginot line crumble like a barnyard fence before the devastating power of mechanized forces, and today all that remains of unoccupied French territory is being forced at a pistol point to join her late conqueror in trying to banish from the earth those who have fought by her side in many life and death struggles. The heart of France is not in such a task, but she has no alternative except that of further subjugation and annihilation. She is the unwilling ally of those who have hated her for generations.

Ancient Greece is no more, and at this moment Great Britain and Great Britain alone stands in the path of the Hessian hordes of Hitler in their mad march to rule the world and force upon unwilling people the social, industrial, and economic ideology of Nazi socialism.

Who knows what will happen if Great Britain fails and who the next victim may be?

In answering this question it is advisable to remember we cannot act upon presumption or promises. The man who has started the fires of world revolution boasts that a broken treaty or promise means nothing if to violate is in the interest of Germany and her aims. Nations which have trusted him know too well how true his boasts. He has destroyed the possibility of negotiated peace and left those who may be his chosen victims the one alternative of preparing for the worst.

The United States tried in the first instance to prevent this war and failing in that we have tried to keep out of it.

Long before it started by the Neutrality Act we virtually withdrew our ships from dangerous seas. Since its enactment we have sacrificed our foreign commerce to save the blood of American youth. No nation in history has made so great a voluntary sacrifice financially to preserve peace. It was America's offering upon the altar of peace.

Despite our desire for peace and our efforts to preserve it, it has become increasingly obvious that the aim and purposes of the dictators of the world are not confined to conquest in Europe alone, but through unholy and dangerous alliance with those to the West of us, through the acquisition of strategic possessions at our very door, through defiant threats in Western waters destroying the freedom of the seas, through superior might in the air, on land and at sea they seek to incorporate the Western World in their new order and with that incorporation to destroy free institutions, free government, and every other freedom which has been ours to enjoy for over a century and a half.

With this knowledge the American people have become convinced that if we are to avoid becoming actually involved in war we must meet existing conditions realistically and two things must be done to keep war from our shores.

Congress has made provisions for these two essentials; first, an adequate defense against any power or powers on earth and secondly all-out aid to Britain while that preparation is going forward.

I share that conviction with the American people and believe with all my heart that such a course is to the ultimate best interests of the Western Hemisphere. With that belief I carry the hope and prayer that in following that course we may avoid the misery, the heartaches, and sorrows of war.

If we fail to do either of these vital things we jeopardize not only the lives of American citizens but everything that makes their lives worth living. If we do both successfully and well we may avoid war and avert the threat which now hangs over us like the sword of Damocles. If we fail it seems to me our participation in war is inevitable.

So far as our national defense is concerned, suffice it to say that we now have a standing Army of nearly one and one-half million men, with a goal of two million by next January. Military and naval bases guarding our entire coast line are now being established. A two-ocean Navy is under way, and we will soon be producing combat planes at the rate of over 1,000 per month. Tanks, guns, cars, ships, planes, bombers, men, equipment, and every other essential in national defense are being made available in a systematic, orderly manner and despite criticisms, impatience, and faultfinding by those who seek to sell America short. I tell you that America is being prepared; and when the time comes, if come it must, the visitor who approaches our gates—either east or west—with aggression or conquest as his mission will be met a thousand miles at sea by forces as fine and as courageous as any on earth.

For aid to Great Britain we have appropriated $7,000,000,000, and already deliveries are being made as fast as possible under very hazardous conditions. If necessaries can be delivered the great fleet of protection can be kept on guard and the fight for the preservation of democracy and free government can be carried on. If not, no man can foretell the future.

If anyone doubts the advisability or soundness of our policy in extending this aid, I only wish he could have listened to that quiet, peace-loving, and courageous Tennessean, Hon. Cordell Hull, as he gravely told Congress what should be done.

Out of his years of experience and study he says:

"Were Britain defeated and were she to lose command of the seas, Germany could easily cross the Atlantic unless we were ready and able to do what Britain is doing now. Were the Atlantic to fall into German control, the Atlantic would offer little or no assurance of security. * * *

"The most serious question for this country today is whether the control of the high seas shall pass into the hands of powers bent on a program of unlimited conquest. For us to withhold aid to the present victims of attack would not result in restoration of peace. It would merely tend to perpetuate the enslavement of nations already invaded and provide an opportunity for the would-be conquerors to gather strength for an attack against us."

Colonel Lindbergh would have us withhold this aid and prepare our defenses in a spirit of defeatism and upon the assumption we are never going to be attacked. America cannot afford to adopt any such philosophy, and under Mr. Hull's leadership she never will.

Today so serious is our situation we are living under a Presidential proclamation of unlimited national emergency requiring that all military and civilian defenses be put in readiness to repel any attack or threat of aggression toward any part of the Western Hemisphere.

All loyal citizens, in every walk of life, are asked to lay aside their differences, to forget self and cooperate each with the other to assure our internal security against foreign-directed subversion—to place the Nation's needs first in mind and in action and have ready for instant defense every material resource of the Nation.

This is the call of the Commander in Chief—it is a command. It means that nothing must stop the wheels of industry engaged in production for national defense. It applies to capital and it applies to labor. It should put a stop to bickerings and disputes between industries and it should stop the many unwarranted and unjustified strikes that are partially paralyzing the manufacture of ships, planes, tools, and other essentials for our defense. Labor has its rights and all fair-minded men will help preserve them but when the very life of this Nation is at stake, when time and speed are the very essence of our national safety, when America's youth are giving their all to the country for a pittance, then it is time for those engaged in defense industries working under the best conditions and most liberal labor laws in history to preserve the high traditions of labor and to maintain their record of devotion and loyalty to the one form of government which protects and fosters every fundamental right of those who labor.

The men I know as leaders of the labor groups are good Americans, and they are not responsible for these conditions. The pitiful aspect of it to me lies in the fact that some of the major labor organizations are being mislead by disloyal leaders who seek to destroy America and care not what they do to thousands of real Americans affiliated with labor. If they are permitted to continue as leaders and spokesmen, they will destroy all of the gains made by labor in recent years, and crucify the honest, loyal workmen who want to do their full duty as Americans.

Yes; under this proclamation we may all expect to make sacrifices.

With it may come rationing, price control, suspension of the 8-hour day, control over banks, business, and industry; curtailment of certain production and such other steps as the President deems necessary to control the activities of every person and every group in the interest of national defense.

Each of us might adopt Edward Everett Hale's patriot's pledge and say:

"I am only one; but I am one. I can't do everything, but I can do something; and what I can do, that I ought to do; and what I ought to do, by the grace of God I will do."

The world knows today America's foreign policy and the course we expect to take in this war. Americans know that course and are prepared to see it through.

The President has reasserted the ancient American doctrine of freedom of the seas.

The solidarity of the American republics and Canada in preserving the independence of the Western Hemisphere.

Our pledge of material aid to Britain and other democracies of the world and our intention to fulfill that pledge.

The President has declared that the Americas will decide for themselves whether and when and where our interests are attacked or our security threatened; that our armed forces are being placed in strategic military positions; and that we will not hesitate to use our armed forces to repel attack or invasion.

Would any American want to do less than these things call for under present world conditions?

In reasserting these age-old rights and our intention to enforce them we have simultaneously reasserted our "abiding faith in the vitality of our constitutional Republic as a perpetual home of freedom, of tolerance, and of devotion to the word of God."

These are the rules which shall govern our conduct henceforth. The enforcement of them does not necessarily mean war. The danger lies in the disregard of them by others. To enforce them we need not commit even the semblance of an overt act. If our right to enforce them goes unchallenged, we remain at peace, and may God grant that in our efforts of self-preservation we be spared the bitter dregs of war and its consequences.

By virtue of this policy we hope to save for all mankind the four major freedoms that constitute the fundamental bedrock of all human happiness—freedom of speech and expression everywhere, freedom of every person to worship God in his own way everywhere, freedom from want everywhere and freedom from fear everywhere in the world.

And so, my friends, if the immediate past is prophetic of the future, our tomorrows may be days of bitter trials, acid tests, and heartbreaking sacrifices. These things we have met without faltering in our yesterdays, and America will not falter now.

We have set ourselves to the task of defending the western world from every threat and every danger emanating from the mailed fists of the would-be conquerors of the world, and when the ominous clouds of war have cleared away, the flag we honor today will still float high in the breeze and there will be written upon the silver lining in letters of unquenchable fire this immortal message:

"The government of the people, by the people, for the people has not perished from the earth."

Has the Auto Industry Been Made the "Goat" of National Defense?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LOUIS C. RABAUT

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 19, 1941

ARTICLE BY JAY G. HAYDEN

Mr. RABAUT. Mr. Speaker, in an article that appeared in the Detroit News of June 16, 1941, that eminent journalist, Mr. Jay G. Hayden, outlined the various steps that are being taken to curtail the automotive industry. Under leave to extend my remarks, I include this article in order to draw particular attention to the fallacy of this procedure:

[From the Detroit News of June 16, 1941]

No 1 WHIPPING BOY—AUTO INDUSTRY UNDER ATTACK—NEED FOR DRASTIC CUT QUESTIONED

(By JAY G. HAYDEN)

WASHINGTON, June 16.—The whole administration has focused on the automobile industry as the No. 1 national-defense whipping boy.

First came the O. P. M. with an entirely reasonable 20 percent cut in automobile production, applicable at the beginning of the new-model year, Aug. 1. Then price-fixer Leon Henderson and Federal Reserve chairman Marriner S. Eccles joined in the suggestion that automobile excise taxes be boosted so high as to stop all new-car sales for the period of the emergency.

Last Thursday Frank Knox, Secretary of the Navy, launched a drive for complete stoppage of automobile production, and a day later Robert P. Patterson, Under Secretary of War, chimed in with the declaration that the immediate curtailment should be at least 50 percent.

All this is nothing new. For 30 years the automobile has presented a shining target for the Government tax collectors, State and National. During the World War the industry was curtailed more than any other. The best proof of the vitally essential part the automobile plays in American life is that the industry continues to grow in spite of the burdens heaped upon it.

HOGGING CHARGED

The major contention of Knox and Patterson is that automobiles are hogging steel supply and thus hampering national-defense production.

Our present steel-production capacity is about 91,000,000 tons annually, of which the recent Gano Dunn report estimates 25 percent is sufficient to meet all defense requirements, present or contemplated. Approximately 11,000,000 tons of steel were consumed in automobile production during 1940.

Consumption now is running at a slightly higher annual rate, but if anything like the 20-percent reduction occurs after August 1, total 1941 automobile consumption of steel will be less than last year.

Since the recently passed Priorities Act has given the Government first call on all steel production, and manufacture of war materials has not yet reached the point of consuming anywhere near a quarter of the entire steel output, the drive against the automobile industry now would seem to be principally an alibi for the Government's own organizational inefficiency.

REVENUE A FACTOR

But, it is said, the automobile industry, more than any other, is susceptible of being transformed into production of war materials. This is measurably true. However, it also is true that this transformation cannot be effected in 1 month or 6 months.

It takes at least a year to retool an automobile plant for production of airplanes, tanks, or guns. In the meantime hundreds of thousands of workers either must continue to make automobiles or be thrown out of work.

It also is self-evident that automobile production cannot be stopped and the Government continue to collect the huge revenue now derived from it, at one and the same time. In 1940 the Federal Government collected $137,000,000 in sales taxes on automobiles, and the least that is now proposed is to double this collection. Corporation taxes paid by automobile companies probably amounted to 100,000,000 more, and these also face an increase.

Automobile operation bulks even larger as a source of governmental revenue. In 1940 the Federal Government collected $328,000,000 in taxes on gasoline and lubricating oil, and the States in 1939 (the last year for which complete figures are available) collected $816,000,000 from the same source.

STATES ALSO BENEFIT

In addition, the States derived $412,000,000 in 1939 from automobile license taxes. Any appreciable diminution of automobile tax revenue would quickly throw all State budgets out of joint.

The biggest fallacy of all, perhaps, is the idea, still harbored by the politicians, that the automobile is essentially a luxury. Recent traffic surveys have exploded this theory. They show that, except in cities with more than 500,000 population, 70 percent or more of city transportation is provided by private passenger automobiles. For Saginaw, Mich., the figure is 88.3 percent; Glendale, Calif., 86.7; Lincoln, Nebr., Kenosha, Wis., and Youngstown, Ohio, 81; Houston, Texas, 78.

Even in larger cities, private automobiles are the main factor in transportation. In Los Angeles 56 percent of the residents ride to work in them, as against 44 percent on busses and streetcars. In Detroit the division is 49.2 percent by private automobile, 9.9 percent by busses, 1.7 percent by trucks, and 39.2 percent by other means of transportation.

SOME CUT WELCOMED

The demand for transportation for new or expanded defense industries has fallen almost exclusively on the privately owned automobile. Appearing before a House committee recently, Charles F. Palmer, defense-housing coordinator, cited as an example the Glenn Martin airplane plant at Baltimore, where 42,000 men will be employed by next January.

"Only one main route comes into Baltimore," he said. "The men are now coming in on an average three and eight-tenths per automobile, and even so it takes well over an hour—2 hours at times—to clear the shifts off that particular road."

No automobile manufacturer has complained against a reasonable curtailment in production. To the contrary, the manufacturers welcome it because they believe it will solve the problem of the present supply of used cars and build up a demand that will cushion the economic shock when the war ends.

But they do believe the curtailment should be applied gradually and that the automobile should not be singled out as the one biggest defense goat.

The Aluminum Situation as Seen by the Secretary of the Interior, Harold L. Ickes

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN M. COFFEE

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 19, 1941

STATEMENT BY HON. HAROLD L. ICKES

Mr. COFFEE of Washington. Mr. Speaker, Hon. Harold L. Ickes, as Secretary of the Interior, has demonstrated to the American people that he possesses qualities of high courage, transcendent ability, and unflagging industry. He has shown himself to be conversant with the many and diverse problems arising in every State of the Union which bear upon the operations of his great Department of the Interior.

I have found him to be cooperative and helpful to me as a Representative, in part, of the State of Washington. Recently, fisheries interests of our State found that Secretary Ickes and his capable staff in the Bureau of Fisheries were most understanding of their complicated problems. These gentlemen modified fisheries regulations in a manner for which the owners and operators and the seamen and employees, engaged in the fishing industry in the Pacific Northwest, are very grateful.

Secretary Ickes possesses that rare talent of being able to fill his speeches with telling and memorable phrases. His piquant words and figures of speech make his forsenic utterances outstanding. His devotion to the Pacific Northwest and the cooperative aid he has rendered its public enterprises are looked upon with pride and profound appreciation by the people of that area.

Particularly do I feel warmly thankful toward Secretary Ickes for the able and comprehensive manner in which he has grasped details in relation to such gigantic enterprises as the Grand Coulee and Bonneville Dams, and to the many and varied public works which came within his jurisdiction during the operation of the Public Works Administration. His handling of the national parks has set an example which will make it hard for his future successors to duplicate or excel. The national parks of America, under his brilliant direction, have expanded and provided innumerable improvements and comforts for the public user which make them a source of pride to all patriotic Americans.

Hon. Harold L. Ickes does not pull his punches. He has the courage of his convictions. No one will accuse him of being a straddler. He does not employ circumlocution. His contentions are candid and are directed straight to the point. Politically, he has been a tower of strength to the New Deal. His liberalism is unalloyed and unassailable. He is undismayed and unafraid, although he has been the target for perhaps more vitriolic attacks than have been directed at any other public man in this generation. He has a sublime sense of humor which enables him to relish a fair fight. He has never been backward about calling a spade a spade. One may not agree with every conviction reached by Secretary Ickes, but all must respect his profound learning and versatility. As Secretary of the Interior, he has been a notable public official.

Mr. Speaker, recently Secretary Harold L. Ickes made an inspiring statement to the special Senate committee designated to investigate the national-defense program. In it, he has discussed most thoroughly the aluminum industry and the dangers of monopoly inherent in its current operations. It contains facts well worthy of careful study by every citizen in these United States. Secretary Ickes clearly and persuasively reveals the dangers of monopoly in aluminum, and makes recommendations as to the remedy. The statement is as follows:

STATEMENT OF THE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR, HAROLD L. ICKES, BEFORE THE UNITED STATES SENATE SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO INVESTIGATE THE NATIONAL DEFENSE PROGRAM, JUNE 16, 1941

It has recently become almost commonplace to point out that the Nation's needs for war materials are still being underestimated. Mr. Batt, of the Office of Production Management, in his testimony before you, reiterated that "our sights are too low." The O. P. M.'s Director of Research and Statistics, Mr. Stacy May, has come to the conclusion that an all-out defense effort means spending on defense as large a proportion of our material income as the British and Germans are doing, which is approximately 40 percent. For us this would mean an expenditure of thirty-three billions this year instead of seventeen billions, and about forty billions next year instead of twenty-three billions, figuring the national income at eighty-two billions this year and at one hundred billions next year. Others, including Mr. Nelson, have pointed out that we must abandon old estimates for new ones.

Probably the one notable exception to this trend was the statement made by the electric power adviser of the O. P. M. at a conference in Buffalo only this month. The impression one received from Mr. Kellogg's remarks on this occasion was that we faced No problem with respect to power supply. His statement was promptly repudiated by the O. P. M.

On the same morning that Mr. Kellogg was making his speech in Buffalo, other representatives of the O. P. M. were engaged in a conference with officials of the Department of the Interior and the Tennessee Valley Authority in an effort to find a solution to the problem of providing sufficient electric power to meet the new estimates of aluminum capacity needed for the national defense. At this conference on June 3 an immediate program for the expansion of aluminum and magnesium capacity requiring more than 1,000,000 kilowatts of electric power was discussed, and the power agencies were asked to formulate a program for making this additional power available.

Following this conference, the Division of Power of the Interior Department supplied to the Office of Production Management tabulations made by its engineers and those of the T. V. A., showing when and where power could be made available in the West and South in amounts sufficient to make feasible the location of electro-metallurgical defense industries. The tables were based on existing and contemplated hydroelectric developments and upon steam plants that would be useful in connection with those developments both in the defense emergency and afterward.

Last Thursday the Federal Power Commission issued a voluminous report on electric power requirements and supply in the United States. Its conclusions were that "unless orders are placed immediately for large amounts of additional capacity for 1943 serious shortages will develop in that year and in subsequent years, if the emergency continues." The program outlined in our suggestions to the Office of Production Management would provide about two and one-half million kilowatts of additional power during 1943. It is my intention to press for action along these lines. I am no advocate of power plants for their own sake. I do, however, believe that we should leave no stone unturned for the sake of a really adequate defense effort. What must be done can be done.

We must not fall behind in providing additional power as we have in aluminum. While it appears that our aluminum and magnesium requirements are now being estimated on a more realistic basis, this has not always been so.

I have been interested in aluminum development for some time, both as a member of an informal committee of the Cabinet on aluminum and magnesium and as the officer responsible for much of the national water-power development. Since the beginning of the defense program I have constantly fought for increases in our plans for aluminum and magnesium production. The failure of the Defense Commission and of O. P. M. to admit this necessity held up some of the necessary development by approximately 1 year. On July 15, 1940, O. P. M. officials told Senator MCNARY and a delegation of Northwest congressional representatives that the Aluminum Co. of America would have ample capacity to take care of the aluminum airplane requirements through 1942. At that time Alcoa's capacity was 875,000,000 pounds per year, with a slight increase in sight. The 1942 requirements for military uses alone are now put at 1,600,000,000 pounds, with nothing allowed for civilian requirements. I believe these estimates will have to be increased again shortly.

About a month after this assurance, Assistant Attorney General Arnold was arguing before the court that the long existence of a monopoly in the aluminum industry had kept down the capacity to produce this metal. This view was later also expressed by Senator O'MAHONEY after studies by the T. N. E. C. In rebuttal, Mr. I. W. Wilson, the production vice president of Alcoa, testified in the trial that Alcoa was in a position to supply the United States Government "with all the aluminum it will require for national defense within the next year." He further insisted that there would be a substantial surplus for the British. He also testified that Alcoa would be able to supply the needs for 1942 as well as for 1941, and that if requirements should increase after 1942 Alcoa would be able to expand relatively simply and easily to take care of such requirements. He added, on cross-examination, that this was over and above civilian requirements.

Alcoa was not disinterested in this matter. It sought to put off the horrible day when the monopoly would have to experience some competition. On November 28, 1940, the famous press release was issued to the effect that sufficient capacity was available to meet all defense requirements and provide some increase for civil requirements. There is evidence before your committee that Alcoa helped the O. P. M. to estimate what these requirements would be. Again, when in December 1940, one of the smaller California aircraft companies indicated that it had to shut down because of a shortage of aluminum, O. P. M. issued certain statements to the effect that there was sufficient aluminum capacity. That was 6 months ago, just about the number of months it would have taken to build an aluminum plant to meet the undoubted shortage.

Early this year some of the reasons for the long delay and the possible responsibility of the monopolistic Alcoa for it were discussed by the informal Cabinet committee on aluminum. On February 11, I suggested to the committee: First, that the O. P. M. be asked to estimate a top figure of aluminum capacity needs by months for the next 3 or more years; secondly, that all competitive processes should be examined at once on a commercial pilot plant basis; thirdly that competitive production of magnesium, as well as the use of this metal by fabricators, should be encouraged; fourthly, that the Government should curb the profits of Alcoa, either by building Government-owned plants or by the purchase of Alcoa's output on a cost-plus basis.

On February 4, in reply to a request from O. P. M. for an additional 65,000 kilowatts of Bonneville power for Alcoa, on top of 162,500 kilowatts already contracted for, I pointed out that this would amount to four-fifths of Bonneville's then installed capacity, and that therefore the request ran counter to basic policies set up in the Bonneville act. I said that defense needs would govern my actions, and I also brought up the possibility of allocating this power to competitors of Alcoa. The possibility of magnesium development, for magnesium is itself a competitor of aluminum, was suggested. The Bonneville Power Administration thereafter entered into power contracts with the Reynolds Metals Co., equal to that requested for Alcoa, for the production of aluminum.

In March, when we complied with a request by O. P. M. officials that we give Alcoa another 20,000 kilowatts for operating its pots at Vancouver beyond their normally rated capacity, we were told that this would be enough power in that area for Alcoa.

A month later we were again asked to allot 65,000 kilowatts of additional power for the Aluminum Co. of America. This was to be included in a program of 200,000,000 pounds additional. At this time it was obvious that the plans provided for an amount far short of what would be needed, and I replied that we would insist that new requirements be met by plants built by the Government. It was evident that unless this were done we would continue to be at the mercy of the Aluminum Co.'s apparent purpose to continue expansion on a piecemeal basis.

In May of this year the O. P. M. finally raised its sights to 1,600,000,000 pounds, which, I am sure, will be raised to 2 billions within another few months. Yet on May 14 the senior vice president of Alcoa told your committee that there was plenty of aluminum for national defense on the day he was testifying. That is a statement which was as incorrect then as it is incorrect to date. Personally, I think that this statement betrays either incompetence or self-interest, both of which are dangerous to our program of national defense. The Government is assuming almost all of the risk inherent in our rapidly expanding aluminum production. It is guaranteeing the market. It will take everything that anybody can produce. It is putting up, at its own expense, huge generating facilities which it will have on its hands at the end of the emergency unless the Nation continues to expand as I, apparently unlike the Aluminum Co., hope that it will. The Government is putting up the money for the aluminum reduction plants. It is also paying the management for operating them. It could hardly do more. In the Bonneville-Grand Coulee service area the Department of the Interior expects to have generating and transmission facilities costing some $70,000,000, devoted to the production of aluminum by the end of 1942. That will make possible approximately 350,000,000 pounds of aluminum per year in that one area alone.

There is an obligation on the part of the Government not to take a fool's risk with the people's money. I do not believe that we should invest all of this money for national-defense purposes and end up either by treating the Northwest as a colony or by making a Christmas present of all of our expensive facilities to the Aluminum Co.

I have discussed these matters with the various Government officials who will be responsible for arranging leases for the Government-owned plants. I have taken the position that in the matter of price policy the Nation has a great interest in aluminum. I am told that ingot aluminum has cost less than 10 cents per pound to produce at times when it sold for even more than the present price of 17 cents. Its price has been manipulated up and down in the past by the monopoly for its own purposes. This great differential between cost and sales price is a heavy expense to us. If the price of aluminum were reduced even 2 cents a pound, which would still allow the enormous profit of 5 cents a pound, we would save $32,000,000 annually based on the present estimates of demand. Moreover, as a result of the high-price policy aluminum has not come into the general industrial use that it should, and if the price stays high it will not come into such general use. It is to the interest of the Nation to have low-cost aluminum that will assure the continued use of cheap electric power and the operation of fabricating plants.

A second factor to which I have called attention is the necessity for the immediate training of adequate personnel to manage all of the new plants that are being built or contemplated. Unless this is done, the Government is without any real assurance that the defense plants will be run efficiently or that we will be able to expand even further, as will be necessary without any doubt. In our power contracts we insist, of course, that the companies begin building so as to be ready by the time that the power is produced. It would seem essential that the companies which are to manage the reduction plants guarantee also that tried personnel will be available at that time.

It should be pointed out that, although it is both desirable and necessary that aluminum reduction-plants be located in the Northwest near available sources of public power, this location would place a heavy burden upon the Nation unless fabricating plants were also located in that region. At the present time, alumina produced from bauxite is shipped from Mobile and East St. Louis to the Northwest; it is there reduced to pig aluminum; the pig aluminum is then transported to fabricating plants in the East; the fabricated metal is then sent back in huge quantities to the Pacific coast—and even to the Northwest itself—for airplane manufacture. This shuttle system is obviously expensive. More important, it adds a terrific burden to our critically overladen transportation system. The wastefulness tolerated in peacetime cannot now be afforded, either in the conduct of business or of private affairs.

We must economize, and economy is nowhere more necessary or more greatly possible than in the use of our transportation facilities. While we are proceeding to carry out a program to increase our available transportation facilities, a course of action which I recommended more than a year ago but which defense officials then deemed unnecessary, we must also take vigorous action to avoid the necessity of taking metals and materials on joyrides back and forth across the country.

I understand that additional fabricating plants for aluminum are needed, and it seems to me essential that prompt action be taken to locate sufficient of these plants in the Northwest to process the ingots produced in that region, thereby avoiding these long cross hauls.

A concentration of aluminum-manufacturing plants in the Northwest would be disastrous for that region unless there is assurance that the aluminum companies will not consider themselves as transient aliens, but will plan to stay in that area, and locate fabricating plants there. Reduction plants use few men and add little to community wealth. Fabricating plants use more men and would become part of that growing region. For the aluminum companies to use the cheap power now available there, and then close down and move out would be denying to the Northwest the great opportunities it now has to secure other diversified defense industries which would use the power advantageously now, and which, because of their use of native raw materials, would also build up the community by staying there. I know that the people of the Northwest are eager to help in the national-defense effort, but I am sure that neither they nor the Congress would care to see this region receive least-favored-nation treatment. This is not to ask that the Northwest be relieved of all risk, as the aluminum companies are being relieved of it, but only that it not be called upon to take all of the losses.

Finally, I do not think it desirable that we, however unwillingly, should create a situation which would be a further aid to monopoly. As I have pointed out to the Office of Production Management, the power produced by the public money invested in Bonneville was expressly restricted by the Congress to prevent a monopolization of its use. Monopoly may be even more dangerous in dangerous times than it is in normal times. Our whole defense effort becomes dependent upon the skill, resourcefulness, and devotion to the public welfare of a few individuals who own and control the monopoly. These have not been subjected to the spur of competition. Their whole effort has been, not to improve their skills, but to retain and protect the processes which are the key to their industrial control. Further, these few individuals may operate on the theory that their primary duty is as trustees for their stockholders. They may believe that there is a basic conflict between the supposed interests of those stockholders in limiting facilities and production, thus keeping up prices, and the interest of the Government in increasing production.

We will have lost a great deal of ground if our present plans are so devised that the reduction plants that the Government is now building can be bought by only one big and wealthy company. In such an event it may buy them up at junk prices that will result in heavy losses to the Government. It may even do this for the purpose of closing them down, thus keeping them out of competition. Throughout its existence, the Aluminum Co. of America has bought out or hampered by all means in its power, every formidable competitor that ever threatened it.

If the aluminum plants, established and approved by the Office of Production Management and the Defense Plant Corporation, are few, and so of gigantic size, it will be impossible for average men or corporations either to stay in or go into the aluminum business at the end of the emergency. I would regret to see any such policy established by the Defense Plant Corporation; I would be apprehensive of the results of such a policy. Large units might well mean the end of the development of the light metal industry in the Northwest. On the other hand, smaller plants would certainly be a great stimulation to it, if they were competitively employed after the emergency.

At several conferences held regarding the problem of securing the additional aluminum capacity necessary to the defense program, it was pointed out that one of the more serious delays would be caused by the difficulty of securing equipment for the plants. It was suggested that the Defense Plant Corporation should immediately order such of this equipment as is standard and would be necessary in any aluminum enterprise, no matter who operated it or where. I hope that this suggestion is being followed. The same procedure should be adopted with respect to the additional power generators that will be required in connection with this and similar programs.

You may be interested to learn that I have instructed the Bureau of Mines to study raw materials other than bauxite and other processes for making aluminum, with particular emphasis on the use of domestic raw materials. One of these has already been thoroughly investigated by the Bureau, which has reported that it is economically feasible to make aluminum out of it. I refer to alunite, which is found in the States of Utah and Washington. I am told that the process to make aluminum out of alunite will also be available to make it out of aluminous clays. I have urged that a full-sized commercial operation of this process be financed by the Government. This matter is still pending at O. P. M. On account of the present shipping emergency, prudence would dictate that we make use of local materials whenever possible.

At some later time I should like to discuss the development in the defense program of the whole area west of the Mississippi. I believe that it has been somewhat neglected, not by intent of the responsible agencies, not exactly by oversight, but by the policy of allowing existing companies to concentrate in the East if they so desire. I have heard that, instead of moving plants out West, some eastern companies have bought up heavy machinery in the Middle West and shipped it East. This comes close to looting that part of the country of its sources of possible wealth instead of calling upon it for the share of defense work that would naturally go to it. More important still, if serious curtailments of our imports of minerals from overseas should occur, the rapid mineral and industrial development of the West would become a matter of life and death to us. We would find that the battle of the West was as important to us as the battle of the Atlantic.

Our best information is that for some time Germany has been actively moving not only great factories but whole towns. The Nazis have learned that a wider dissemination of vital sources of war materials minimizes the danger of bombing attacks from the air. It would be heartening if we could anticipate the future in this regard and thus avoid a possible necessary decentralization of our industrial plants later when it may have to be done under abnormal conditions at tremendous expense.

A Troubled American

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HERRON PEARSON

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 17, 1941

LETTER FROM J. B. TIGRETT, PRESIDENT GULF, MOBILE & OHIO RAILROAD CO.

Mr. PEARSON. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to permission granted me on yesterday, I am submitting a letter received from a student of industrial and labor relations which I think voices the sentiments of many people in America who are deeply concerned about the attitude of some of the so-called labor leaders in industries engaged in manufacturing vital materials for our national defense. The letter is as follows:

GULF, MOBILE & OHIO RAILROAD CO.,
Jackson, Tenn.

Hon. HERRON C. PEARSON,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR HERRON: Like other Americans all over the land, I am troubled. All my life I have taken for granted the patriotic unity and, therefore, power of the United States. It has never occurred to me to fear that this Nation would not, at any time, have a leadership which could, in a crisis, develop our human and material resources into an impregnable defense.

During the past week I have become increasingly frightened for my country. Within the past year or two I have had occasion to be thrilled by the bold declarations of our President as he condemned greed and deceit and inhumanity and religious persecution. His assurances of aid to those helpless and suffering people who have been the blameless victims of the Hitler blight have had my approval and have aroused by pride. But our boastful faith in these assurances is being given a set-back by the transpiring happenings in our homeland.

It is not the Lindberghs about whom we have to be concerned, but it is the indifference of our Government to the spirit of defiance of the Lewises and the Bridgeses and others of that character.

If our own citizenship becomes dismayed when we find that the leadership of this Nation seems to admit its impotency in handling an industrial element whch puts spoils before patriotism, then how can we expect a mghty war machine like that of Germany to be impressed by our warnings?

I am not intending to criticize the laborer. My sympathies lie largely in his direction. But when a so-called labor leader becomes mightier than the Government, it is high time for all of us to tremble. When it becomes necessary for the people of this country to send representatives to New York to consult one man as to whether or not we may have fuel with which to keep our defense industries running, there surely must be something wrong either with us as a people or with our leaders.

When it is possible for a so-called labor leader to announce in public print (C. I. O. News, April 14), "we defeated the combined efforts of the police, the courts, the employers, and Washington to break the strike and we won a real victory," then the day has arrived, not for Hitler to be frightened but for us who have regarded this Nation as the sanctuary for those who are law abiding no matter whether they are rich or poor.

It is hardly necessary for me to say that I have no material interest of any kind which would cause me to write a letter like this and I am no better patriot than millions of others but, I repeate again, I am troubled.

Sincerely,

I. B. TIGRETT.

Cardinal Newman's Prophecy of the Downfall of the British Empire—Poem By the Late Cardinal John Henry Newman, Entitled "England" Is the Most Significant Prophecy Ever Presented In Our Generation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MARTIN L. SWEENEY

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 19, 1941

Mr. SWEENEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a poem entitled "England," by the late Cardinal John Henry Newman, written as he sailed the Mediterranean Sea in 1832, 13 years before he became a convert to the Roman Catholic Church:

ENGLAND

Tyre of the West, and glorying in the name
More than in Faith's pure fame!
Oh, trust not crafty fort nor rock renown'd
Earn'd upon hostile ground;
Wielding Trade's master-keys at thy proud will
To lock or loose its waters, England! trust not still.

Dread thine own power! Since haughty Babel's prime,
High towers have been man's crime.
Since her hoar age, when the huge moat lay bare,
Strongholds have been man's snare.
Thy nest is in the crags; ah, refuge frail!
Mad counsel in its hour, or traitors, will prevail.

He who scann'd Sodom for His righteous men
Still spares thee for thy ten;
But, should vain tongues the Bride of Heaven defy,
He will not pass thee by;
For, as earth's kings welcome their spotless guest,
So gives He them by turn, to suffer or be blest.

This singular prophecy, written by an Englishman, predicting the destruction of the British Empire, should prove a warning to the leaders of the totalitarian philosophy that their cruel policy of crushing minority groups and subjecting free nations to their iron will is one that taunts divine justice. The day of reckoning will come for Hitler, for Mussolini, and for Stalin, as it has come to the forces of imperialism who have for over 350 years dominated most of the world's territory and most of her population.

Mr. Speaker, war is a man-made institution. War in the vernacular of today is a "racket." The Government of the United States by its conduct the past few years has helped perpetuate this war "racket." Witness the sale of American scrap iron to Japan to be processed into cannon to fight the Chinese, while at the same time we loaned the Government of China millions of dollars to fight the people of Japan. Witness the conduct of this Government a few months ago in loaning money to the Government of stricken Finland to fight the Soviet Union, and then selling to the Soviet Union oil and gasoline to service their bombers to kill the Finns. Witness the Government consenting to American capital controlling the rich oil fields of Brazil, and selling oil to the Government of Japan, who in turn sell the same product to the Axis Powers now at war. Witness the recent purchase by the Government of the United States of Russian gold at $35 an ounce which is processed in the Soviet Union at less than $4 an ounce.

In the face of these disclosures it is time to take inventory of the war hysteria, and the war mongers who are pressing the President of the United States for a formal declaration of war on the part of Congress, or an undeclared war by the Executive. God forbid that our beloved country should once more be throw into the blood business of Europe. Instead of taking steps to involve us in a foreign war, the United States, in my judgment, should lead in a move for world peace and join with the head of Christendom, His Holiness,

Pope Pius XII, and the other religious leaders of the world who are seeking to establish peace and a permanent social order.

We were told that our participation in the last World War was to make the world safe for democracy. We paid a tremendous price in blood and treasure and are still paying a colossal price for our share in that war. We turned from a creditor Nation to a debtor Nation and inherited the world's worst depression, because of our participation in the last World War.

We witnessed the shattering of President Wilson's idealism, when the treaty makers at Versailles scrapped his 14 points for world peace. It is reported in the autobiography of Lincoln Steffens that President Wilson was actually spat upon by a delegate to that treaty-making conference.

Mr. Speaker, the Versailles Treaty was doomed to failure from the beginning by the delegates to that so-called peace conference who shut the door against Christ and His teachings, and like a lot of brigands proceeded to cut up the spoils of war, the real estate of a large portion of the world.

Clemenceau, after the treaty was signed, said it was good for seven more wars. Under the terms of the Versailles Treaty, hypocritical as it was, Great Britain had a mandate to protect the sovereignty of Czechoslovakia, Poland, and most of the Balkan States. It is now history that Britain not only failed to aid the government of Czechoslovakia but was a partner with Hitler in the appeasement program that destroyed that republic. It is now history that Great Britain failed to go to the rescue of the defenseless people of Poland, when they were brutally attacked by Hitler a few months after Munich. Although but 550 miles away from Berlin, Britain's sole contribution to the stricken people of Poland was the showering of pamphlets from her bombers over the German Capitol. It is also history that after Hitler had seized the western part of Poland and the Soviet Union had concluded the rape of Poland on the eastern front, Chamberlain, then the premier of Great Britain, rose in the House of Commons and blessed the rape of Poland by the communistic hordes of the Soviet government.

Mr. Speaker, it is history that Great Britain did desert Belgium, France, and in later days Greece and Yugoslavia. When these nations were putting forth a feeble effort to drive back the Nazi panzer divisions the world was told of the glorious retreat at Dunkirk. History will disclose what the people of France and Belgium thought of that glorious retreat.

In the United States today through every conceivable method of propaganda which utilizes the radio, press, pulpit, and motion-picture screen, the agents of Great Britain and some misinformed Americans are demanding, not requesting, our boys be sent at once to die in the filth and disease of the war trenches of Europe. Despite the fact we have placed at the disposal of Britain billions of dollars, in addition to the ships we furnished and the implements of war we are building for her, there is clamorous insistence our boys be sent to Martinique, Dakar, and to the Azores, stepping stones to actual warfare, once we become involved.

Mr. Speaker, why, in God's name, must we every 25 years send our boys—the sons and grandsons of Polish, Irish, English, German, Belgian, Greek, Italian, Russian, Yugoslavia, Czechoslovakia, French, Spanish, and other heritage—to fight the eternal wars of Europe that have raged almost incessantly for the past 2,000 years? The immigrant parents and grandparents of these American boys came to the United States to seek asylum and to escape the economic oppression and militarism of Europe. They are all loyal citizens determined their sons will not be sent over 3,000 miles of stormy waters to repeat the mistake we made back in 1917. These people are loyal and their sons are loyal. They will die for the defense of this country. Unanimously they favor a strong defense program for the protection of the United States from any invasion, but they are resolved if they must die in warfare to die on the sacred soil of this free Republic, and not on any foreign battlefield.

Our sympathy goes out to the poor people of Europe and Asia, the victims of these man-made wars—wars that are only beneficial to the world-trade grabbers and the international bankers who furnish the sinews. Our Government has embarked on a policy of extended aid to certain countries involved in war by supplying munitions, battleships, air bombers, poison gas, tanks, and other instruments of destruction. All of this is costly to our taxpayers, but this material aid, no matter what it is, if lost or destroyed, can always be replaced. The thing to keep in mind is that we cannot replace the broken bodies of our American boys who may be called upon to fight in another foreign war.

I sincerely believe President Franklin Delano Roosevelt had this in mind when he solemnly promised the American people that their boys would not be sent into foreign battlefields. May God give him strength to keep that promise. The fulfillment of such a sacred pledge will cause him to go down in history as one of the greatest men who ever lived. The failure to keep that solemn obligation will cause history to record him as an abject failure and a leader who generations yet unborn will look upon with disdain and contempt.

The warning of Cardinal Newman expressed in the poem I include in these remarks should not go unheeded. John Henry Newman is conceded by all students of history to have been one of the most remarkable characters that ever lived. Every reference to his career discerned in his writings and in his poetry clearly indicates he possessed a very unusual and remarkable mind.

We are a young Republic and, save the Swiss Government, the only true democracy, despite our weaknesses existing today. We have no imperialistic designs. We only ask to be left alone. We should not impose our will upon other nations. If the people of the South Sea Islands decide to conduct their parliamentary meetings in tree tops, or swing from limb to limb, that should be their prerogative. Our danger is not from some man-made dictator across the sea; our danger is from the subversive groups within this country who have failed to take appraisal of the greatness of the United States of America. Unpatriotically they are promoting intolerance and discord within our gates. In some instances they assume we are unable to carry on alone, that we should aline ourselves with a new international order called Union Now, to be dominated by the English-speaking people of the world. Every historian knows the English-speaking people of the world are in the minority and cannot, if they so desired, impose their will upon any group of people.

We trust no historian of Cardinal Newman's type in the future will ever be able to prophesy the downfall of the United States of America, because of disregard of the civil liberties of her people, nor her failure to extend at all times the protection and blessing of the Constitution of the United States.

Throughout the world Cardinal Newman is best known as the author of Lead, Kindly Light, the beautiful spiritual poem sung frequently at funerals and memorial services. The "night is dark" for much of the world today. It will not be dark for the United States of America if we keep out of foreign wars.

Lead, Kindly Light, amid the encircling gloom,
Lead Thou me on!
The night is dark, and I am far from home—
Lead Thou me on!
Keep Thou my feet; I do not ask to see
The distant scene,—one step enough for me.

I was not ever thus, nor pray'd that Thou
Shouldst lead me on.
I loved to choose and see my path; but now
Lead Thou me on!
I loved the garish day, and, spite of fears,
Pride ruled my will; remember not past years.

So long Thy power hath blest me, sure it still Will lead me on,
O'er moor and fen, o'er crag and torrent, till
The night is gone;
And with the morn those angel faces smile
Which I have loved long since, and lost awhile.

Would It Be Fair to Increase the Federal Tax on Gasoline If the Taxes on Nonessential Items Are Not Increased?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT T. SECREST

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 19, 1941

Mr. SECREST. Mr. Speaker, in the minds of some is the conviction that the proposed increases in the Federal tax rates on certain nonessential commodities should not be enacted. If there is basis for such a conviction, then certainly the conclusion that there should be no further increase in the Federal gasoline tax must also be accepted. If any nonessential item is considered already to be bearing its full burden of taxation, then a necessary commodity such as gasoline, which bears an exceptionally disproportionate tax burden, definitely should not be requested to assume an additional tax weight.

The economics of taxation embrace as part of their fundamental principles a specific distinction between essentials and nonessentials as tax subjects. This distinction generally is used to justify the imposition of heavier tax rates on such nonessentials.

The taxation of the consumption of nonessentials and luxuries for revenue purposes generally is recognized as justifiable, even if it results in the curtailment of such consumption. The curtailment of such consumption can do little harm, and sometimes it actually may do some good as far as the consumer is concerned. If, on the other hand, the taxation of such items did not result in a curtailment of consumption, then the consumer would not be in a position to complain, because the tax may be avoided without great sacrifice.

Consumption of nonessential goods is regarded as evidence of an ability to support government substantially according to the degree to which these commodities are consumed. It is accepted generally that a substantial percentage of what a consumer spends for such commodities should go to the support of government, even though the consumer's income is not sufficient to purchase other articles which are regarded as necessities.

No matter to what extent such commodities are now being consumed, they do not possess the characteristics of necessities and accordingly they are the proper objects of heavy tax rates. The revenue yield from the taxation of these goods is sufficiently high and stable to make them important items in the governmental fiscal structure.

Consequently, if there is a disposition to retain the prevailing tax rates on certain nonessential items to refrain from enacting the proposals to increase these rates which now are being considered by Congress, then certainly there is more reason to take the same stand in regard to the proposed increase in the Federal gasoline tax.

Some years ago, when the automobile was owned primarily by the well-to-do, the motor fuel used to operate vehicles was a luxury and an appropriate subject for taxation at reasonable rates. Today, however, the automobile is owned and operated by millions in the lower-income groups as an essential part of their everyday living habits. Now, in countless instances, the use of motor fuel to operate the farm tractor or the family automobile occupies a place among the everyday necessities of life, ranking close after such things as food, clothing, and shelter.

Surveys conducted under the supervision of the United States Public Roads Administration reveal that 55 percent of the gasoline consumed in passenger-car travel is used strictly for business purposes—family and commercial. Merchants, farmers, and traveling salesmen are but a few of the classes of motor-vehicle operators that depend to a great extent on their vehicles for a livelihood. Moreover, motor trucks account for approximately one-quarter of all the motor fuel consumed in this country to provide the Nation with the superior economies and flexibility of highway transport.

In connection with the national-defense program, the use of gasoline has become wholly indispensable. Probably the best example of the importance of gasoline is evident in the fact that the shortage of housing and labor in centers engaged in the production of vital defense materials has required the assembly of skilled workers from outside areas. Transportation of these workers to their jobs has been facilitated by the private automobile to a degree possible by no other means. Cases are known of workers driving back and forth to work daily on a round trip taking 4 hours.

Expenditures for gasoline long ago shed the characteristics that made them appropriate subjects for taxation as nonessential expenditures. The operation of motor vehicles now is an essential factor in the welfare of the Nation, and the Nation's families, and the gasoline used to operate these vehicles must be distinguished clearly from the consumption of nonessential goods and luxuries for purposes of taxation.

The combined Federal, State, and local taxes on gasoline, averaged for the Nation, represented a sales tax of nearly 50 percent at the start of the current year. Yet the tax burden on this necessity approaches that on practically any nonessential commodity in general use. Furthermore, the various taxes on gasoline in 1940 produced $1,150,000,000 in revenue to the Federal, State, and local governments. This amount exceeded the revenue produced by special sales taxes on any other commodity.

If the Congress considers further increases in the Federal taxes on any nonessential item inadvisable and yet fails to grant the proposed increase in the Federal tax on gasoline the same consideration, then not only would the fundamental principles of sound and equitable taxation be violated, but the common sense of tax justice would be disregarded.

The Oil Situation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN E. FOGARTY

OF RHODE ISLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 19, 1941

LETTER OF HON. JOHN E. FOGARTY, OF RHODE ISLAND, TO GEN. RUSSELL MAXWELL, EXPORT CONTROL ADMINISTRATOR

Mr. FOGARTY. Mr. Speaker, the people of my district are aroused over the conflicting stories which are appearing in the papers concerning the oil situation. We have the prospect of rationing of gasoline and the more serious prospect of not having sufficient fuel oil to heat the homes of people in the East next winter. At the same time we are confronted with the picture of oil being shipped to Japan in increasing amounts, and not all this oil goes from the west coast. Just the other day an attempt was made to ship a quarter of a million gallons from the East where the shortage is supposed to exist.

Our Nation aids China in its war with Japan and at the same time supplies Japan with the lifeblood of her war machine.

The people demand to know why. I believe we, as Members of this Congress, have a right to an explanation. The people of the Nation will not make sacrifices unless they know there is to be some tangible result achieved because of those sacrifices. If this help to Japan is by way of appeasement, then it is pursuing a policy which has been proven a failure on many, many occasions. If it is a permit to allow the Oil Trusts to pile up huge profits, then we have no right to ask the ordinary man to make sacrifices which not only deprive him of the pleasure to which he and his family are entitled, but by refusing him adequate fuel for his home endanger his health and the health of his children.

Because I am anxious to learn the answer to this problem I have addressed a letter to Gen. Russell Maxwell, the Export Control Administrator, which reads as follows:

JUNE 18, 1941.

Gen. RUSSELL MAXWELL,
Export Control Administrator,
Department of Commerce,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR GENERAL MAXWELL: I have become increasingly alarmed over the oil situation, particularly as it affects the consumption of gasoline and fuel oil in the New England States. The prospect of "gasolineless Sundays" this summer and lack of adequate heat in New England homes next winter I find hard to reconcile with the constant flow of oil and gasoline to Japan, an avowed partner of Hitler and an associate of Hitler who has sworn to do all in its power to to further the dictators' cause.

The newspapers have carried the story of the Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey's agreement to sell additional supplies to Japan. This agreement it was reported, had been "negotiated with the full knowledge" of this Government. It is my understanding that this oil and gasoline is carried to Japan in tankers of Panama registry. They are tankers owned by a Panamanian corporation which is owned solely by the Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey.

"Gasless Sundays" mean loss of the great vacation business which is New England's, and, further, mean that the men who work on national defense in our factories and on construction jobs are deprived of their outings with their families on the only day of leisure they have. "Cold homes" mean cold hearts toward those responsible.

We plead for unity and cooperation, and, at the same time, we tell our people they must suffer uncalled-for hardships while the oil companies pile up profits by supplying fuel to a war machine which some day may drown our sons in a sea of blood.

The people whom I represent demand fair treatment. I want to urge strongly upon you that the way to guarantee that fair play and the unity of spirit which is so necessary now is to use your authority to prevent these shipments of oil to Japan. We can then have these "Panama" tankers available for the delivery of oil to the eastern seaboard.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN E. FOGARTY, M. C.

Is a Japanese-American War Imminent?—German-Japanese Conflicts of Interest—Points of Harmony Between the United States and Japan—the Philippines an Asset to the United States

OF

HON. FRED L. CRAWFORD

OF MICHIGAN

EXCERPTS FROM SPEECH OF JUDGE JOHN W. HAUSSERMANN

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the salient parts of a speech delivered recently by the Honorable John W. Haussermann before the Bar Association of Cincinnati, Ohio.

Judge Haussermann is the leading American citizen in the Philippines, a gold and chrome miner, a lawyer and former Army officer, and well beloved by the Filipino people as a civic leader, an employer of labor, and as an American who has a great faith in their ability and possibilities.

Knowing Judge Haussermann personally, I wish to state on the floor of the House that he is not only a patriotic American, but he is a man of great intellectual ability, a brilliant lawyer, a very eloquent public speaker, and a consistent fighter for right, justice, and square dealing.

Judge Haussermann's able and timely speech follows:

I am grateful for the opportunity of addressing this audience of lawyers and their friends. It is many years ago since I marched forth from the University of Cincinnati Law School. I went West and stopped in Kansas where I hung up my shingle and talked politics for mental diversion. When the Spanish-American War broke out in 1898 I answered President McKinley's call for volunteers and became an officer in the celebrated Twentieth Kansas. My outfit landed in the Philippines about 41 years ago and was mustered out a few years after. Ever since then I have cast my lot in that country and its good people.

FILIPINO LOYALTY AND COOPERATION

I have just returned from the Philippines in my yearly trip to the United States. The first thing I want to report to my countrymen is that in these times of emergency the Filipino people, led by their leaders, are with the United States 100 percent in any eventuality, including war, which we may have to face. President Manuel Quezon in a message to the Philippine National Assembly, said:

"The Government of the United States has embarked upon a program of national defense which, we earnestly hope, includes the Philippines; for the defense of our country remains primarily the responsibility of the United States. This is as it should be, because so long as we are under the American flag it rests exclusively with the United States, and not with us, to determine whether we shall be at peace or at war. The Filipino people, desirous of cooperating with the United States in the execution of this defense program, are ready to bear their full share of that responsibility. To this end, I have assured the Government of the United States in behalf of the Commonwealth, that the entire Philippines—its manpower and material resources—are at the disposal of the United States in the present emergency."

There are 16,000,000 people in the Philippines. They are a positive asset to us. They could be a serious problem to an enemy in the Orient. The Filipino is a good fighter and is never a quitter. We Americans found that out by experience. I cannot overstress his loyalty to the United States. That loyalty is based on his gratitude to our country and on his love for his own country, whose safety and prosperity he knows are bound up with the United States. It is our duty to stand by him and with him. The Philippines are under our flag and are a part of our national domain. We are going to defend them with all our resources. The Federal Government has so declared in so many words, and I am sure the American people are back of our Government in that stand and determination.

DEFENSE PREPARATIONS

Already the American forces in the Philippines are being reinforced and placed on a war footing. The Philippine forces are being coordinated for service under our flag. Preparations are going on in every possible sector. The spirit of good will and cooperation that has existed for a long time between Americans and Filipinos is reaching its climax in the face of a common danger. We all hope that war does not come, but if it does come, the Philippines are fit and ready to do its part shoulder to shoulder with the United States.

The Far East is in a state of extreme uncertainty. I assume you want me to talk of that part of the globe to describe the theater in which our country may have to play. That region comprehends Japan, east Asia, including China, Manchuria, and Korea, the British colonies of Hong Kong and Malaya, in which Singapore is situated, the Philippines, Thailand (Siam), French Indo-China, Borneo, the Netherlands East Indies, and a myriad of isles and atolls that cover the South Pacific Ocean. They have a total population of some 650,000,000, or five times as many as the population of the United States. Often India and Burma are included in the term "Far East," and with them the region would have more than 1,000,000,000 inhabitants, or roughly one-half of the entire population of the earth. We are concerned, therefore, with enormous hordes of peoples when we deal with the Far East.

Is a war between the United States and Japan imminent? Can that war be averted honorably? Is there a sound reason for that war? These are questions that peoples on both sides of the Pacific Ocean are asking with increasing anxiety.

Today we are facing a condition and not a theory. Last September Japan became a member of the Axis alliance. That alliance is directed against the United States. We are not concerned now why that alliance was created. All that matters is that it exists and that it is against our country. Therefore, we have no choice but be prepared to accept the gage of battle when offered.

600,000,000 PEOPLE TO BE WITH AMERICA

In the event of war with Japan we shall be associated with at least 600,000,000 people in the Far East, three-fourths of whom, the Chinese, are already fighting the Japanese. With our expanding Navy conducting a blockade and attacking operations on the east of Japan and a well-equipped Chinese army of 10,000,000 on her western side, and the Philippine, Javanese, British, and other forces on the south, and our air bombers operating from the Aleutian Islands and Alaska on the north, we have good reasons to be optimistic as to the outcome of that struggle. We can localize the fighting in the Far East and keep the war from our mainland. That is one of the reasons why it is strategically wise to have fortified outposts as far removed from the North American Continent as possible.

The myth of Japanese invincibility has been shattered by the Chinese and the Japanese soldier today holds no terrors to any other far eastern soldier. Japan's manpower and material resources have been heavily depleted by 4 years of disastrous war with China, which has proved unconquerable. With no real gains to show for these sacrifices, it is hard to believe that the morale of the Japanese people has not suffered, even admitting that the Japanese are intensely patriotic. After all, the Japanese are people, too, and they are human like the rest of us.

But the weakening of Japan is not the reason for America's determination to meet Japan in war if necessary. The reason is more basic and deep-seated. It is, as I take it, that Japan has been for years being more or less warlike toward the United States in words and deeds. America's reasonableness and considerateness have been interpreted by the Japanese as signs of fear, guilt, or lack of decision. From this mistaken conception has sprung the Japanese readiness to disregard American rights, terrorize American citizens, and hurl challenges on America in season and out of season. Obviously such a course must stop sometime, and we have decided to stop it now.

PEACE PREFERABLE TO WAR, BUT * * *

Ladies and gentlemen, I am not being warlike myself. I am merely saying what needs be said. I am describing the realities of the situation as they exist today. My preference is for peace and friendship with Japan. I know Japan can have the friendship of our country if she chooses that alternative to war. We have not been at war with Japan in all our history, and we would like nothing better than to perpetuate that magnificent record. I say it is not too late to avert a Japanese-American war. Both sides, I venture to believe, would welcome the continuation of peace. Such peace could be maintained with honor to both sides if each side is willing to be reasonable and make adjustments. And such peace would be the cornerstone of a general peace around the rim of the Pacific Ocean.

There are many good people in Japan who desire no war with America and prefer the amity, the trade, and the good opinion of the American people. They are among the most substantial Japanese citizens, the liberals, and the most enlightened. They are patriotic Japanese, loving their country intensely and intelligently and sacrificially. They and their American counterparts understand each other's language and comprehend each other's good intentions. But unfortunately a peculiar situation obtains in Japan where the militarists and martinets exert a dominating influence upon the affairs of government and people. They, backed by the Japanese armed forces and superpatriots, are often the authors of Japan's foreign policies which have brought that country nothing but woes and wars. Here again we must face a condition and not a theory, and much as we may have to disappoint the peace-loving and liberal-minded people of Japan, we are compelled to meet the challenge of the militarists and the martinets with the same implements with which the challenge is given.

Ladies and gentlemen, let me emphasize the fact that in my opinion there are infinitely more reasons for America and Japan to be at peace with each other than for them to be at war. I wish also to give it as my judgment that there are many points of harmony between America and Japan as there are many points of conflict between Japan and Germany.

GERMAN-JAPANESE CONFLICTS OF INTERESTS

Let me set forth a three-sided exposition of the interests of the United States, Japan, and Germany today and prove that a Japanese-American cooperation has more reason to be than a Japanese-German one.

First. In the field of commerce, the United States has much more to offer in the way of markets to Japan than Germany could ever hope to have. This fact is so overwhelmingly clear that it admits of no discussion.

Second. America has investment capital to export which Japan needs and wants, while Germany has none.

Third. Germany is so distantly located that she cannot be of direct military aid to Japan in a war in the Pacific.

Fourth. Germany today wants the American Fleet out of the Atlantic and in the Pacific, while Japan does not want it in the latter ocean bearing down on the Japanese mainland and islands.

Fifth. While the United States does not have plans to expand territorially in the Far East, Germany, if she won in Europe, or prevailed by a stalemate, or by a negotiated peace, would most probably come as a colonial power to the Far East whence Japan drove her out as an enemy in the last World War. German economic planners know that Europe needs tropical raw materials.

Although they would admit the correctness of this exposition, the Japanese would assert at once that America is violating her neutrality and aiding China, Japan's enemy, thus making this country practically an ally of China. The reply to this, it seems to me, is what I have already said, namely, that Japan has affiliated herself in an offensive and defensive alliance with Germany and Italy directed against the United States. So in helping China the United States is really acting in defense of herself against a possible and probable Japanese belligerency. That is an act of anticipation that is encompassed in a rational and reasonable interpretation of the right of self-defense and self-preservation.

JAPAN'S COMPLAINT AGAINST AMERICA

One of the favorite complaints of the Japanese against the United States is that our Government is trying to press her down and prevent her from expanding and developing. Nothing is farther from the truth. As I understand it, all our Government desires Japan to do is to respect American rights, live up to her plighted word, and quit attributing ignoble motives to our government and people. This country is willing at all times to do as much toward Japan and our record on that score would bear inspection.

Our Government, in measured statements given by Secretary of State Cordell Hull, has made it plain that it looks with disfavor in this modern day and age on a country conquering another by force for the purpose of foisting its economic and political dominion. But the United States is not stopping Japan or any other country from peacefully concluding treaties, arrangements, or agreements with any country to promote her own interests. America would violate an inherent right of independent nationhood if she were to do otherwise. Japan has been exercising that right. Recently she signed a comprehensive treaty with Thailand, presumably with Thailand's voluntary consent. She is trying to obtain a trade convention with the Netherlands East Indies, but in this case press reports have it that Japan is high-pressuring those unwilling Holland possessions. She is also out to negotiate treaties or agreements with other countries in the Far East. It seems to me that Japan will suceed or fail in this enterprise as she employs peaceful or warlike means and whether she has plans of proposals advantageous to the other party.

JAPAN'S PLAN OF EXPANSION

Japan's major plan of economic and political expansion is called the Greater East Asia Co-Prosperity Sphere. It will operate in what the Japanese call Oceania which, according to the Japanese Vice-Minister of Foreign Affairs, includes the entire Far East, Hawaii, and New Zealand. The plan consists in the creation of a gigantic economic unit with Japan at the center of it and the other countries of the Far East furnishing the raw materials and common labor in a colossal program of industrialization. Heavy industries as well as other industries will be established in Japan proper. The management will be Japanese. The better-paid positions will go to Japanese. And naturally the greater slice of returns and profits will go to Japan. The other cooperating countries will get the lowest prices for their raw materials and for their labor and they will return their earnings to Japan in payment for manufactured products. This has always been the case between two countries with similar economic relations.

The acceptance of this Japanese plan of egocentric economy depends, of course, on the countries invited and on the nature of the invitation and how it is extended. A polite invitation handed by an admiral or a general may be hard to refuse.

GREATER EAST ASIA CO-PROSPERITY MEANING

The Japanese co-prosperity program would eliminate world competition in the raw materials produced by the participating countries. By a process of exchange and credit management it is conceivable that Japanese manufactures would be about the only foreign goods that these countries could purchase. The treaty negotiated recently between Japan and Indo-China has many of the earmarks of the system I have just described.

How shall we meet this situation, this coming competition in the international movement of goods? My deliberate answer is for our country and other interested countries to study the problem presented objectively and try to formulate a program designed to give more advantages to other countries than the Japanese offer. The expedient is as simple as that, but, as you see, it is very fundamental and rests on mutual advantage and mutual well-being. The peoples of Asia, like the Japanese and the rest of us, are people too and are ambitious to achieve progress and prosperity. The day of exploitation is gone, and I hope, gone forever.

The world significance of the Japanese Greater East Asia Co-Prosperity Sphere is just dawning on a few people. The Japanese formula of production is high technological efficiency and cheap intelligent labor. With the vast and varied mineral, agricultural, labor, and other resources of the Far East, Japan would become the most formidable economic factor in the world. She would be in a position to capture much of the world trade, dominate the ocean lanes, and pull down the standard of living of every workingman anywhere and everywhere who produces something for exportation. Certainly the Japanese have struck upon a grandiose idea of achieving economic and political greatness and naturally she must expect difficulties in the process. It is possible that they are embarking upon a plan that is altogether too big and ambitious for practical accomplishment and it is conceivable that it may contain the seeds of its own destruction.

* * * * *

PHILIPPINES AN ASSET TO AMERICA

Ladies and gentlemen, I shall now revert to the Philippines as the climax of my speech. It is a happier and brighter story. It is the grand epic of a country crossing an ocean and establishing her institutions of liberty, progress, and equal opportunity among an alien people and succeeding in that noble mission in a great way for the glory of America, the upliftment of the Philippines and the emulation of a world that has grown cruel and cynical. That is the American record and it belongs to the unwritten chapter of glory that explains the American dream.

The object lesson of Philippine progress is the most powerful single factor in elevating the standard of living, the outlook, and the hope of the hundreds of millions of peoples in Asia and the Far East.

Today the Filipinos, under our flag, have self-government, self-respect, protection from foreign aggression, and freedom for self-improvement.

They have a constitution written by themselves, a president and legislators elected by themselves, an army and civil service manned by themselves, courts officered by themselves, and policies fashioned and worked out by themselves.

Until 1946 America is sovereign in the Philippines. That is the year when the Philippines will become completely independent. But that event could be postponed by act of our Government agreed to by the Filipino people. There is a rising sentiment among the Filipinos in favor of postponement of independence. International insecurity, economic considerations and the realization that there is already freedom, liberty, and self-government are among the reasons responsible for that sentiment.

PLEA FOR AID TO PHILIPPINES

I am making the plea to our Government and people that they give every aid and support to the Philippines, especially at the present time. The Filipinos are with us and loyal to us. They are cooperating with us in the existing emergency. They are willing and eager to follow us.

I am sure that while America is extending all sorts of assistance to foreign countries the Philippines is privileged to ask and suggest that certain things be done to preserve the economic strength and the national morale of the Filipino people.

Financial aid should be extended; Philippine products should be furnished adequate shipping facilities; Filipinos should be permitted to charter American ships; export taxes on Philippine products sent to the United States should be abolished completely; the relatively small Philippine bonded debt should not be made the basis to restrict Philippine agriculture and commerce; and, lastly, Filipinos should be made to feel that we are with them as they are with us particularly in these anxious and critical times.

Ladies and gentlemen, we don't know what the morrow may bring, but whatever it may be we of America and of the Philippines are prepared to uphold the American flag to the last syllable of our strength, enthusiasm, and love of country.

Propeller Club of United States Opposes St. Lawrence Waterway

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PAUL W. SHAFER
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 19, 1941

RESOLUTION ADOPTED BY THE PROPELLER CLUB OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. SHAFER of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include a resolution passed recently by the Propeller Club of the United States. This resolution briefly but clearly sets forth 12 of the many reasons why legislation authorizing the St. Lawrence waterway project should not be enacted at this time. The resolution follows:

Whereas the proposed St. Lawrence Seaway Project is unnecessary, uneconomic and unsound, in that:

1. It is not necessary for the national defense and will not produce a more profitable trade route between American ports.
2. It will result in annual losses to American labor, transportation and industry of $109,647,000, according to Government estimates.
3. It will not benefit farmers because foreign purchases and owners of foreign vessels will absorb any possible savings.
4. It will open up a great inland American market to foreign tramp steamers, thereby producing disastrous foreign competition with benefits to few and irreparable injury to many.
5. Electric energy can be produced and secured more economically and practically in localized areas when needed.
6. Actual cost of the project, being estimated at $1,120,588,000 will exceed by three times the cost of the Panama Canal.
7. Immediate utilization of such money for the St. Lawrence seaway project will divert the money needed urgently in the production of strategic supplies and equipment for national defense;
8. It will result in the imposition of inordinate tax burdens without corresponding benefits;
9. It will produce a diversion of traffic from railroads, steamship lines, inland waterways and motortrucks, and result in unstable and unbalanced rail, water, and motortruck rates;
10. New dangers will be created in navigating the proposed waterway;
11. It will impair property and rental values as the result of the diminution of tax returns to the Federal Government, States and cities; and
12. It will produce unnecessary unemployment and permanent detrimental effects on banking, industry, and purchasing power: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Propeller Club of the United States and the American Merchant Marine Conference in convention assembled, That for the reasons above mentioned, among others, this organization vigorously opposes the St. Lawrence seaway project; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be forwarded to the President of the United States, the Members of the United States Senate and the House of Representatives, and to all other interested individuals and groups.

HAROLD J. HARDING,
National Secretary.

Let's Continue and Expand Our So-Called Shelterbelt Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JED JOHNSON
OF OKLAHOMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 19, 1941

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, very soon there will be an agricultural committee conference report to be considered by this House. Included in the report will be a very important item added by Senator GEORGE NORRIS in the Senate to continue the prairie States forest project, sometimes referred to as the shelterbelt program. It is my sincere hope that the chairman or other member of the agricultural subcommittee on appropriations will move to recede and concur in the Senate amendment which, if adopted and approved by this Congress, will continue a worth-while tree-planting program that means so much to the several prairie States of the Midwest and South, including my own State of Oklahoma.

This project from its inception back in 1935 has been entirely financed from relief funds as a relief propect. This great tree-planting program has been kicked around from pillar to post since its beginning. Due to the fact that it was once called the shelterbelt program and someone suggested that a solid belt of trees from Canada to the border of Texas be planted, there was much opposition to the program from the beginning. If, however, there was ever any such idea, which the Forest Service assures me was not in fact ever contemplated, the solid belt idea has long since been entirely eliminated, abandoned, and forgotten.

Today the shelterbelt consists of from 5 to 7 rows of various varieties of trees usually planted on the south border of the farmer's land for the purpose of checking the hot winds and decreasing erosion in the several prairie States affected. In Oklahoma the program has proved eminently successful. Millions of young trees have been planted on farms in western and southwestern Oklahoma, where farmers have signed agreements to fence, cultivate, and protect the so-called shelterbelts. Despite 5 years of continuous drought, until the present season, the trees have made a marvelous growth and I am advised that a remarkably small percentage of the trees planted have died. I am sure that the farmers of Oklahoma, and certainly that applies to those of other prairie States affected, are tremendously interested in continuing this worth while program. In a general way, let me say that the prairie States forestry project has proven to be a fully practical and extremely beneficial aid to agriculture in the Plains country. This region is the source of almost half of the agricultural food products consumed by the American people, and is one of the great markets for manufactured goods.

The shelterbelts make definite economic contributions to agriculture. They decrease three types of prevalent damage to farm crops—namely, blowing out of seed and young crops, abrasion by soil particles, and hot winds. They conserve the productive values of the topsoil by decreasing wind erosion; they provide an improved condition for game and insectivorous birds; and they yield supplies of fence posts and fuel wood.

The work has been conducted as a cooperative undertaking with the farmers on whose lands the shelterbelts are planted. Counties and municipalities have also contributed to the work.

The value of all services contributed at present amounts to over 40 percent of the cost to the Government.

Since the project started in 1935 there has been planted about 17,000 miles of shelterbelts on about 27,000 farms in the six States of North Dakota, South Dakota, Nebraska, Kansas, Oklahoma, and Texas. Notwithstanding the severe drought which has prevailed up to this year since the work began, there has been, as I stated a moment ago, a high percentage of survival of the trees. In the State of Oklahoma 3,000 miles of shelterbelts have been planted on about 5,000 farms. Over 30,000,000 trees have been planted in Oklahoma. Much of the soil of western Oklahoma where the project operates is of a sandy nature. Farmers and other rural people are enthusiastic as to the benefits obtained from shelterbelts.

The Plains area is the only region in the United States where there is a concentration of counties which have lost 10 percent or more of the population during the past decade. By improving living conditions as well as providing benefits to land and crops, shelterbelts undoubtedly have a definite effect on keeping people on the farms. I sincerely hope that the House will recede and concur in the Senate amendment and not only continue this worth-while program, but that we will take this program off of relief and make it hereafter a definite part of our great agricultural program.

Pensions and National Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HARRY R. SHEPPARD
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 19, 1941

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. HARRY R. SHEPPARD, OF CALIFORNIA

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address I delivered over the radio on May 23, 1941:

At this time, as war clouds gather, there is grave danger that some of our greatest domestic needs may be obscured by the paramount problem of defense. If this happens, a loss in national morale is likely to follow.

SECURITY FROM WANT AS WELL AS FEAR

With this thought in mind, 150 of my colleagues in the House of Representatives have gotten together behind a program for social security which, if enacted into law, would tend to encourage our people to a greater zeal for the maintenance of the democracy we seek to defend; in that defense would be coupled with the abiding knowledge of security from want as well as from fear.

NONPARTISAN STEERING COMMITTEE OF 150 CONGRESSMEN

These 150 Congressmen, from all political parties and from all sections of the Nation, have formed what is known as the General Welfare Act steering committee, which committee I have had the honor to head as chairman for the last 4 years. They have all signed a steering committee resolution endorsing the General Welfare Act (H. R. 1410) as an amendment to the Social Security Act, urging its adoption by the Seventy-seventh Congress and pledging their efforts in its behalf.

GREATEST GENERAL PENSION PROGRESS IN HISTORY

This banding together of 150 Congressmen for a single purpose represents the greatest general pension progress in the history of America. I am sure, therefore, that you who are listening in will welcome a brief explanation of this bill, its provisions, and its purposes.

GENERAL WELFARE ACT EXPLAINED

The General Welfare Act, or General Welfare Act amendments, to the Social Security Act was introduced in Congress on January 6, 1941, by Hon. WILLIAM H. LARRABEE, of Indiana as H. R. 1410. It provides for the extension of the coverage of the Social Security Act to all groups and all classes on the basis of a flat $30 per month without any "means test" or "needs test," such as is now required under title I of the Social Security Act. This $30 may be augmented by earnings of not to exceed $15 per month, and the various States may supplement these amounts on the basis of need, so as to allow those who cannot live on the basic $30 Federal annuity, $50 per month in the State of California, $45 per month in the State of Washington, and lesser amounts in those States not able to carry such a heavy load.

ABOLISH PAUPERS' OATHS AND STATE RESIDENCE REQUIREMENTS

This arrangement would do away with the degrading paupers' oaths in connection with pensions and would insure fair and equal treatment to our senior citizens, no matter in which State they happen to live. It would enable them to travel about from State to State and not be restrained by some social-security regulation.

PAY-AS-YOU-GO BASIS AS AGAINST PENSIONS ON BORROWED MONEY

It would also put pensions on a pay-as-you-go basis and end our present system of giving pensions to some of our elders at the expense of their grandchildren. The Federal Government now grants $20,000,000 per month, or $240,000,000 per year, to 2,000,000 aged until title I of the Social Security Act, to match State appropriations on a 50-50 basis. Every cent of the Federal money thus paid out is charged to posterity as no satisfactory method of financing the present pensions has been worked out. We simply grant them and ask our children and grandchildren to pay the bill, plus interest, to those who loan the money for every day the loan is unpaid. This is certainly not right, and I doubt that many of my listeners would not want to change this system and put pensions on a pay-as-you-go basis.

EXTEND SOCIAL SECURITY ACT TO ALL

By doing so we would merely extend the principles of title II of the Social Security Act to all those who have been left out of our present annuity system built up on a proper basis. Under this system about one-half of our present population is covered by a sound social-security system that will eventually bring to each one, fortunate enough to be covered, a proper retirement annuity of from $10 to $85 per month. This system, of course, is geared to pay rolls and is based upon the proposition that one should get in proportion to what one pays in during one's producing years. There is nothing wrong with title II of the Social Security Act. Nor is there anything wrong with our civil-service retirement system or our railroad retirement system.

FAVORITISM IN SOCIAL-SECURITY FIELD

The only trouble is that these Federal annuity systems are not extensive enough to cover all groups and all classes. Consequently, a system of gross favoritism has grown up in America in the social-security field. About one-half of our people are in the category of "haves" and about one-half are "have nots."

"HAVES"

The "haves" include the following groups: Judges, certain Government workers, railroad workers, teachers, veterans, industrial workers, wives of industrial workers, children of industrial workers, office workers, wives of office workers, children of office workers, aliens (since most of our 4,000,000 aliens fall within the industrial-worker category), wives of aliens, and children of aliens.

"HAVE NOTS"

The "have nots" include the following groups: Farmers, farm laborers, casual laborers, housewives, domestics, nurses, students, church employees, institutional employees, many government employees, businessmen, professional men, the self-employed, and the unemployed.

SOCIAL SECURITY BASED UPON EQUITY

In view of this discrimination in granting annuities to half of our people and leaving the other half out, the question arises as to whether we can consistently approve the social-security program as a whole. I say, "No," that we cannot, and that something must be done to equalize this situation. The only thing that can be done, as I see it, is to extend the provisions in question to all groups and all classes. Then, and then only, will we have real social security in America based upon equity.

DISCRIMINATION INCONSISTENT

The system of discrimination, wherein the Federal and State governments match funds, under which the aged poor in Arkansas get $4 per month from "Uncle Sam" as an average and the aged poor in my State of California get $19 per month as an average from the Federal Government, is inconsistent.

PENALTY ON THRIFT

We should end the system under which the more indolent and shiftless a person is the surer he is of getting a pension geared to pauperism, a system which puts a penalty on thrift and a premium on indolence. If a person is a good citizen and acquires a home we tell him, "You are not eligible for a pension. You have paid taxes, and you have a home. You will have to get along the best way you can."

MORE THAN THREE BILLIONS FOR PENSIONS IMPOSSIBLE NOW

As to a general Federal pension going higher than $30 per month at the present time, this is impossible. It would require $3,000,000,000 more than we are now paying to meet such a pension. I know, and so do the other 13 of my colleagues on the Appropriation Committee of the House who have signed the G. W. A. Steering Committee resolution, that this Congress will not appropriate more than $3,000,000,000 additional for pensions under any circumstances during the present emergency.

NOT A TAX, BUT AN ANNUITY PREMIUM

I feel that there is a chance of going to $30 per month as a flat pension, inasmuch as the tax to raise the money for such a flat pension would not in reality be considered as a tax but would be looked upon rather as an annuity premium which all would be glad to pay, either directly or indirectly, for a retirement annuity maturing at the retirement age.

NOT TAX PURCHASING POWER

Most of our taxes are indirect, and we can, therefore, justify the exemption under the General Welfare Act of the first $80 per month of gross income, or $960 per year, cumulative. We do not want to tax the purchasing power of the small wage earner. They would pay, indirectly, as "passed on" taxes that enter into production costs, their share of the gross profit tax of 2 percent which we propose as a method of financing such a pension system as I have outlined.

GROSS-PROFIT TAX EXPLAINED

By gross profit I mean the total gross income of a person or firm less only the cost of the property or commodity sold or of its component parts. The tax we propose is essentially a value-added tax. We never tax a loss and tax only the mark-up or added value in the case of businesses and the value received in the case of employments, less, of course, the basic exemption of the first $80 per month, or $960 per year. Such a tax base is sound, will not pyramid, and will yield a stable revenue. It has been commended by some of the leading tax experts of the Nation, and I feel that we are on sound ground in recommending it. We may even have to come to it as a means of financing our stupendous defense program as well as financing such a proper general social-security program as I have outlined to you this evening.

SIX FEET OF CONGRESSIONAL SIGNATURES

In the office of the General Welfare Federation of America, 945 Pennsylvania Avenue NW., Washington, D. C., there is a brief 3-line steering committee resolution 6 feet long bearing the actual signatures of 150 of my colleagues in the House of Representatives in support of the legislative proposal I have outlined to you. Additional information as to it may be obtained from the General Welfare Federation or from any of the Congressmen who have signed this resolution, whose names are all listed in the federation's booklet, which gives considerable valuable data as to this matter of social security so vital to all of us.

ALL SHOULD BE INTERESTED

I hope my listeners will interest themselves in it. If they are Government workers who are now assured of economic security in the sunset of life, let them think of the welfare of those they leave behind. If they are railroad workers let them give thought also as to what will become of their dear ones if they should pass away. Let the others who are now covered by Federal social security think of those not covered and do their share to help their fellow men get the same breaks they have secured. Let us all work toward improving the splendid social-security system we now have under title II of the Social Security Act so that its benefits will be extended to all of our people and on a fair and equitable basis.

COOPERATION URGED

Above all, keep in mind that we are confronted with many problems that are most disturbing. We owe each other and our Nation the utmost of cooperation and loyalty.

The Un-American Dirksen Amendment

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN W. FLANNAGAN, JR.
OF VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 19, 1941

Mr. FLANNAGAN. Mr. Speaker, what I am about to say is spoken after due reflection. There is no emotionalism or hysteria in it. It was instilled in me during the impressionable years of my life by a man who possessed as fine courage, physical and moral, as ever filled the heart and soul of man, my father. To me my father, above everything else, was a great American. While he never laid claim to greatness, while he never held some high office of state or church, while his voice never swayed the multitude and caused the blood to curdle or the heart beats to grow faster, while his pen was never engaged in writing some learned treaties, while his mind never gave birth to some great thought that revolutionized society, while he never dreamed through some great invention that played an important part in our economic life, to me he did something greater—he believed in his Americanism, and, day by day, in his humble way, he had the courage to live that Americanism. His Americanism, among other things, included the immortal pronouncements contained in the Declaration of Independence and the philosophy of free government as set forth in the Constitution. He believed in tolerance, which is the foundation stone in the Bill of Rights, and he so lived. He believed in the freedoms—freedom of speech, freedom of the press, religious freedom, and he so lived. And he believed the accused was entitled to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury, that he should be informed of the nature and cause of the charge, that he should be confronted with the witnesses against him, and that he should be given the opportunity to prepare and present his defense, and he so lived. I believe in these things, and I have tried to so live as not to belie my beliefs. And I know my colleagues here in the House also believe in these things and try to live them.

But, Mr. Speaker, something happened here in the House last Friday, the day on which we adjourned over the week-end, that really alarmed me, and since then the spirit of my departed father has ever been present counseling me to cry out against that happening.

On last Thursday the gentleman from Illinois offered an amendment to the emergency relief appropriation bill, while the bill was under consideration by the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, providing "that no part of any appropriation contained in this act shall be used to pay the compensation of David Lasser," and by a viva voce vote of 131 to 88 the amendment was adopted by this, "the greatest deliberative body on earth." On Friday, when the Committee finished its consideration of the bill and reported it back to the House, a separate vote was demanded on the Dirksen amendment, and again "the greatest deliberative body on earth," by a record vote of 214 to 114, upheld the action of the Committee in voting in the amendment.

Mr. Speaker, this ex parte star-chamber proceeding that I cry out against shows that on last Friday we failed to live our Americanism, reflects no credit on the House, and when the bill reaches the Senate I hope that this great travesty upon our Declaration of Independence and Constitution will be wiped out by the elimination of this vicious, un-American amendment.

I hold no brief for Mr. Lasser. I do not know him. I have never laid eyes on him. I would not know him if I met him in the middle of the big road. And from newspaper reports and hearsay I fear that there is little, if anything, in common between us. I do not know whether Mr. Hunter, Acting Commissioner, Work Projects Administration, acted wisely or unwisely in giving him employment, but knowing Mr. Hunter to be an honorable man, I am confident he acted honestly and, until the contrary is shown, I presume wisely. It is not David Lasser the man that I am defending. It is David Lasser, the American citizen who, though perhaps misguided at times—yes, if you please, as I view things, as you view things, perhaps radical at times—is still an American citizen, and by virtue of that citizenship entitled to every right and safeguard that the Constitution of this great Republic throws around her citizenry.

Now, what are the facts as revealed by the record, and upon which the House acted? Ah, Mr. Speaker, they present a sad commentary upon democratic processes and upon the acts of the highest legislative body of our Republic and should bring a blush of shame to the cheek of every American.

The gentleman from Illinois, who offered the amendment, prefacing his remarks by the statement, "I find no particular pride in this kind of procedure," did not even charge that Lasser was a Communist. After stating that Lasser was a man of fine appearance, fluent, extremely able, a graduate of Massachusetts Institute of Technology, an engineer by profession, he charged that some years ago Lasser had made certain base and groundless statements with respect to the membership of this House; that he had been president of the Workers Alliance, a questionable organization, of which one Herbert Benjamin, an admitted Communist, was secretary; that he attended the twentieth anniversary celebration of the Russian Revolution; and that he was now holding a position with the W. P. A. investigating "conditions in private employment in the transition of W. P. A. workers to private industry."

Two other members spoke in favor of the amendment, the gentleman from Oklahoma and the gentleman from Pennsylvania. The gentleman from Oklahoma likewise did not accuse Lasser of being a Communist. The burden of his impeachment was that he had been running around with the wrong crowd; that he had been mixed up with the Workers Alliance, a questionable organization, and had been for a time associated with one Herbert Benjamin, an admitted Communist; and that he had interviewed Mr. Howard O. Hunter, Acting Commissioner, Work Projects Administration, and made complaint because Lasser had been given employment and asked him what he was going to do about it, to which Mr. Hunter had replied, "Nothing." The gentleman from Pennsylvania likewise objected to the company Lasser had kept, and charged the Workers Alliance had plotted to kidnap him if he attended the laying of the cornerstone of the post office at Reading, but stated that in connection with the matter Lasser had sent him a telegram stating that if there was anything to the plot it had been engineered by a bunch of "hoodlums or stool pigeons that may have been sent into his organization by reactionaries;" that in connection with the controversy over the State of Pennsylvania failing to take care of those on relief Lasser had led a bunch of relief workers, in protest, to the capitol of Pennsylvania where some of them acted unseemly; and that he had protested to Mr. Hunter over giving Lasser employment and was astonished when informed by Mr. Hunter that Lasser was rendering excellent service.

In opposition to the amendment the gentleman from Massachusetts stated:

> David Lasser was born in Baltimore in 1902. He served in the United States Army at the age of 17, and was gassed while in France fighting for his country. In the Workers Alliance when he found that the Communist influence was getting stronger, he had a fight with David (Herbert) Benjamin, a known Communist. The Dies committee was created by the Congress to investigate and determine the facts with respect to un-American activities. I quote what it said about David Lasser in its report to this Congress in January, about the Workers Alliance. It said—
> "The non-Communist element in the Workers Alliance withdrew under the leadership of David Lasser in June of that year and that the Workers Alliance became a shadow of its former self."

Hence it appears that Lasser was given credit in the report of the Dies committee for having broken up the Workers' Alliance. Why did he break it up? Because, as recited in the report, it was communistic. This act on the part of Mr. Lasser cannot be reconciled with the imputation that he is a Communist or entertains, in any way, a sympathetic feeling for the Communists but, on the contrary, clearly shows that he is violently opposed to these gutter rats that are trying to undermine free government in America.

The Democratic floor leader, whom we all love and admire, and who rendered the country a great service some years ago as chairman of the House committee to investigate nazi-ism and communism, and who is the author of the bill under which all those charged with subversive activities are now being prosecuted, in opposition to the resolution, stated:

> Mr. Lasser, to me, is just an individual whom I have met on a few occasions. The first time I saw the man was when he appeared before the Ways and Means Committee when amendments to the Social Security Act were under consideration. I have a copy of the hearings in my hands. I had a very unfavorable impression about him when I heard he was going to appear before the committee, and at that time I gave him a rather searching cross-examination; but, Mr. Chairman, at the conclusion of the examination I changed the tentative opinion of an adverse nature that I had entertained toward him and which was formed as a result of reading the newspapers and as a result of other information, emotional it is true, that had been called to my attention. I found him to be a constructive witness. I found him to be a reasonable witness. He made one or two proposals that I took occasion to compliment him about, and he made at least one proposal which was incorporated in the bill reported out of the committee because it was a sound, constructive proposal.

I have recited the arguments pro and con, not because I believe they are persuasive or controlling one way or the other on the principles involved—I know they are not—but simply to show the limit patriotic, God-fearing Americans, in periods of hysteria, will go.

Mr. Speaker, the conviction of David Lasser—and, for all practical purposes, that is just what this amendment does—an American citizen born in the city of Baltimore of American parents, whose patriotism was so intense that he volunteered at the tender age of 17 to fight to "make the world safe for democracy," and who bears to this day the scars of that patriotic service, by the House of Representatives in an ex parte, star-chamber proceeding, is not only without warrant of law, but is in plain violation of the spirit and letter of the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States.

Every American citizen should view our proceeding with alarm when he contemplates them in connection with the pronouncement made by our predecessors in office, the members of the Second Continental Congress, when, through their Declaration of July 4, 1776, they indicted George III:

> For depriving us in many cases of the benefits of trial by jury—for transporting us beyond seas to be tried for pretended offenses.

Every American should view our proceedings with alarm when he contemplates them in connection with the principles of free government set forth in the first amendment to the Constitution, which is the first article in what is commonly known as the Bill of Rights, which reads:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

Every American should view our proceedings with alarm when he contemplates them in connection with the principles of free government set forth in the sixth amendment to the Constitution, which is the sixth article in what is commonly known as the Bill of Rights, which reads:

> In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been prevously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the assistance of counsel for his defense.

Every American should view our proceedings with alarm when he contemplates them in connection with the principles of free government set forth in the seventh amendment to the Constitution, and which is the seventh article in what is commonly known as the Bill of Rights, which reads:

> In suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed $20, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved, and no fact tried by a jury, shall be otherwise reexamined in any court of the United States, than according to the rules of the common law.

And every American should view our proceedings with alarm when he contemplates them in connection with the principles of free government set forth in section 9 of article I of the Constitution, which reads:

> No bill of attainder or ex post facto law shall be passed.

We boast that ours is a democratic government, a Christian nation, and rightly so. And yet 2,000 years ago un-Christian, imperial Rome showed a greater consideration for her laws and the rights of her citizens than was displayed here in the House last Friday. It is recorded that the Jews, who had been subjugated by the Romans and whose territory at the time was a Roman province, "laid many and grievious complaints" against a certain Roman citizen, Paul by name. As I remember the Roman Judge Festus, anxious to win favor with the Jews, was willing to do their bidding by sending Paul to Jerusalem for trial until Paul made known his Roman citizenship by appealing to Caesar. When this fact became known Judge Festus, no longer swayed by Jewish clamor, ordered Paul back to Rome to be tried under the Roman law. His citizenship stood for something. There is another pronouncement in that record that I desire to call to the attention of the House, Judge Festus in denying the request of the Jews, stated:

> It is not the manner of the Romans to deliver any man to die, before that he which is accused have the accusers face to face, and have license to answer for himself concerning the crime laid against him.

While I know the membership of the House is perfectly familiar with Holy Writ, in considering the rights of accused, I hope that they will give careful and prayerful study and meditation to the twenty-fifth chapter of The Acts of the Apostles.

Mr. Speaker, let us for a moment contemplate what we have done by the adoption of this ill-considered, unwise, un-American amendment. In a moment of hysterical emotionalism we have, without the semblance of a trial—without formal complaint, without evidence to support a complaint if it had been filed, without facing the accused by his accusers, without permitting the accused to make defense—convicted an American citizen of being unworthy to serve, in a minor civil position, the land that the grim scars of war upon his body bear mute testimony to that he loves. Think of it. Passing special legislation in the nature, to say the least, of a bill of attainder, which is prohibited by section 9 of article I of the Constitution, to get rid of a minor governmental employee.

Why did we do it? What excuse did we offer for trampling under foot the fundamental laws of this land? Let the record answer. The gentleman from Illinois is speaking:

> There is no other way I know of outside substantive legislation which we have difficulty in getting into and through the Congress, to get at Mr. Lasser except by means of a limitation upon an appropriation bill.

While such an excuse is groundless, even if true it would not justify the means employed. I do not know of a single piece of legislation aimed at getting rid of subversive influences that has not had the support of the leadership of this House. For instance, the majority leader, at one time served as chairman of a House committee to investigate nazi-ism and communism. Without the blare of trumpets and daily newspaper headlines his committee rendered a real outstanding service, and recommended to the House the passage of legislation which was immediately passed, and today those charged with subversive activities are being prosecuted under the law. The Dies committee which succeeded the McCormack committee has never, so far as I know, recommended the passage of a single piece of legislation.

But even if the excuse offered were true, it would not justify the action taken. Behold the picture again. The mighty Congress of the United States, supposed to be the greatest deliberative body on earth, singling out a helpless citizen holding a minor position in a governmental department that employs thousands, and without a hearing or an opportunity to be heard, virtually passing a bill of attainder to get rid of him. That does not look like an American picture to me. The coloring has too much of the symbolical red of a Stalin. My colleagues, honestly, are not you ashamed of that picture? Basing your excuse for getting rid of Lasser on the ground that he is a Communist, or has communistic leanings, and then resorting to communistic means to accomplish your end.

Oh, you say there are others. Now, permit me to disgress long enough to make a few observations with respect to those who entertain subversive views being employed by the Government. There has been a lot of loose talk going around for some time to the effect that the departments are employing many Nazi and Communist sympathizers. I hope that this sordid affair will, at least, bring this matter to a head. If such is the case, the Congress and the American people are entitled to know. And if such is the case, I know that the Congress will act, and act with dispatch and within the limits of the Constitution to get rid of them, and if we need additional substantive laws to do this, I know that the Congress will immediately pass the laws. And in this connection permit me to call attention to the fact that on April 4, 1941, this House adopted an amendment to H. R. 4276, the bill making appropriations for the Departments of State, Commerce, and Justice, and the Judiciary, making available to the Federal Bureau of Investigation $100,000 to be used—exclusively to investigate the employees of every department, agency, and independent establishment of the Federal Government who are members of subversive organizations or advocate the overthrow of the Federal Government, and report the findings to Congress.

The RECORD of June 5, 1941, page 4769, reveals that the House again had under consideration H. R. 4276 for the purpose of appointing conferees, and discloses the following startling facts:

Mr. RABAUT. Mr. Speaker, in this connection, may I say that on April 4, 1941, because of this amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JONES] that was passed by the House, I addressed my colleague the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES] as follows—and, as I stated, this letter is dated April 4:

HON. MARTIN DIES,
Member of Congress, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR COLLEAGUE: Yesterday the House, while making appropriations for the Departments of State, Commerce, Justice, and the judiciary for the fiscal year 1942, inserted an amendment in the bill the effect of which is to make available $100,000 of the funds appropriated to the Federal Bureau of Investigation "exclusively to investigate the employees of every department, agency, and independent establishment of the Federal Government who are members of subversive organizations or advocate the overthrow of the Federal Government, and report its findings to Congress.

It has come to my attention that the Director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation has not the list of Government employees compiled by your Special Committee to Investigate Un-American Activities who are members of subversive organizations or who advocate the overthrow of the Federal Government.

May I respectfully request, therefore, in order that the Federal Bureau of Investigation may be properly informed of the findings of your committee in the matter of these individuals, that your committee make available to the Federal Bureau of Investigation the list to which reference is made?

Cordially yours,

LOUIS C. RABAUT,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Appropriations for State, Commerce, Justice, and the Judiciary.

Under date of April 7, I received the following reply:

This will acknowledge receipt of your letter of April 4, 1941, addressed to Congressman DIES.

Please be advised that Mr. DIES is out of town at the present time. However, I shall be glad to bring your letter to his attention upon his return to the city.

Sincerely yours,

ROBERT E. STRIPLING,
Secretary.

A telephone call today to the Federal Bureau of Investigation, made as late as an hour ago, revealed that up to the present time the F. B. I. has not received the list to which reference was made in the letter.

Let us get this thing cleared up. The time is long past due for a show-down. If the investigation of the Dies committee reveals that "members of subversive organizations or who advocate the overthrow of the Federal Government" are on the Government pay roll, why did not the committee immediately report the matter to Congress and to the Federal Bureau of Investigation for action? If the Federal Bureau of Investigation is acquainted with the list, why has it not made the proper investigation and, if there is cause to believe that any or all on the list are guilty as charged, report to the Department of Justice for proper action? If the F. B. I. has made the proper investigation and found that the charges are baseless, why has it not made its findings known so the Congress and the public will be advised? These charges and countercharges—and that is all we have had until we took our vengeance out on an ex-soldier holding a minor position by virtually passing a bill of attainder against him—are disturbing me, and they are disturbing the American people. We are entitled to know the facts; and I am serving notice now—let the chips fall where they may—that I am not going to let up on the matter until we get the facts. If, for political reasons, there are those who are making the charges for the purpose of trying to smear the administration because they do not agree with its policies, let the facts come. If for ill will or hate there are those who are making the charges for the purpose of trying to smear the administration, let the facts come. And, likewise, if the charges are true, let the facts come. What we want are the plain, unvarnished facts.

Now, having got this matter off of my chest, let me get back to Mr. Lasser. What are the consequences of the passage of this vicious, un-American amendment? Let us see. Mr. Speaker, there is something ironical in appropriating $10,000,000,000 one day to preserve free government, and the next day passing an amendment which, if adopted as an American principle, will destroy free government. There is something ominous in appropriating something like $1,000,000,000 to feed the hungry and clothe the naked—to meet the responsibility of a free government to its citizenry—and in the very same bill voting in an amendment, the vicious principle of which would do more to destroy free government than all the millions we can appropriate will do for its preservation.

What, I repeat, are the natural consequences of our act? Let us see. We have, let me repeat, without a hearing, without a trial, in a legislative proceeding, and in violation of the spirit and letter of the fundamental laws of our land, solemnly adjudicated that an American citizen, against whom no complaint of law violation had been lodged, is unworthy to hold a position with his Government. We have cut that citizen off from the means of his livelihood, and, in all probability, made it extremely difficult, if not impossible, for him to hereafter find employment. We have virtually passed a bill of attainder against an American citizen. Remember, my colleagues, you cannot destroy the rights of the other man without putting your own rights in jeopardy.

If this amendment stands then who, I pray thee, is safe from the legislative edict? If the amendment correctly expressed the power of Congress, then what is there to keep a member from listing those in the departments for whom he has a dislike because, perchance, they do not view political, social, or economic questions alike, and then waiting until the appropriation bills covering the respective departments are brought up and offering amendments prohibiting the use of any of the funds appropriated from being used to pay their respective salaries? My Republican friends, let me say that if the amendment correctly expresses the power of Congress, then it is a good thing that the legislative appropriation bill has passed, because I am afraid that some Democrat, given to buffoonery and in a spirit of counterfeiting folly, who does not agree with you on political, social, and economic questions, would offer an amendment cutting off the pay of all Republican Members. Yes, the Democrat offering the amendment would charge you with being reactionaries and radicals and alarmists and extremists and, be not deceived, if required to produce proof, which, of course, is a matter of such small consequence that it is not required under the Dirksen philosophy, could darn nigh prove it—at least he could to the satisfaction of the majority of the House as at present constituted.

Again I repeat, what are the natural consequences of our acts? Why, through our hold on the purse string, we are usurping the powers of the executive and judiciary and setting up a legislative dictatorship. If the Chief Executive or any of the department heads or the employees therein do not suit us, why pass an amendment to the proper appropriation bill, and without a hearing, solemnly declare by legislative edict that they are unworthy to hold public office, and provide that no part of the appropriation shall be used to pay their salaries. If the Supreme Court judges or any of the lesser judges or their employees render decisions or entertain views that do not coincide with ours, why, pass an amendment.

I hope the Senate will undo our ill-considerative action. If it does not, then, if I were President, I would veto the bill. I would never let it be said that the head of this Republic gave his sanction and approval to the provisions of a bill that strips an American citizen of his constitutional rights by an ex parte, star-chamber proceeding.

Mr. Speaker, this is no easy task that I have performed. I dislike to criticize an act of this House. I love its membership; I prize above earthly possessions the privilege to be numbered among its Members; I revere its long and unbroken record of service to our country; but, feeling as I do, I could not live my Americanism and let go unchallenged the vicious and un-American action we took in passing the Dirksen amendment.

OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. M. MICHAEL EDELSTEIN, late a Representative from the State of New York

Mr. CULLEN. Mr. Speaker, it is my sad duty to record a personal word to the Members of the House upon the life and services of that splendid and lovable character who came to Congress from the city of New York, and whose untimely death filled our hearts with sadness—the late MICHAEL EDELSTEIN.

I cherish the memory of my friend MICHAEL EDELSTEIN. He was a delightful companion and a warm-hearted and loyal friend. He possessed those human qualities which made others love and admire him.

He was successful in his work in Congress and elsewhere because of his indefatigable industry, and his intimate knowledge of anything he ever undertook to do.

I join with those who have reason to cherish his memory in paying this brief tribute to the personality and character of a man who rose to prominence in the great metropolis of New York City and who in a dignified and effective way rendered valuable services to his city, State, and country.

MEMORIAL ADDRESS
OF
HON. ROBERT L. DOUGHTON
OF NORTH CAROLINA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. ALONZO DILLARD FOLGER, late a Representative from the State of North Carolina

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, in the tragic and untimely death of our beloved friend and colleague, ALONZO D. FOLGER, the membership of this body has suffered a serious privation. To all of us who knew him and shared his friendship, his death carries with it a profound sense of personal loss. The people of his district, of our entire State and of the Nation have lost a faithful and efficient public servant and a true friend.

No one could know LON FOLGER without recognizing and admiring his outstanding ability, his unselfish devotion to duty, and his love for his fellow man. His many high qualities were universally respected and his gentle consideration for others, his unfailing patience and courtesy endeared him to everyone with whom he came in contact.

As evidence of the esteem and respect with which he was held by the people of his district and of North Carolina, I may cite a few of the many honors and positions of trust and confidence which were bestowed upon him. He served since 1932 as trustee of the University of North Carolina and in 1937 became a judge of the Superior Court of North Carolina. Shortly thereafter he resigned to become our national committeeman and director of finance for the Democratic National Committee. He came to Congress in 1938 and served here with honor and distinction until his untimely death.

In each of these capacities he gave unstintingly of his unusual abilities and energy. No one was more zealous or untiring in his devotion to the public cause. An earnest and able effort to promote the welfare of his fellow man was the single purpose of his entire life.

LON FOLGER'S personality, his sincerity, and sympathetic consideration endeared him to those in every walk of life. His friends were legion, and never was there the slightest indication that their trust and confidence were misplaced. I know that I speak for all of them when I say that he is sorely missed and that his death has brought to a tragic end an extremely useful career.

To his widow and family we extend the heartfelt sympathy of the House of Representatives, and we share with them a profound sorrow in the death of one so universally respected, admired, and loved.

MEMORIAL ADDRESS
OF
HON. LOUIS J. CAPOZZOLI
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. M. MICHAEL EDELSTEIN, late a Representative from the State of New York

Mr. CAPOZZOLI. Mr. Speaker, gone from our midst is that modest, able, and alert gentleman, the late Congressman M. MICHAEL EDELSTEIN. Those of us who knew him realize that his talents and qualities will be sorely missed. In these days of uncertainty, when much can happen as the result of an ill-advised word or deed, his experience with human psychology would have been of great assistance. Seldom ruffled, always the perfect gentleman, he contributed greatly to sane, sound procedure.

As a member of the bar he enjoyed an enviable reputation. He was held in an affectionate and respectful regard by judges, lawyers, and court attaches, and he enjoyed their complete confidence. Always scrupulous in his efforts to avoid offense to anyone, he lived his life to the end that he might mix with his fellowmen in harmony and at peace.

To say of him he was an American is to put it mildly. It would be more in accord with the fact to say that with him Americanism was a religion in itself. His concept of the term embodied all that is noble in America and all for which America has stood throughout the years. To him some of these unfortunate present-day practices, which are properly condemned by all right-thinking Americans, were completely foreign to his understanding of the teachings of America.

His life was cut short by the Almighty Providence which determines time and place. The arduous duties of his office, and the sincerity with which he discharged them, unquestionably contributed to his passing. His demise is indeed a sad blow to his dear ones and friends. However, may I venture the thought that few of us can ever hope for as glorious an end as that of our departed colleague and friend. As has been said by a prominent jurist of the State of New York, in commenting upon the death of our colleague:

He died in harness, in the Hall of Congress, fervently pleading for tolerance and justice to all.

MEMORIAL ADDRESS
OF
HON. JOHN TABER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. WILLIAM BROCKMAN BANKHEAD, late a Representative from the State of Alabama

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, WILLIAM B. BANKHEAD was one of the ablest debaters and ablest parliamentarians that Congress has developed in recent years. He was a man devoted to the interests of his country, his State, and his own home community. It was my privilege to meet and to know him as few men had an opportunity to know him, and the power of his intellect, and the sincerity of his patriotism have left upon me an everlasting memory.

MEMORIAL ADDRESS
OF
HON. THOMAS H. CULLEN
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life, character, and public service of Hon PIUS LOUIS SCHWERT, late a Representative from the State of New York

Mr. CULLEN. Mr. Speaker, if the time of departing from this world had been left to man, the life of PIUS L. SCHWERT would certainly have been greatly prolonged, for his friends and associates would have been reluctant to have dispensed with an association and friendship so pleasing and enjoyable to them.

During my association with him in the House of Representatives I grew to respect and admire him for his wonderful characteristics, his qualities, his principles, his extreme kindness, and all those other attributes which typify a great man.

In this solemn hour devoted to a contemplation of his character and accomplishment it will be comforting to those who loved him in his life to recall that though his distinguished career is closed, he has left behind him the heritage of a great name, respected and honored throughout his city, his State, and the Nation.

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

OF

HON. JOHN TABER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. KENNETH FARRAND SIMPSON, late a Representative from the State of New York

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I have known KENNETH SIMPSON for over 20 years. During all that time he has been active in the public service, but as a man of public service rather than a holder of official position. He was a great success as a practicing lawyer and became the political leader of the largest city in the country. He has left his imprint on the city of New York and its political life in a fine way and in a way that will be a credit to him more and more in the years to come.

He was elected to the House last fall and served just 8 weeks. It was tragic that a man of such ability should die so young. It was a tremendous tribute to his ability that he was able to accomplish so much in a short and busy life.

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

OF

HON. JOHN TABER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. GEORGE NICHOLAS SEGER, late a Representative from the State of New Jersey

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, GEORGE SEGER came to Congress when I did in 1923. I have known him closely and intimately ever since then. He has been a devoted and loyal public servant. Few men for so long a period of time have held the absolute confidence of their people as he did, beginning early in life and continuing their service to the very end of a long and useful life. He had an especially fine and pleasant manner, and was a keen student, and was always on the job. It was tragic that he should have passed away when he had contemplated retirement the 1st of January 1941 and not be permitted to complete his term, at the end of which he had announced his retirement. Few men are able to train and name their successor as he was, and we must acknowledge in that he did a fine job, as he did in everything else. GEORGE SEGER will be greatly missed by his family and friends.

A Constitutional Freedom—The Freedom of Speech

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. E. E. COX

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 20, 1941

ADDRESSES OF HON. E. E. COX, OF GEORGIA, AND REV. JAMES SHERA MONTGOMERY, CHAPLAIN OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following addresses delivered by myself and Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., Chaplain of the House of Representatives, at the dedication of radio station WALB in my district:

ADDRESS OF HON. E. E. COX, OF GEORGIA

My friends, I am greatly pleased to be permitted to take part in these exercises. It enables me to speak directly to those I love best and owe much.

This broadcasting station, now being dedicated to the public service, symbolizes one of America's cherished freedoms—freedom of speech.

When the framers of the Constitution had completed their work at Philadelphia and by resolution had agreed that it should be sent to the States for ratification, in accordance with the provisions of article VII of their completed draft, the First Congress elected under the Constitution proposed, on September 25, 1789, to the legislatures of the several States, a series of amendments.

Among those amendments, which we have come to call the Bill of Rights, the very first provides: "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances."

Thus, it should be observed, these fundamental principles—"these * * * essential human freedoms," as they were designated by the President in his message delivered at the opening of the first session of the Seventy-seventh Congress—were proposed by the elected representatives of the people. They were, moreover, ratified by the people in their several States and made a part of the Constitution, in accordance with prescribed constitutional principles.

Today, more than at any other time in our history perhaps, we cherish these freedoms because today we live in a world in which there is a denial of these freedoms, especially freedom of speech, to millions of people by totalitarian or communistic dictators.

Throughout all the world today, except in our own America, a totalitarian or a Communist censor determines what the people may hear over the radio, what they may read in their daily press, or what they may say. Totalitarian censors determine what the world shall hear, by way of the air, of events and occurrences within their own lands, and they deprive their own people of news from all the world.

Here in America today there are approximately 30,000,000 radio families. Based upon the average estimate of approximately 4 persons per family, this means that in America a radio is accessible to practically every person in the Nation. Here there is no censor. Here there is no suppression of free speech. Here the air lanes are free to carry the news of all the world into the homes of all our people. Great news-gathering agencies, the most efficient in the world, present the news almost every hour around the clock. Instantaneously, our broadcasting systems carry us to all the capitals of the world, where the voice of American broadcasters may be heard bringing us the facts of world events. Here proponent and opponent alike is accorded a fair opportunity to express his views upon any matter of importance of interest to the people, whether it be cultural, political, or economic, for under the canons of broadcasting equitable opportunity is granted to all alike to present their views.

We live in a revolutionary era. There is world-wide upheaval. The institutions of human civilization are being shaken to their very foundations. Some will be destroyed. Some will be preserved. It is for us as free people to decide whether we will preserve our human freedoms or whether we shall permit them to be destroyed by philosophies foreign to our land, inimical to our perpetuity, and destructive of our future existence.

Whether we like it or not we are being precipitated into a new world of thought, of new economic philosophies, of new concepts of government, of changing principles of human relationships. We cannot avert these changes, but we can determine as a resolute people to what extent we shall permit ourselves to be changed by them, if at all; and we can determine by our will and our energy so to mold these changes and the forces which are instrumental in effectuating them that the human values we cherish shall prevail.

The conflict raging about us today is a conflict between two ways of life, between two systems of values. On the one side are ranged the forces of dictatorship, of personal aggrandizement, of government from above, of subservient obedience from below. On the other side are ranged the forces of democracy, of human values, of individual liberty, of personal freedoms—the human freedoms of the American Constitution, of the right to life, liberty, and property as we understand it in America. Of the right, if you please, for those who have established this broadcasting station to operate it as a private enterprise, observing, of course, those limitations and restrictions necessary merely that others, too, may enjoy the use of the air in accordance with their rights under a government the functions of which are to guarantee the rights of all.

Whether or not we like it we are engulfed in a conflict of ideas, or, as they have come to be called in this latter day, ideologies. This is the real conflict, for behind the lines, behind the attacks by air, behind the parachutists, behind the bombers, is a conflict of ideas—of invisible ideologies.

How can we adapt our democratic way of life, our democratic ideals to our own needs, to the needs of all our people, at a time when these are challenged by totalitarians and Communists from without and Communists and "fifth columnists" from within.

In my opinion we can do this only by rigid and insistent adherence to those human freedoms guaranteed us by the Constitution. We can do this when we determine upon a course of action adapted to our own needs, to the preservation of our own ideals, to the development of our own institutions, to the perpetuation of our own civilization. We shall fail when we neglect our human freedoms, when we no longer insist upon their observance, when we permit foreign philosophies and foreign ideologies to invade our land and pervert our people.

Above all we shall lose our human freedoms when we deny ourselves freedom of speech or permit it to be denied us. We shall lose our human freedoms if the elected representatives of the people should be denied the opportunity to utilize the most modern of scientific instrumentalities for the public presentation of public issues, for this is the most modern of all means for the dissemination of thought through speech.

In an earlier day leaders spoke to the people directly in the public forum. Demosthenes, Cicero, or Caesar could address the assembled multitude directly, for the number of the multitude was small and almost all could assemble within hearing of the spoken word. But as populations increased, as new continents were discovered, as great cities with teeming populations came to be developed, recourse to the written word became necessary, and in America we established a free press. This modern miracle, the radio, has restored once again the power of the spoken word. Today a Presidential message is heard around the world. The voice of a king, a prime minister, or a dictator is carried into the homes of the land. The people's leaders or their elected representatives now may address them directly. This is a very real freedom, indeed. It is one which we may not permit to be challenged by dictators nor denied even by government itself, for our constitutional limitation is imposed upon government, not upon the people.

I would remind you, my friends, that the future of democracy is no less challenged by communism than by nazi-ism, for whatever the apparent agreement between totalitarians and Communists the fact remains that nazi-ism is but the counter-revolution against communism, and ultimately that conflict must be waged. Democracy stands between, threatened on both sides alike. America, with all its human freedoms, against denial of every human right by totalitarian and Communist alike.

I would remind you, my friends, that democracy is concerned with the rights of the individual, whether he be great or small, rich or poor, in high place or lowly. American democracy makes individual rights supreme and institutions subordinate. American democracy assures unlimited possibilities of growth within the individual. Our constitutional human freedoms emphasize the value of the individual.

And in this connection I would remind the people of America that we who now carry on cannot ignore the needs of those who must carry on after us. The heritage we now purpose to preserve is not for ourselves alone but for our sons and daughters for whom we hold it in trust and to whom we must relinquish it when the time for our eternal reward arrives.

It is for us to preserve that which we possess against immediate assault whether it be from within or without. But it is an even greater obligation to assure those who must succeed us that they shall not be denied access to the cherished institutions of America. We must assure them an opportunity to acquire in American schools and American homes the knowledge and the inspiration that alone will enable them to understand our human freedoms as they have been developed in our American way of life.

Armed with that knowledge, inspired by those ideals, they will be able to take up the task where we must lay it down. Let us then dedicate ourselves to the preservation of our human freedoms, let us pass them on to our sons and daughters, and may this most modern instrumentality of science be dedicated to the cause of freemen and freewomen not merely in our own land, where human freedoms prevail by constitutional guaranty, but throughout all the world in order that they may make others free.

ADDRESS OF REV. JAMES SHERA MONTGOMERY, D. D.

I am gratified to be with my close personal friend and your most capable and notable Congressman, the Honorable GENE COX, in whom there is neither variableness nor shadow of turning; individualistic, loyal to his constituents and to his conscience with unswerving fidelity. There is no greater patriot who serves under the dome of yonder Capitol.

Democracy is not a right, it is a privilege.

Democracy provides freedom, but what is to provide the safeguards of freedom?

The controls must be such as to be voluntarily accepted. Herein lies the central problem of human government. There is no question as to where the controls must be applied.

One of the first of these is national unity. Just as every particle of matter must obey the law of gravity, so must men and events conform to certain basic laws; certain fundamental principles must be exercised in the depths of the very heart of the citizenry of a democracy. We must decide whither we are going. We declare loudly that we want to preserve the American way of life. Take care lest we drift. There are forces in our own midst with a very determined policy which mean to topple the western world completely off its base. If anyone believes in this fiction that there is no alinement between communism in our country and that of pagan Europe he is blind and soft-headed.

One grave sign of our unawareness is seen in our industrial disharmony. What we need to learn with emphasis is that there is a war going on right in our midst. Individuals are harassed by conflict and fear, labor is pitted against employers, and even against fellow laborers. Heaven knows that discrimination and intolerance are not peace but war, threatening the very foundations of free government.

Our Nation's weakness is irreverence. Unless we correct this disease by a better home life and school life, we are facing a Niagara of destruction. * * * National character, without reverence for our great historic forefathers who made this Republic possible, and without deep and abiding respect for law and authority, is like the air without oxygen. A nation cannot long survive that does not reverence its God, the Bible, and those high standards that make for the highest order of citizenship. Without reverence the whole image of our national life is defaced and impoverished to the point where our whole national fabric of christian ideals is threatened with destruction. We are not Italian Americans, nor French Americans, nor Polish Americans, nor English Americans, nor Scotch Americans, nor even Irish Americans, but Americans.

Let us catch the vision of the future; let every American take reverence and national unity to heart and help clean out the rotten logs of our national houses where the termites burrow and destroy and replace them with sound and enduring foundations, permeated by the spirit that makes men free and happy, inspired by the spirit of Him who spoke as never man spoke.

While these are the days of change, we do not need a new religion, but we need to take Christianity out of the storehouse of creed and formalism and turn it loose among the children of men.

Additional Judge, Eastern District of Missouri

REMARKS

OF

HON. PHILIP A. BENNETT

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 20, 1941

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Speaker, on Monday, June 16, my colleague from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD a report of a special committee of the bar association of St. Louis relative to H. R. 137, a bill to provide for an additional judge in the eastern district of Missouri.

In commenting upon the report of the bar committee the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] said:

It seems to me that this report coupled with the second report of Justice Stone is a complete answer to those who say an additional judge is not needed in this district.

Mr. Speaker, I cannot agree with the gentleman from St. Louis in the conclusion that the bar committee's report is a complete answer to those of us who feel that an additional judge at St. Louis is wholly unnecessary.

It is just too much to expect that the local bar, when offered an additional judge, would say he is not needed. The committee was composed of two Democrats and one Republican. They say—

While your committee has not had the time to make an exhaustive personal study of the relative statistics, it is clear that from the point of view of the cases filed, the cases filed in the eastern district are higher in number than the average prevailing over the United States.

Well, the number of cases filed may be greater than the average number of cases filed over the Nation, but the number of cases filed often has little to do with the amount of work done by the judges. In a letter addressed to me on May 13, 1941, Judge Charles B. Davis, senior judge in the eastern district of Missouri, wrote as follows:

ST. LOUIS, MO., May 13, 1941.

Hon. PHIL A. BENNETT,
Member of Congress, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: Your letter of April 26 was received. It was perfectly agreeable to me for you to use my telegram as you did.

As a result of your inquiry, a check of our records has been made to ascertain the number of cases that have been tried since the beginning of the present fiscal year. Omitting dismissals, default and consent judgments, pleas of guilty, and nolo contendere, the following is a complete list of cases tried in the eastern district of Missouri from July 1, 1940, to April 30, 1941, by all three judges, including cases tried in both the Hannibal and Cape Girardeau divisions:

Government and private civil cases:
Tried by the court	27
Tried by jury	19
Condemnation cases:
Tried by the court	9
Tried by jury	8
Criminal cases:
Tried by the court	0
Tried by jury	7
Total trials without and with jury	70

These figures clearly show that the judges have spent so little time in court that they have had ample opportunity to dispatch all their other duties. There is positively no need for an additional judge in this district.

The St. Louis Bar Association has now appointed a committee to investigate the condition of our docket. You will be advised of their report.

To correct an error that crept into the debate in the House, you are advised I became 64 years of age on March 9, 1941.

Very sincerely yours,

CHARLES B. DAVIS.

I, too, have a copy of the report of the special committee of the bar association, which was placed in the RECORD by my colleague from Missouri. I call attention of the House to the fact that the committee does not base its report upon the present need for an additional judge, except in the instance of the Cape Girardeau division, but it anticipates that by reason of the condemnation cases recently filed it will need another judge to dispose of them. Condemnation cases are largely administrative in character, and the judges have little to do with them except sign orders presented. This is shown by figures given in the letter from Judge Davis on May 13, and which letter shows that the 3 judges now at St. Louis have tried only 17 cases of this character during the past year. The time that the committee assumes will be necessary to try the cases now being filed is grossly exaggerated.

The committee admits that it has not made exhaustive study and defers in part to the attitude of the senior circuit judge and the administrative office. Evidently Judge Stone still feels that this additional judge is needed. However, since he approved this plan there has been a great decline in the ordinary civil and criminal cases. A recent report shows a decline of 250 cases filed for the June term, 1941, in the State circuit court at St. Louis as compared with the June term, 1940. This decline has been noticed all over the country.

In a letter received from Judge Davis, under date of June 16, 1941, he says:

The present condemnation program is no greater than that handled by the court for the past several years. We have condemned over 50,000 acres of wild lands in south Missouri; 30,000 acres in the Bird's Point—New Madrid floodway; the Swan Lake bird refuge in Chariton County; and thousands of acres of land in connection with the construction of the dams in the Mississippi River between St. Louis and the Iowa line. These undertakings have been substantially completed.

If the Congress sees fit to incur the expense of another judge in this district, and the judge's salary is only a part of that expense, there is no personal reason why I should oppose it, but I do regard it as unnecessary and ill-advised.

Thanking you for your interest in the matter, I am

Sincerely yours,

CHARLES B. DAVIS,
United States District Judge.

Mr. Speaker, I repeat what I said in the beginning. I cannot agree that the committee's report is an answer to those of us who believe that an additional judge in the eastern district of Missouri is not needed at this time. With a debt already, actual and contracted, of sixty-seven thousand million dollars, and a deficit that is growing greater every day, it is certainly time for the Congress to reduce all nondefense expenditures.

I am wondering, Mr. Speaker, whether the oft-repeated charge that this bill is designed to provide a place for the city counselor of the defeated and discredited Dickman machine, is not well-founded.

Efficiency of the Coast Guard

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SCHUYLER OTIS BLAND

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 20, 1941

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the efficiency of the Coast Guard, I wish to include an editorial which appeared on June 15, 1941, in the Daily Press, a newspaper published in Newport News, Va. The editorial is as follows:

The watchful eye of the United States Coast Guard upon the American shore line has created an enviable record of efficient service. Established in 1790, its functions have been greatly expanded to include many important duties to the country.

Few citizens of the United States actually appreciate the fact that every inch of the American coast line is patrolled. Constant observers are trained to detect law violation, to safeguard life, and to perform numerous duties contingent upon assuring safety and security upon the shores of our land and the waters contingent thereto. Speedy vessels now ply the coast with augmented powers of observation in the radio. But at the same time the patient watching from towers at 5-mile intervals on the coast of the United States goes on endlessly. Nothing comes or goes along the American coast line unobserved by these trained men, unless the conditions of the heavens preclude all possibility of human observation.

The eagle eye of the Coast Guard men ascertains facts completely oblivious to the unaccustomed observer. The romantic tales of their rescue of beleaguered vessels is a saga of their long service.

The Coast Guard has steadily grown, taking on many functions and being provided adequately with materials to carry on. In time of war, or in emergency such as the present, this branch of the military forces of the Nation is a highly important adjunct to the whole defense program.

Since observation is the keynote of their long services, the men of the branch round out adequately a protective function in scanning the skies as well as the waters for unfamiliar signs.

The silent, swift, gray craft which is so familiar a sight upon the lower James attests the service which is at hand. Under these adequate facilities for observation the American people have been accustomed to rely. And the performance of the Coast Guard is one of the most brilliant records of efficiency in American life.

Mr. Speaker, this editorial is accurate in every detail. It is truly said that—

The performance of the Coast Guard is one of the most brilliant records of efficiency in American life.

I wish our people knew more about the efficient record of the Coast Guard, its splendid, devoted, patriotic, unselfish service, fighting the elements, enforcing the law on the sea, policing flooded areas, relieving the sick and distressed wherever in suffering, peril, disaster, or affliction, defending humanity and the Nation at all times in time of war or peace.

"Semper paratus"—always prepared—is its motto, and it lives up to that motto every day in the year and every minute of the 24 hours in each day.

It is true, as the editorial states, that the romantic tales of their rescue of beleaguered vessels is a saga of long service. That record includes the work of the old Life Saving Service and the old Revenue Cutter Service, which were united in 1915 in the creation of the Coast Guard. That record also includes the brilliant and daring record of the old Lighthouse Service, which is a record of heroism unsurpassed, of lonely vigil, and of daring adventure. It has long been my hope that time might permit me to collect and relate those tales of heroism unsurpassed on any battlefield. If I should be unable to do that work, I know that those deeds of daring will not be permitted to be lost to posterity. They must not be forgotten. They are monuments to heroic service that time can never efface. To these men of unsurpassed valor may there be ever all honor and glory.

Report From Putnam County, Tenn.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. TOM STEWART

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, June 20 (legislative day of Tuesday, June 10), 1941

ARTICLE BY CHRISTINE SADLER

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to place in the RECORD a brief article which appeared on the front page of the Washington Post on Wednesday of this week. The article was written by Miss Christine Sadler, and reports experiences, and so forth, on a visit made to her home county, Putnam County, Tenn. I think the article will be found to be quite interesting, and I should like to have it placed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post of June 18, 1941]

NO SELECTEES — ALL VOLUNTEERS — REPORT FROM PUTNAM COUNTY—POST STAFF WRITER GOES HOME TO TENNESSEE AND WRITES A MEMO

MEMO TO EDITOR.—I went home—Silver Point, Putnam County, Tenn.—for my vacation. Our town is in the Cumberland foothills about 75 miles from Nashville.

Washington was a mad beehive when I left. National defense wasn't going right, it seemed. Some Members of Congress were on the point of apoplexy. Communists were pulling strikes. The boys covering the White House were jittery.

I wonder if you would like to know about Putnam County?

My mother and most of the other women in Putnam County are putting up red cherries right now. The wheat is yellow in the fields. School is out, and the kids are going barefoot.

The men are all busy. My guess is that they don't read the speeches some of our Senators have been making, because every man who can get in the Army has volunteered. There has been no selectee called from our county because the men didn't wait for that.

They say they always have volunteered when the country was in trouble, and it looks like trouble now, so why wait?

FARMERS BUILD CAMPS, POWDER PLANTS

There are about 1,500 people in our neighborhood, and about half of them are Republicans. Everybody says if the President needs more help they will do whatever he asks.

As fast as the farmers get their crops in they and the hands are getting out their hammers to help build Army camps and powder plants. Those with more skills start working on dams and aircraft factories. The new Vultee plant has opened at Nashville, and nearby Camp Forrest is booming.

The biggest piece of news in Silver Point this week was a first baby in the home of Alfred Gill, the postmaster, who is on leave with the National Guard at Camp Forrest. Alf was so excited when he came home for the week end he almost forgot to report he's been made a sergeant.

The boys in camp come home whenever they can, and their mothers bake all day getting ready for them. The neighbors all come in and sit for a while, and the boys who are not quite old enough to volunteer talk about their chances to fool the recruiting officers. Most of them are big enough to do it, because they grow them big down here. The boys are awfully proud of their shooting ability.

I went to the graduation exercises at Tennessee Polytechnic Institute—8 miles away—last Friday. Dr. D. F. Fleming came up from Vanderbilt University to address the 100 graduates. He said the boys had before them "a magnificent chance to complete the job we started in the World War." The parents nodded and applauded. The boys in the engineering group were excited about getting in the Army or in some defense engineering work. The girls were all talking about civil-service examinations and typing and nutrition work. Some of the boys were rushing off to complete work for their pilot's licenses. I came home feeling I wasn't doing as much as I could.

EVERYTHING STOPS FOR NEWS

When the noon news broadcast starts at Silver Point and the newspapers come, everything stops. If anybody's radio is broken he goes to the neighbors. The strikes make our folks mad. They say, "Communist" like they used to say, "Yankee." Silver Point was glad the troops were called out on the west coast.

I went to the schoolhouse Thursday to watch farmers' families make mattresses. They are made under the old surplus cotton plan which allows at least one mattress to each farm family with a cash income under $600 annually. The family pays 72 cents for the ticking. The mattresses are very good.

T. V. A. power lines are being rushed to outlying districts, provided contracts were made before the emergency. No new contracts are being made because of need for power for defense. Another dam is to be built on the Caney Fork River only a few miles away to bring all streams of this area in the T. V. A. power system.

When I read this over it sounds like quite a lot is going on in Silver Point and Putnam County, but no one is excited about anything.

Our folks just feel like the natural place for a young man is in the Army because they always have gone into the Army when the President called. The older men are glad to have work and are buying savings stamps. And the women are tending the kids, cooking for the menfolks and breaking their necks to please their sons when they come home from camp.

I thought you might like to know.

CHRISTINE SADLER.

Is America Arming the Axis?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN M. COFFEE

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 20, 1941

RADIO ADDRESS OF HON. JOHN M. COFFEE, OF WASHINGTON

Mr. COFFEE of Washington. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include herein a speech to be delivered by me over a national hook-up of the National Broadcasting Co. on Friday evening, June 20, in which I discuss shipments of war supplies from the United States to the Axis Powers or their affiliates.

In this address I allude to my House Concurrent Resolution 30 and give a condensed statement of reasons justifying favorable reporting of this bill by the House Committee on Rules.

The address follows:

The President has eloquently proclaimed that these United States are the arsenal of the democracies. The newspapers are full of solemn pronouncements that America has embarked upon a program of all-out aid to Britain. Whether one be an isolationist or interventionist, he generally may be found to be warmly sympathetic to Britain's cause. Congress has voted $7,000,000,000 in the lend-lease bill for aid to democracy. We are a generous nation. We have supplied Great Britain so far with 50 tankers. We have supplied the United Kingdom with more than 60 destroyers and a score of Coast Guard cutters. On public rostrum, in church pulpit, on college campus, in congressional halls, we have detailed in emotional language our affection for China and our fervent prayer that it defeat Japan.

LEAKS TO THE AXIS

But the cornucopia of plenty which we offer without stint to the democracies has sprung many leaks. A hundred gushing rivulets spurt to the aid of the dictators. The American people are becoming aroused at the spectacle of our exportation of war supplies to the Axis Powers and also to those countries subjugated by them, notwithstanding the above-mentioned devotion to democracy.

EMBARGOING MATÉRIEL OF WAR TO JAPAN

Some 3 years ago I introduced in the House of Representatives a bill to prohibit the exportation to Japan of munitions and matériel of war. Hearings were held on this measure before the House Committee on Foreign Affairs, but the committee declined to report the bill out favorably, notwithstanding the tremendous public support of the measure. I received thousands of messages from earnest citizens residing in every State in the Union passionately praying that my measure be enacted into law, but Congress declined to act. In the interim, bombs have dropped upon helpless Chinese women and children from airplanes propelled by American gasoline. During those sad and tragic years slumbering China has been devastated, her cities burned, her peoples attacked. We, more than any other country, are responsible for that carnage in that we have continued to ship war supplies to Japan and have purchased annually vast quantities of silk from them. Now the American people are aroused. They are determined upon action. They will brook no delay.

HOUSE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION NO. 30

There is now pending in the Congress of the United States, House Concurrent Resolution No. 30, which I have introduced and which is designed to reveal the unvarnished facts concerning this hypocritical business of arming the Axis when we are supposed to be the arsenal for democracy. This concurrent resolution was referred to the House Committee on Rules. That committee held three hearings on the measure, part of them behind closed doors, but so far it has declined to send the bill to the House floor for action. Let me cite you a pertinent section of that resolution. I quote: "It shall be the duty of the committee to make a full and complete investigation with respect to the character of, and the extent to which, the so-called Axis Powers or countries aiding the Axis Powers (a) are obtaining, or have obtained, essential war materials, money, credit, intelligence, or other aid, directly or indirectly, from the United States; and (b) are hindering, or have hindered, the national-defense program of the United States." The resolution provides that such a committee shall report to Congress, and thus to the American people, at the earliest practicable time the results of its investigation, together with its recommendation for remedial legislation. The resolution then sets up the machinery for accomplishing its objective and provides for a modest appropriation to implement its work.

NEWSPAPER EDITORS ARE AROUSED

Senator GUY GILLETTE, of Iowa, has introduced a similar resolution in the Senate, which was reported out favorably by the Senate Committee on Commerce and is now awaiting action before the Senate. This committee will not be organized, however, until the House passes my companion resolution. But two main reasons can be assigned as the excuse for the sale of war supplies to the Axis and their satellites. One is private profit, which I contend is profit at the expense of America's best interests and welfare; the other reason would be appeasement of the aggressor, a policy of propitiation of the dictatorships which proved futile, disastrous, if not suicidal when practiced by such countries as Belgium, Czechoslovakia, and Holland. Newspapers throughout the country have editorially decried this illogical and inconsistent procedure. Radio commentators have unhesitatingly condemned it. Magazines are replete with articles inveighing against it. Let me quote from a recent editorial appearing in the South Bend (Ind.) Tribune:

"The United States is selling oil and oil products directly to Japan. The Japanese are sending some oil and oil products to Nazi Germany. If it were only a matter of ordinary foreign trade, the American people might think little of it, but the United States has just acquired a national-defense oil dictator, and we are now warned of impending gasolineless Sundays, and reduction in quotas for oil for heating and fuel purposes is now threatened. Is Uncle Sam growing another set of goat horns?" The Cincinnati Times Star, referring to the shortage of gasoline here and the threatened limitations on its use, said:

"The American people will submit willingly to any measures necessary to the national defense. But they will first want to be satisfied that sacrifices on their part are the only reasonable way out of the dilemma. They don't want to be the victims of another ill-planned crusade."

The Galveston News said on June 6:

"Many Americans think it is unwise to sell war materials to countries with which we soon may be at war. Washington and London apparently have agreed, however, that it is better to keep on supplying Japan with oil than to goad that country to further aggression by shutting off supplies. If it is true that an oil embargo is the only thing which would cause Japan to risk war with the United States, this is a profitable form of appeasement. But experience discredits appeasement as a general policy, and there is reason to fear that it will prove to be mistaken in this case."

The Miami (Fla.) Herald, in speaking of limitations on gasoline consumption for the American people, editorializes as follows:

"They just can't believe it, can't understand it, when Japan doesn't find it hard to get the American gasoline she wants."

A CHINESE INTELLECTUAL IS PUZZLED

Dr. Lin YuTang, eminent Chinese, declared that "we Chinese can't understand logic as applied in the United States." He said, "You sent gunboats to shoot Chinese on the shores of the Yangtse-Kiang, then sent missionaries to ease their souls into heaven. You loan us money to stabilize our currency, and help our defense against the Japanese, while you supply the Japs with matériel of war to be used against us."

DEPARTMENTS CEASE DISCLOSING EXPORT ITEMS

The publicity in connection with the pendency of my resolution has caused Government departments to cease making available figures of American export. On May 29 the Department of Commerce decided "to cease publishing detailed statistics concerning the country of destination of our exports." What caused this sudden suspension of statistics? Can it be that these figures were revealing too much of our trade with the Axis? Certainly suspension of such figures hides nothing from the Axis, because these countries know what they receive. Americans alone are thus kept in the dark.

The Maritime Commission decided likewise to place a black-out upon figures concerning its operations. On June 14 it declared that "American-owned or controlled tankers are not carrying oil directly or indirectly to Germany, Italy, or Japan." At the same time the Maritime Commission lists a total of 214 tankers owned or controlled by American companies flying foreign flags. Although it is stated most of these tankers are engaged in Western Hemisphere trade and in commerce to the United Kingdom and the Dutch East Indies, nothing is said about cargoes to third parties on the West African coast and to third parties the world over. The other day the Wall Street Journal pointed out that Great Britain had more than 500 oil tankers in addition to the 50 transferred to it by us.

OUR OIL FLOWS TO JAPAN

Just what have we been shipping to the Axis and their affiliates? The United States has sold to Japan 25,000,000 barrels of oil per year for the past 3 years. On July 31 an Executive order was issued that "in the interests of the national defense, the export of aviation gasoline is being limited to nations of the Western Hemisphere," but we find that, notwithstanding this, licenses were granted in August of 1940 for several hundred thousand gallons of aviation gasoline and in September for 4,832,000 gallons, and in the last 3 months of the year for 800,000 gallons, all of aviation gasoline. We have increased our shipments of petroleum to Japan since the first of the year The total approximates an amazing amount.

On June 9, two tankers, the San Luis Maru and the Kuro Shiro Maru, took on 175,000 barrels of petroleum at San Francisco with Federal permission. The Japanese steamer, Tonan Maru, at the same time, loaded at Los Angeles 8,000,000 gallons for Japan. This latter ship, says the Japan-California Daily News, in its June 5 issue, "Is one of the 91 Japanese ships which was blacklisted by the British for failure to cooperate in their war against the Axis. The vessel will not be given port courtesy in British ports, nor will she be allowed to fuel there." What do you think of this choice item?

OTHER WAR MATERIALS REACH NIPPON

Early in May, it was officially announced that one American and one British oil company entered into an agreement with the Japanese Government for the purchase from the Dutch East Indies fields of 1,800,000 tons of petroleum during the ensuing year which is 350 percent increase over the amount of petroleum sold by the same companies during the preceding year to Japan. Mr. William Farish, of Standard of New Jersey, claims this arrangement was made with full knowledge and consent of our State Department. During 1940 the United States exported to Japan 51,000,000 pounds of rubber scrap; 7,600 trucks; 32,300 pounds of gum rosin; 535,000 bales of cotton; 96,000 tons of wood pulp; 10,700,000 pounds of artificial abrasives; 254,091,000 pounds of steel bars and rods; 367,000,000 pounds of scrap steel, sheets, rods, and tin plate; 241,000,000 pounds of scrap and refined copper; 28,000,000 pounds of zinc; 3,700,000 pounds of nickel and Monel metal; 23,271,000 pounds of borax; 17,663,000 pounds of carbon black. In practically every case I have cited, the figures show an enormous increase in exports of this material of war over preceding years.

FINLAND IMPORTS WAR SUPPLIES FROM UNITED STATES

Finland is just across the Baltic from Germany. We exported to Finland 17,602,000 pounds of lard in 1940 which is more than 20 times the amount of this item, necessary to a war program, which we exported to Finland in 1939 when it was fighting the Soviet Union. Most of this lard goes to Germany, which is notoriously short of fats. We exported 4,254,000 pounds of tin and tin plate to Finland in 1940, over three times the amount we exported in 1939. The same proportion obtains in motortrucks: 3,114 in 1940 as contrasted with 573 in 1939.

PORTUGAL AND SPAIN LIKEWISE

Portugal does a brisk business with Italy and Germany. Besides shipping her 1,000,000 barrels of petroleum in 1940, we exported 700 motortrucks, and 35,000,000 pounds of tin plate. These products readily found their way into the hands of the Axis nations.

Spain enjoyed a nice trade with the United States in 1940, receiving four and one-half million barrels of petroleum products, over 7,000,000 pounds of paper stock, and two and one-half million bales of cotton, which is 15 times the amount we sold Spain in 1939. A significant item is that we sold Spain three and one-half times the amount of tin in 1940 as compared to 1939, the amount being 20,346,000 pounds. In 1940 Uncle Sam shipped to Spain 1,574,000 pounds of toluene, also known as toluol. This is the base of TNT, the dread explosive. Significantly, Spain purchased none of this from our country in 1938 or 1939. Scrap copper was generously provided Spain in 1940 to the tune of over 2,000,000 pounds. Where does it go? I'll give you two guesses, and your answer is correct both times.

OTHER FORMS OF COLLABORATION

It is not only in the field of exports of war materials, a few startling items of which I have just cited to you, by means of which we are aiding the Axis, but in the field of international corporate relationships and patent pools and contracts, we run into a prolific source of revenue for the Axis. Patent royalties provide foreign exchange and dollar credits for the Nazis and the Fascists, if not now directly in our own country, then through the medium of intermediate individuals in other countries.

American companies are parties in partnership with German, Italian, and Japanese companies in insurance and trade cartels, in shipping and financial agreements. In South America, agents for leading American companies are among the most prominent figures in bund and pro-Nazi organizations.

In the purchase of gold, we have been a generous friend to the Axis and its cohorts. During the years 1939 and 1940, our Government purchased more than $280,000,000 worth of gold from Japan alone, not to mention the millions purchased from the Argentine, Brazil, and other countries friendly with the Axis. Argentina has sold us more gold than she actually produces. Where does this gold originate? Old gold can be remelted to appear as freshly mined. Certainly we should know that when a nation sells us more gold than is mined within her territorial confines, this supply is obtained from an outside source.

TANKERS

In recent weeks, the American people have been repeatedly admonished to conserve on their use of gasoline and fuel oil, yet tankers owned by American companies are still transporting petroleum in foreign trade. Only this week, a Japanese tanker was about to load a vast supply of petroleum at Philadelphia, when stopped by Mr. Ickes. It seems ludicrous that there should be a shortage of petroleum in the United States wher we are limiting production at the wells under State proration laws; when we are exporting millions of barrels of oil, monthly; when we have a tariff upon the importation of oil, thus discouraging its coming in. On the Atlantic seaboard, there is in storage 60,000,000 barrels of petroleum. This could be tapped at the rate of 200,000 barrels a day, which is the amount of the shortage created by the transfer of tankers to Great Britain, which tankers formerly transported the oil from Gulf ports to the Atlantic seaboard.

APPEASEMENT OF JAPAN CONDEMNED

We are told that we must propitiate the Japanese aggressor, and we must not offend him lest he engage in war with us forthwith. I make bold to reply that the Japanese respect the American Fleet in the Pacific, and will not move while our ships remain there. This country, through its public officials, has deplored acts of appeasement attributed to our unfortunate friends in Europe who subsequently succumbed to the invader.

It seems to me I recall an affair called Munich, in which Neville Chamberlain sought to quiet Germany by dismembering little Czechoslovakia and gave Sudetenland to Der Fuehrer. That was appeasement, but Mr. Hitler only paused and soon moved on his way. But the worst feature of the whole policy is its inconsistency, its lack of rationality. How can we say we believe in quarantining aggressors in Europe while appeasing the aggressor in the Orient? The American people want to know whether it is profit or foreign policy which dictates this course, or both. They are clamoring for action. If you feel that something should be done now, let your feelings be known in those places where the expression of your convictions will be most effective. Our people want Congress to get at the facts and take courageous steps to eliminate methods by which our beloved country may in a sense be charged with arming the Axis.

After World War I congressional committees investigated such double dealing, racketeering, and sale of munitions to the enemy and similar questionable war practices. But the facts were disclosed too late for any effective good to be accomplished. These committees revealed that certain American companies were guilty of putting profit above patriotism, but the damage had already been done.

LET'S DO SOMETHING ABOUT IT

What, then, are we to do? Sit here and permit this double dealing? Or are we to stop it? I for one want to know who these economic traitors are, what they are doing, and how we can stop them. I dare say that the Axis Powers would not be where they are today had this investigation been made a year ago. And I dare say that an investigation now may lead to measures which might shorten this war by several years. Indeed, it might result in changing the entire outcome. On the other hand, an apathetic attitude toward the double-dealing situations which now exist may lead to disaster. By House Concurrent Resolution 30 I propose that we lock the barn before the horse has been stolen. Let your voice be heard. Support me in this effort to save America from further guilt in the nefarious policy of arming the Axis.

Ordeal of American Air Power

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANK C. OSMERS, JR.

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 20, 1941

ARTICLE BY MAJ. ALEXANDER P. DE SEVERSKY

Mr. OSMERS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Maj. Alexander P. de Seversky, from the American Mercury for July 1941:

[From the American Mercury of July 1941]

ORDEAL OF AMERICAN AIR POWER

(By Maj. Alexander P. de Seversky)

The American people, watching the exploits of military aviation in the present war, know instinctively what their generals and admirals have been slow to understand and to acknowledge—that for our country the choice is between genuine air power second to none and the danger of humiliating defeat. They sense that the Army and the Navy, no matter how big and strong they become, will be helpless unless we give them an impregnable roof of air power under which to operate.

Unlike the professional military men at the higher levels of authority, the ordinary American is under no psychological pressure to provide alibis for the older services. Having nothing to unlearn, he observes the course of the struggle with an open mind, from the angle of common sense. He sees the Royal Air Force holding off Germany's might, month after month, in an all-air conflict, while naval and ground forces merely look on. He sees Crete captured by air forces in the face of overwhelming naval superiority; the world's greatest navy unable to approach Europe because it is ringed with aircraft; Britain, despite the heroic efforts of its magnificent fleet, being slowly strangled by long-range aerial attacks on its shipping. These and other facts point, in common sense, the inexorable moral that air power has emerged as the primary instrument of national defense—the precondition for all other means of defense.

The American people, in addition, are realizing more sharply that the world crisis caught us with our aviation defenses down. Not simply as to quantity—that can be explained by the complacent national mood and insufficient appropriations—but as to quality, for which there is no acceptable excuse. If we possessed only one sample of every type of aircraft, it should have been the best of its kind at that stage. Even by merely imitating other nations we could have been farther advanced. The country at large is learning with a shock what aeronautical people have known all along: that the United States has been dismally backward in military aviation. Modern flying was born and nurtured in America, and in the commercial field our aviation is without peer; but the military development of air power has been left to other countries. The American people should ask: Why? Who? What's being done about it?

Those whose military orthodoxy or commitments to business and politics caused our backwardness naturally tend to slur over defects and to resent public questioning. They prefer the self-delusion that existed in the past. In October 1939 a magazine told its millions of readers—clearly on the basis of information from high official quarters—that "our own war birds are best" and that our aviation "offered a reassuring picture." This when we possessed not a single pursuit plane that could match the German or British pursuits, when our most ballyhooed bomber carried less armor and armament than a single-seater Nazi or R. A. F. fighter. Only some weeks ago a high-ranking air corps general, speaking in Washington, demanded a sort of moratorium on criticism of our aviation setup, exclaiming:

"I have no patience with those uninformed and misguided croakers who look with thick-lensed glasses for indications that the Air Corps is helpless, that the Air Corps is not properly trained or equipped—cannot be made ready to fight—and is being furnished with planes inferior to those of England or Germany."

All he overlooked was that the planes are inferior.

The progress of the war made the fact that we were aeronautically behind the eight ball too obvious to be ignored. Whereupon those chiefly responsible pretended to be surprised. They said, in effect, that the war had disclosed shortcomings which they had not suspected and that they were working hard to make up for the lost years. They made statements to confuse the issue; they staged misleading "sham battles" to retrieve the reputation of discredited equipment, and otherwise showed more zeal in saving face than in saving our national security.

Business-as-usual and politics-as-usual prevailed, and still prevail, when the clear need was to seek out the causes of the backwardness, and the culprits responsible for it, and to eliminate them with relentless vigor. This is scarcely to be wondered at, human nature being what it is. Real house cleaning and renovation of our military aviation structure would mean far-reaching changes in personnel at the top. It would mean revolutionary reorganization in terms of independent air power, which would cut cruelly into bureaucratic inertia and privilege. Above all, it would expose lack of vision, incompetence, and conniving.

II

A courageous young newspaperman, J. Reagan "Tex" McCrary, of the New York Mirror, flew to England this April to learn how American airplanes were behaving under stress of actual warfare. He brought back startling news—startling, that is, to laymen, but a thrice-told tale to aviation men. The great majority of American aircraft in the British Isles, he reported, were being held "in reserve," because they were useless for practical operations against the Nazis:

"Most shocking is this fact: the backbone of the United States air force is our Curtiss P–40, Allison-powered fighter. America has sent some 570 P–40's to Britain, where they have been christened with a good American name, Tomahawks. Of these 570 Tomahawks only 18 were 'operational' in service when I left. The others were in dead storage 'somewhere in England.' "

Why were these planes being kept on ice despite Britain's life-and-death need for aircraft? The principal reason, Mr. McCrary learned, was that they were "underarmed and underarmored"; they were rated obsolete on arrival.

Mr. McCrary's findings were based on personal observation and off-record data made accessible to him. Perhaps the Britons, obliged by obvious political considerations to keep quiet, did not mind a chance to convey the truth through nonofficial American channels. In any case, the report has not been successfully challenged. In substance, it corroborated earlier information brought back by Ralph Ingersoll, editor of the New York PM. Indicating that American planes were useful to Britain in various secondary capacities, Mr. Ingersoll reported that they were unable to fight alongside the R. A. F. against Hitler's aviation. The American fighters, he showed with chapter and verse, were deficient in armor and fire power; the best American bombers were woefully lacking in the means of self-defense against attacking planes.

The inevitable denials of these facts amount, actually, to left-handed confirmation, since they are always coupled with the promise to catch up at some future time. Thus the general whom I have quoted above wound up his attack on critics by boasting that "we will have an air force in time * * * it's well on its way and will be ready when called upon." A clear admission that we haven't one now. Unfortunately the world will not stand still waiting for him. By the time we catch up others will have gone far ahead; nor shall we be notified in time by the enemy so that we can make ready. Such postponement leaves the American people to infer that the trouble has only now been discovered and is being rapidly remedied. But the alibi does not stand up. American aviation stands accused of failure to supply effective armor, fire power, range, speed. Not a single item in the indictment comes as a surprise—it was all known to the aviation world before the war started.

German and British types of fighting craft had been exhibited, described, discussed, and studied in close-up by American experts. Our official representatives abroad were keeping Washington apprised of new aerial developments. The many able and brilliant men in our military air services pleaded for action. More than that, American designers and manufacturers had long been begging for the privilege of building equipment as good as any in Europe, or even better. They were unable to break through the solid walls of indifference, prejudiced opposition to the aviation upstart, and too often, also, influences that put business and politics first.

Since I have access only to my own files, I am obliged to draw on those for confirmation. But I have no doubt that other manufacturers and designers of aircraft could tell similar tales. A series of letters at hand as I write attests that I pleaded with the Office of the Chief of Air Corps years ago for heavier armor, greater fire power, longer range, greater speed—in short, the very things in which we are now trying to "catch up."

In April 1938 I submitted two fighter designs that carried up to six guns and one cannon, as well as heavy armor. Two months later I wrote, urging improvement of the Army's Seversky P–35 fighter:

"The next modification we propose is to equip these airplanes with new outboard panels, each containing one .30 caliber machine gun and an additional gas tank of 75-gallon capacity. The first will double the fire power and the second will provide a range making possible the concentration of the pursuit aviation from coast to coast, without stop."

Earlier, I had given urgent reasons for raising performance of pursuits:

"The present employment of air power in Europe and the Orient has definitely shown the necessity for some sort of convoying protective force for bombardment aviation. Whether such airplanes should be single-place, two-place, or multi-place; whether they should be single- or multi-motored; what their actual range should be, can be determined only through actual test."

Besides reducing such suggestions to writing, I expounded them personally. But always they were brushed aside as "visionary," and—as one communication from the War Department put it—not worth the extra cost. Yet the same general who blocked improvements has just written a book in which he admits the shortcomings of American convoying pursuits. "They have been too slow and not sufficiently maneuverable," he writes, adding: "The aeronautical engineers are now working frantically to remedy these defects." Thus he implies that it was an act of God rather than his department's blindness that caused us to lag in the race. Engineers would not have to work frantically now if there had been more competence and less complacency 3 years ago. Had it not been for such officials, more concerned with the cross-currents of Army politics than with guaranteeing effective air power, American pursuits would not now be rotting unpacked in England.

All insiders know that the inferiority of our pursuit aviation is attributable mainly to the Army's engine policy. For many years the liquid-cooled plane engine had been ignored; but suddenly, when the Air Corps acquired a new chief, it swung to the other extreme. For reasons still obscure the Air Corps became obsessed with that engine, automatically rejecting all others. Regardless of the merits of the engine, even a layman could see that reliance on a single type of engine and a single source of supply was foolhardy. But no pursuit model could cross the Army threshold unless it was built around the particular model of liquid-cooled engine on which all hopes had been mysteriously pinned. On June 24, 1938, I warned the Air Corps of the danger involved:

"The function of a pursuit and interceptor fighter in our scheme of national defense is too important to rely on only one type of equipment, since, should it fail for any reason, the country would be completely deprived of this type of aerial defense. Therefore * * * it is highly desirable to conduct parallel experiments with pursuit airplanes built around air-cooled engines of maximum horsepower available."

And, indeed, the favored engine did not live up to expectations. The Army has now been forced, years too late, to take on also the air-cooled engine. The very company which was deprived of orders because it could not accept an arbitrary decree in this matter is now swamped with orders. The Air Corps now boasts of its new P–47–B pursuit, built around a 2,000-horsepower air-cooled engine. The publicity conveys that this is something new, pulled out of a magician's hat in these last months. The truth is that essentially the same design was laid before the Chief of Air Corps in 1938 and was not even considered because it did not have the pet engine. Meanwhile valuable years have been lost. The 1938 pursuit was suppressed until 1941, when emergency and the inadequacy of the liquid-cooled engine forced action. It cannot be delivered in appreciable quantities until the end of 1942, when it could have been fighting for England in 1940.

We could go on detailing the proofs that political considerations, business-as-usual, and ordinary failure to grasp the meaning of real air power are responsible for our current plight. Production continues today on models that will never see combat, because they became obsolete years ago. To stop production would be a public confession of past blindness. It will be less embarrassing to keep things going until the improved "catch-up" designs are produced, after which the outdated models can be explained away as legitimately obsolete, instead of admitting official blunders.

Right down the line the temptation to conceal past mistakes acts as a brake on air power equipment. Private arrangements, compromises to placate some "brass hats," indifference to aviation progress because of lack of understanding—all these and more are skeletons in the closet. As long as the men and the system responsible for the skeletons are unchanged, there can be no real hope of world leadership in the air.

III

In the higher reaches of our military service the idea of an independent air force has never been regarded as a matter for discussion. It has simply been treated as insubordination and squelched by main force. The martyrdom of Gen. William Mitchell was accomplished publicly and demonstratively in order to warn other "rebels." The intimidation has in large measure been successful. Nevertheless there are other "General Mitchells" today, kept down, "exiled" to distant posts, or forced out because they demand the emancipation of air power. The American people should understand that the heat on both sides of the controversy is not artificial. This is not a dispute over division of authority but a basic question of organization that goes straight to the heart of our defense program.

It is no accident that complacent or short-sighted men, aeronautically speaking, have tended to reach the top. The set-up makes it almost inevitable. The officer, convinced of the paramount role of air power, who defends his views, steps on tender political toes. There are too many old-fashioned admirals and generals in the path, whose distrust of the aviation intruder must be placated. Only an officer with a happy talent for handshaking and backslapping normally rises to high authority; and that sort of political-minded personality rarely goes with military and aviation genius. Nor is his job to be envied; he is caught between the realities of air power and the pressure of aviation personnel for better equipment, on one side, and the orthodoxies of the older services on the other.

Under independent air power, autonomous in its field and not obliged to play politics or take dictation from other services, men of audacious vision and creative understanding of the problems would have come to the top. Blunders and compromises to meet outmoded military ideas, such as we have sampled above, would not have occurred. The immense amount of talent and skill represented by our flying officers would have had an opportunity for unimpeded service.

True air power must function in its own element—the air ocean that envelops the globe. It is a single and continuous element, calling for a single and continuous air command. Before we can hope to achieve freedom of the seas, under the new conditions, we must achieve freedom of the skies; and for that we need a single agency vested with the full job.

To divide aviation into two artificial portions, Army aviation and Navy aviation, as we are now doing, is to court disaster. It violates the first principle of military science. Just suppose we had two navies, as we now have two aviations—a navy under the command of the Army and another under the command of the marines. Arbitrarily splitting the skies into two segments is no less ludicrous. (Under any arrangement, coordination of the air force with the Army and the Navy through a supreme command must be taken for granted, just as we now have coordination between Army and Navy.) Each of the segments, in turn, is limited in its growth by the needs of the particular service to which it is indentured. No matter how efficient it becomes, it cannot escape the limitations of the special mentality and strategy of that service. Aircraft employed in common tactical action with the Army or the Navy should, of course, be under their direct command, like their other weapons. But that has nothing to do with true air power, whose job is to maintain freedom of the skies beyond the reach of the older services.

The aviation personnel at large, in both segments, is aware of these restraints on air power and chafes under them. No finer body of men has ever been assembled anywhere in the world. These are the men who have to fly and to die in our aircraft, whether over land or over sea. Anything that limits the full expansion of those aircraft, and of air-power strategy, is a direct blow at their morale. The most stimulating thing that the President could do to lift that morale sky-high would be to follow the example of England and clean house at once at the top, not in our tactical units but among those who were responsible for procurement before the present emergency. Our aviation personnel will always remain suspicious of the men and the conditions responsible for the backward state of their air services.

The establishment of a separate air department would fire the enthusiasm and the creative vision of our air-minded youth, our designers, our builders. By guaranteeing a roof of true air power for their operations, it would also imbue the Army and the Navy with new confidence and vitality. And the time to do it is now. To say that it is necessary but "too late" is nonsensical. The change is inevitable—the longer we delay the more costly and disturbing it will be. Existent aerial equipment is being outlived so swiftly that, insofar as our ultimate air power second to none is concerned, we are starting at scratch with all potential enemies. But their air power starts without the impediment of outside control, while ours is split in two and harnessed to other and slower services.

The only question is whether we shall put our aviation house in order now or wait until we are forced to do so by looming disasters.

Those of us who see the handwriting in the skies know that what we ask for cuts across the bureaucratic habits and comforts of a generation. But we know, also, that the change must be made if we are to survive in this aviation age. America has the brains, the men, the materials to take first place in the air. It cannot do so until air power is recognized as a primary service rather than an auxiliary and adjunct of older weapons, and divorced from the Army and Navy commands.

There can be no genuine solution, but only a vicious circle of correcting blunders in the light of other nations' superiority, like a dog chasing its tail, until aviation is cleansed of those who share responsibility for its backwardness and those laboring under past commitments to business or politics; until it is freed from Army and Navy overlordship, so that true aviation leaders can come to the fore and work unhampered to give America mastery of the skies.

EDITORIAL FROM THE ALEXANDRIA (LA.) DAILY TOWN TALK

Mr. ALLEN of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, in connection with my bill, H. R. 4861, to promote the national defense by detaining undesirable aliens and by preventing other such undesirables from coming here during the present emergency I insert in the RECORD the following editorial from the Daily Town Talk, Alexandria, La., under date of June 12, 1941:

[From the Alexandria (La.) Daily Town Talk of June 12, 1941]

CONGRESSMAN ALLEN COMMENDED

Representative A. LEONARD ALLEN demonstrated his pure patriotism and his genuine love for the country of his birth when he introduced and supported H. R. 4861 in the National Congress

The bill provides that the Secretary of State be compelled to refuse admission to this country of Nazis, Fascists, Communists, or those who advocate similar principles. It provides that all foreigners who visit the United States must guarantee their departure within certain limits. It provides for the cancelation of citizenship of any naturalized citizen who obtained his citizenship through fraud.

The bill limits the quotas of immigration from each country to one-third of the existing quotas, with the provision that during the next 5 years only quota immigrants having fathers, mothers, or minor children in this country may be admitted, and the measure provides for the detention and deportation of certain aliens in this country.

The bill should become a law just as quickly as it can be passed. For too long a time have the gates of the United States been open to what might be called the riff-raff and the half-crazed theorists of other nations. There are men in this Nation today who have been here for years devoting their entire energy to promoting strikes and advocating communism and socialism—they have no citizenship standing of any sort, yet they are permitted to remain upon one excuse or another.

Thousands of aliens enter this country through Mexico, and on the Pacific coast, slipping in at night. It is alleged that there are men who make a living by aiding these imposters to enter. The price for getting the aliens safely in the United States is said to run from $50 to $100 per person.

This Nation has reached the stage where it should be for Americans only, and immigration of all sorts should be restricted. There should be assurance that anyone admitted for possible citizenship should become a good American. Restricting immigration to those who already have near relatives here is an excellent feature.

Yesterday the police jury of Rapides Parish passed a resolution favoring the Allen bill. It is endorsed by the American Legion and other patriotic organizations, and a person who does not favor it cannot possibly bear true Americanism in his heart.

Let us hope that the bill becomes a law in the very shortest space of time possible and that it be enforced to the limit of the law.

The St. Lawrence Seaway Project

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. E. HAROLD CLUETT

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 20, 1941

Mr. CLUETT. Mr. Speaker, for more than 30 years the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence seaway and power project has been under consideration by the Governments of Canada and the United States. Investigations by commissions, planning boards, reports by Army engineers, and endless technical reports have filled volumes and the throats of proponents and opponents until it is about time to appoint another commission to weed out the facts and untruths in this voluminous dictionary of propaganda and speculation; and now at one of the most critical periods in our history another political white rabbit is pulled out of the administration hat and wrapped up in H. R. 4927 for an overworked and overheated Congress to dissect and digest. It is not my purpose today to even attempt to unfold all the mysteries and intricacies contained in this legislation. I am certain it would take weeks of the time of every Member of this House to judge accurately of the merits and demerits of this scheme; but under political pressure, and under the guise of national defense, and as an agreement, and not a treaty, a few days may be all that is necessary to see to it that this Congress yields to the magic wand of the White House.

I beg to recommend to each Member of this House the careful reading of a booklet entitled "The St. Lawrence Seaway Project," published by the Niagara Frontier Planning Board, 1940; also Executive Report No. 1, of the second session of the Seventy-second Congress, 1932–33. The majority and minority views concerning this project are thoroughly discussed. I am today, 7 years after this report was published, thoroughly in accord with the minority statement very ably presented by the then junior Senator from New York. It may be well to remember also that he was and is a Democrat, and rather inclined to follow most New Deal principles, and is also author of a labor act which I am as heartily opposed to as I am in favor of his able findings as a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations in the Senate opposing this St. Lawrence project. In case my appeal to you to read his entire report may go unheeded, may I quote a few very interesting and impressive paragraphs, admitting that these statements were not made during a national emergency, but with firm belief that such an emergency would not now change his conclusions. Senator WAGNER will soon have an opportunity to decide the correctness of this statement. Here are some of his pertinent expressions:

The single issue that everyone wants to face is: Will the cost of the St. Lawrence project to the people of the United States as a whole be more than the foreseeable return to these people? I am convinced that the project is demonstrably unsound and solicit a careful reconsideration of the treaty and its surrounding problems.

Again I quote:

Interest charges during the contemplated 8 years of construction have been neglected.

Please note his 8-year period of construction, with the 4-year period or less of the President.

I believe the true element as well as the cost has been grossly underestimated. As to the latter, please note, of the five largest canal projects in history that the actual cost exceeded the estimated cost by over $400,000,000. Does anyone seriously believe that this St. Lawrence seaway can be completed for a billion and a quarter or even two billions, more than half of which will be borne by the United States, and an annual fixed charge to our taxpayers forever? Eight years ago the cost of this proposal for the State of New York was $89,726,000. In section 2 of the present bill this cost has risen to $93,375,000, or an increase of over three and one-half million dollars. I admit just a trifle, but an indication of what may be expected from the entire project. I believe the Power Authority of the State of New York will wish to scrutinize rather carefully this item, especially when the proposed power can hardly be transmitted economically from its source more than 150 miles.

It was a strange coincidence that on the very day, June 6, when the President recommended authorization of construction of the St. Lawrence seaway and power project, the House appropriation group made a plea for $92,000,000 for coastal guns. Which appropriation do you prefer, or do you wish both? Or, is one more important now in the interest of national defense? If any benefit is to be derived from the electric energy generated at the International Rapids, certainly New York State should be interested.

All indications point to the fact that New York State as a whole is opposed to this measure. Even though its benefits are vague and uncertain I doubt if she would oppose it if all the country could join with her and be convinced of its national benefits. In this connection may I refer you to a very able statement entitled, "What the seaway means to New York and the United States," which will be found in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page A2837. This article shows conclusively that not only would the New York area be adversely affected in transportation costs, but the entire country, if this seaway project were approved. To this strong opposition may be added that of the New York Power Authority, who by resolution on June 5, last, stated:

> The cost of this seaway is not justified by any national benefit to commerce or defense, and it is potentially dangerous to commerce, industry, and employment in New York.

The Governor of New York, in his usual New Dealian style promptly vetoed this resolution.

It is not very surprising that this fantastic scheme has had a stormy career all through these years. We are not yet convinced that Canadian statesmen and the Canadian people themselves wish to see this agreement ratified. Has all the push and pull come from the administration itself to carry out some campaign pledge to the people of the Great Lakes region? Who wants this plan put into effect? Just who are behind it and for what real purpose? To read the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD one would believe it had few proponents, or are they lining up with their artillery to blast away at the final assault. When the final vote was taken in the Senate, March 14, 1934, just what States joined with New York in opposition?—Illinois, Missouri, Iowa, Kansas, and 22 other States. Certainly the four large Midwestern grain producing States did not seem to worry about getting their grain cheaply to foreign ports, nor were they intensely interested in paying for electric energy they never would receive. I cannot believe they would be fooled today by the cry of national emergency.

The administration has hardly forgotten this rebuke to their supposedly well-laid plans, and now an agreement instead of a treaty has been smuggled into the scheme of things. Is this constitutional, or does fear of the Supreme Court no longer exist? At any rate public opinion does not take kindly to this sort of legerdemain, and resents it. The American people are not easily fooled all the time.

As we enter this debate it will be interesting and important to know Canada's attitude. Certainly they are not interested in our political pledges, or, indeed, in all the many advantages which will supposedly accrue to the United States of America. They are engaged, as we are, in a vast military operation calling upon all their manpower and resources in defense of the British Empire. Can they or we step aside for one moment to undertake a vast enterprise which will call directly and indirectly for the services of an army of laborers, technicians, engineers needed so desperately on both sides of the international border, not to speak of the tons of material of every description which must be employed?

Let me quote from a New York Times editorial of June 7 last:

> In his special message to Congress the President again insists that the St. Lawrence project must be carried out as an urgent defense measure. Even if he is right in his highly doubtful assumption that the work can be done in 4 years or less, we are confronted with the prospect of a vast diversion of manpower and materials needed in carrying out the defense program. In the International Rapids section alone about 92,000,000 tons of dirt and rock must be excavated; over 7,000,000 tons of concrete must be made and poured; enormous amounts of earth-fill, steel, and other material will be required, not to mention machinery difficult to find. Engineers have estimated that if 7 years were allowed for the work a force of 43,000 men would be steadily engaged and that about 17,000 more would be needed during the peak period. This army would have to be doubled if the project is actually to be completed in 4 years or less. Canada must help in this effort, and Canada, even less than we, can ill afford to sidetrack labor now employed in producing munitions and other products for which Great Britain is crying.
> The President again stresses our need of power. But it has been pointed out time and time again that we can build highly efficient steam plants at strategic points far more rapidly and cheaply than we can develop St. Lawrence power. Much is also made in the message of the advisability of transferring a large portion of the long-term naval program to Great Lakes shipyards. But this in turn implies an adequate depth of water at the yards. Harbors on the Great Lakes would have to be deepened. And considering the financial state of most municipalities the Federal Government would have to undertake this work, divert more labor and material and raise the estimated cost of the St. Lawrence project by a probable $200,000,000.
> The more this St. Lawrence project is studied, the more it is to be hoped that Congress will not be stampeded into giving the President his way. There should be a careful weighing of the engineering, financial, military, and industrial facts before action is taken.

And, again, let me quote from an editorial of the Baltimore Sun of June 7, last:

> Congress will also have to look into the possibilities of steam generation of electrical energy. This country expects to get 1,100,000 horsepower as its share of the St. Lawrence project. The President himself admits that the project will take 4 years at most, with the possibility of shortening the time a little under forced draft. But steam plants to supply the same amount of energy can be built in about 18 months. They can be built where the industrial need develops, which will obviate the need of carrying the industrial load to the point where hydroelectric power has to be developed. And they can be built at just about half the cost of the St. Lawrence power project.

Before we cast our votes for or against this proposal, let us consider a few of the more pertinent facts, and in view of my opposition to this measure I shall state only those which I consider fundamentally sound and tending to discourage the enactment of this legislation:

First. Probable cost, United States share about 65 percent, borne by taxpayers not benefited by project.

Second. Speculative value for present and immediate future of national defense.

Third. No such gigantic expenditure can be sound when benefits from navigation are nil half a year. Real difficulties of ice, shoals, and fogs.

Fourth. Competition from merchandise carried in by foreign vessels.

Fifth. Annual loss by reason of diversion from our present rail and waterway facilities, and public and private property values.

Sixth. Doubt as to large amounts of grain for export via St. Lawrence.

Seventh. United States to pay major cost of work for labor and materials used on Canadian side.

Eighth. Serious doubt as question of further withdrawal of waters from Lake Michigan.

Ninth. Sufficient power now available in that region, both on Canadian and United States sides.

Tenth. Project opposed in 1940 by more than a 3-to-1 vote of New York State Legislature, and yet New York State has been singled out as chief beneficiary.

Eleventh. Last of all, let us consider every alternative which will conserve our financial structure, and meet our immediate national-defense needs.

Even if we admit that there is merit in this plan can we possibly agree that now is the proper time for its execution? The Committee on Rivers and Harbors may well be congratulated that they have not included this legislation in an omnibus bill. It is certainly easier and less odorous to handle one bad egg at a time. If for no other reason than the deplorable state of the Federal Treasury, we should not consider favorably this bill.

Comment is repeatedly heard that this plan cannot be classed as a war measure. Recently the chairman of the Hydroelectric Power Commission of Canada made this statement. I quote:

> It is quite evident that this development cannot be classed as a war measure, for even if undertaken tomorrow it would be 6 or 7 years before it could become of use. Yet the project is persistently misrepresented as a war measure, which far from helping could actually handicap war work.

Coming from such a high authority, might this not be the opinion of many other expert Canadian engineers?

We must not delude ourselves into thinking that this plan as briefly stated in H. R. 4927 may end our further considerations. It may well be only a beginning of untold appropriations for the defense and maintenance of this enormous 1,200-mile outlay. Complete defense bases must be built at dozens of places from the Straits of Belle Isle to the entrance to Lake Ontario. Shall we undertake these and neglect our defenses so badly needed along our entire Atlantic seaboard? Let us not forget that even with Canada our closest friend and an ally if war comes to us, every lock in this canal would be vulnerable to air attack and thus close for an indefinite period exit from the Great Lakes to the sea. Our solicitude for the Panama Canal could again be in evidence on the St. Lawrence. What then can be our gain after all this expense and care and responsibility? We know that for navigation purposes the canal can be used only for half the year and the principal benefits would go to foreign shippers. Under such conditions the savings to farmers are very difficult to determine, and at the best do not appear to warrant the investment. Perhaps in this discussion some accurate figures may be obtained as well as savings on electric power, and once and for all it must be shown that steam plants cannot be built in sufficient number and at less cost and more quickly and economically operated than any power generated from the St. Lawrence power project which may not be available for several years.

The cry has been raised that propaganda is running wild in opposition to this bill. Perhaps no propaganda is necessary in behalf of the proponents and that the vote in favor is already in the bag. Certainly it is a matter of public knowledge that very large groups of national organizations are opposed to the project, Chambers of Commerce of Akron, Ohio, Boston, Mass., State of Illinois, Providence, R. I.; New Orleans National Association of Shippers; Pennsylvania State Chamber of Commerce, and so forth, showing that opposition is not confined to the State of New York but is country-wide. No doubt arguments will be advanced that Presidents of the United States, as well as scores of Army engineers, have approved of this development. Let us analyze these statements, as they might reasonably bear considerable weight.

Theodore Roosevelt said in 1922:

> The feasibility of the project is unquestioned, and its cost compared with some other great emergency works would be small.

The latter part of this statement is amusing. Would his idea of a small cost hold good today? Did he have in mind the cost of the Chicago Drainage Canal estimated at $16,000,000 and costing $53,000,000? Did he have in mind the Suez Canal estimated at $30,000,000 and costing $80,000,000? He had reason to recall the estimated cost of the Panama Canal of $160,000,000 and the resulting cost of $375,000,000. Would he hesitate after glancing for a moment at today's Treasury statement and admit that a mere billion outlay at this time should be laughed off and of no moment?

Let us hear what Calvin Coolidge said in December 1923:

> The time has come to resume in a moderate way the opening of our intracoastal waterways.

Among these was the St. Lawrence River development, and then he states:

> This is not incompatible with economy.

Would he not today shudder at sight of our financial condition and reverse such an opinion?

What did Herbert Hoover state in 1932? While stating his approval of the project, he used these words:

> The waterway will probably require 10 years for completion.

What a wide divergence of opinion between President Hoover and President Roosevelt.

The latter recently stated in his message to Congress:

> I am advised that we can build the St. Lawrence project in 4 years. Under emergency pressure it may be completed in less time.

Where did the President obtain these estimates? From the Army engineers, who endorsed the Passamaquoddy and Florida ship canal fiascos or pulled them out of the gathering clouds over the White House?

If the figures can be gathered—and I presume they can—showing the amount expended by the administration in the last 8 years in surveys, in wasted time and effort by boards and commissions, in labor expended on projects thrown aside as worthless or impractical, in visionary schemes originating from heaven knows where, the figures would be startling. And now one more political promise must be liquidated at the expense of the American people.

As usual, the cry will be raised that this is not a partisan measure; but watch the vote on the floor of this House. No one can accuse me of wishing to defeat this bill because of party affiliation. I voted among the first for the lease-lend bill. I have supported every bill for national defense. I have upheld the President in his views on national defense and his international program of all-out aid to the democracies. I have declared for the delivery of war materials to Great Britain at any cost, and for ever-increasing speed in production of essential war material for our own use and for those nations who believe in the liberty and freedom we enjoy. I would support this bill if I believed in what it proposes and what it offers of benefit to all the people. These promises and benefits I am confident cannot be performed. A day may come when such a plan might be feasible, but that time is not now. It may come when our whole economic structure needs just this sort of an undertaking to stimulate and encourage our return to normal life. Above all, and of the utmost importance, is the fact that all our thoughts and skill and enterprise should be devoted to the one all-absorbing task of immediate national defense and the pressing problems incident thereto. And I mean by these, strikes against our Government, the outlawing of communistic activities, the growing unrest and disloyalty of un-American labor leaders and racketeers, who have sown the seed of discord and disobedience, and theories foreign to our own way of life, among hundreds of thousands of our citizens who are being deprived of their very right of citizenship. Such problems must transcend those of seaways and canals and flood control and the countless political baits always dangled before our eyes and stamped "Urgent," "Must," "Bite." Whatever arguments are presented here, let us decide them honestly and fearlessly and at this session of the Congress, that our judgment may be that of all the people whose interests we are pledged to serve.

Strikes in National-Defense Industries

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LUTHER A. JOHNSON

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 20, 1941

RADIO ADDRESS DELIVERED OVER THE MUTUAL BROADCASTING SYSTEM BY HON. LUTHER A. JOHNSON, OF TEXAS

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted, I submit herewith opening statement made by me over station WOL, Washington, D. C., on the evening of June 15, 1941, on the program of American Forum of the Air, the subject being the Connally bill, relating to strikes in national-defense industries:

Strikes in national-defense industries have for many months constituted one of the most serious problems confronting our Government. With billions of dollars having been appropriated by Congress for defense and our military and naval experts warning us that speed was of the essence and that every day and every hour counted in the preparation for our defense, yet by reason of a large number of strikes in various defense industries, the defense program has been retarded and slowed down, and our production of planes, munitions, and other defense articles has been greatly reduced as a direct result of these strikes.

In April a statement from the Labor Division of the Defense Commission to the Naval Affairs Committee of the House estimated the number of man-days lost in strikes in defense industries amounted to 2,583,441 man-days. Today, only about 2 months since that estimate was given, this has been increased to approximately 4,000,000 man-days of idleness, according to a report which I received yesterday from the Office of Production Management. This means that since the defense program began about a year ago, by reason of strikes in defense industries, there have been 4,000,000 man-days of idleness. Comparing the April statement with the statement of yesterday, there has been an increase in man-days idleness in 2 months of a million and a half caused by strikes in defense industries.

The gravity of this situation is apparent to everyone, and I think that the American people are aroused and are all agreed that something must be done to prevent the slowing down of the program which we are carrying on for the defense and the preservation of America. There has been much talk about it, but the time for talk has passed and the time for action is at hand.

The right to strike in normal times no one will deny, and collective bargaining must be and will be preserved; and the Government, in order to protect the rights of labor and industry, has set up the National Defense Mediation Board to determine the merits of those controversies without causing a stoppage of work; but in some instances the action of the Mediation Board and the orders of the leaders of the labor unions to proceed with work have been disregarded, evidencing a flagrant and reckless disregard for the Nation's welfare.

The laborers in America as a whole are patriotic and are anxious to do their bit in preparing for our defense, and I am convinced that it is not the fault of the masses of those who labor that these strikes have taken place. Some have been wage disputes, some have been jurisdictional strikes between labor unions, some have doubtless been caused by the unreasonable attitude of industry, and others have been inspired by a small communistic group acting on orders from foreign governments, but the American people for the moment are not so much interested in the cause of this dilemma as its prevention.

The Connally bill, which passed the Senate last Thursday by a vote of 67 to 7, and an identical bill introduced by me in the House authorizing the President of the United States, whenever he finds, after investigation, that the national-defense program will be impeded or delayed by an existing or threatened failure of production, as result of strikes or threatened strikes in defense industries, to take possession of such plant or plants and use and operate them for the United States in the production of defense articles, is not a cure-all for the problem, but it will certainly be effective when other means have failed to guarantee the continued operation of these plants.

Some plan must be devised, some method must be employed to stop these strikes, when all other means have failed, and that is what the Connally bill is designed to do and will do. It is a gun behind the door to be used by the President only when all other means have failed.

The taking over of the North American aviation plant in California by the President a few days ago illustrates the efficacy of the plan. He did this under his inherent authority under the Constitution as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, but it is desirable that he have the specific authority for such action. This bill would eliminate any question of his right, and furthermore give approval thereto by the Congress of the United States, thereby evidencing the approval of the people of the United States by their chosen legislative representatives.

With this specific authority vested in the President by the Congress, it would serve as a deterrent in the prevention of further strikes, and doubtless would not have to be exercised often, once it was known that he possessed the authority, and that the American people approved of its exercise when necessary.

The administration favors this bill, Under Secretary of War Patterson having appeared before the House Committee on Military Affairs a few days ago in support of it.

It is the only effective plan that has been offered, and its passage in the Senate by an almost unanimous vote indicates the crystallization of sentiment for it and I hope that it may soon pass the House.

Business as Usual

EDITORIAL FROM JACKSON (MICH.) CITIZEN-PATRIOT

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the privilege given to me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an editorial from the Jackson (Mich.) Citizen-Patriot, which is as follows:

[From the Jackson (Mich.) Citizen Patriot]

"BUSINESS AS USUAL"

Administration spokesmen from Washington tell us that they want no talk of "business as usual." They want the people to realize that we are in an emergency. They want us to sense the need for all-out effort.

And the administration is right in such a program.

But the trouble is that the plan should start in Washington.

If the automobile manufacturers are going to be forced to curtail production, if rationing gasoline in some areas and electric power in others is to become a necessity, there will be no complaint from patriots.

The American people will abandon the nonessentials and the luxuries of life, if necessary; but why doesn't the Government set the pace?

The C. C. C., for example, was a great enterprise in depression days. It salvaged many a boy and young man, and it did many a worth-while job. But in the present emergency we don't need the C. C. C. at all.

The Government is finding it not easy to raise enough money by taxation and the sale of bonds to finance our defense effort, yet the Government continues to pour money into the C. C. C. and the C. C. C. continues to doll up State parks. Why? Because the C. C. C., like every other bureau or commission ever created by the National Government, is unwilling to go out of existence, even though the situation which created it has ceased to exist. The men at the head of the C. C. C. don't want to lose their jobs. Every time a Member of Congress suggests that any present bureau, division, or commission of the Government be abolished a plague of tax-paid lobbyists descends on Congress like a flight of 17-year locusts and demands that the agency be continued.

If we are going to trim down to defense weight, then the place to begin trimming is in Washington. Mark Foote reports that many bureaus and commissions are going to be moved out of the Capital to other cities to make room for defense workers. Instead of moving them, why not do away with them altogether?

There are jobs in the defense program for all of the boys in the C. C. C., and there are other places for the bureaucrats in Washington. Let Government set the pace, and the people will begin to take this defense program seriously.

If American women are expected to do without aluminum dishpans and to get along with last year's automobiles, then Uncle Sam should get along without the C. C. C. and the multitude of other nonessential agencies which continue to live off the fat of the land.

ARTICLE FROM THE WASHINGTON TIMES-HERALD

Mr. DAY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Washington Times-Herald of June 18, 1941:

COMMONS HOOTS AT OPPONENT OF UNION WITH UNITED STATES—LIBERAL PARTY DRAFTS PROPOSAL FOR ENTENTE

LONDON, June 18.—Cries of "Nonsense" and "Shame" resounded in the House of Commons when Rupert de la Bere, Conservative, insisted in an exchange with Prime Minister Winston Churchill that the British people did not desire federal union with the United States, now or in the future.

Bere asked Churchill if he could give assurance that, as distinct from the idea of an Anglo-American entente, that the Government would not formulate a plan for federal union without a mandate from the British people.

MERGER PLAN DRAFTED

"So great a change could not be brought about without the fullest public and parliamentary discussion beforehand," Churchill said.

"Does not the Prime Minister understand that whilst the country extends tireless goodwill and appreciation to the American people it does not amount to a desire to have Federal union now or at any future date?" Berle then asked.

It was understood that an Anglo-American entente, as part of Britain's peace aims, will be proposed by the executive committee of the Liberal Party at its assembly on July 18.

NO PEACE WITHOUT SECURITY

"This assembly believes that victory will be barren unless it is used by the American and British democracies, working in continuous and close collaboration with other free democratic nations, to realize the liberal principles of international life," a proposed resolution will say. "The post-war settlement must establish the rule of law among nations and it must set up effective machinery for the determination of disputes and provides for maintenance of a system of mutual defense of all peaceful states against aggression.

Closing of the German Consulates

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS H. ELIOT

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 20, 1941

EDITORIAL FROM THE BOSTON (MASS.) POST

Mr. ELIOT of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include an excellent and timely editorial from a newspaper which has consistently pursued a real American editorial policy, the Boston Post:

[From the Boston Post of June 17, 1941]

FULLY JUSTIFIABLE

The Berlin government has proceded along the road to world domination through realistic means and drastic action.

It has not been dissuaded from its objectives by the provisions or the niceties of international law, nor by any human element in administration which endangers the Nazi conception of the supremacy of the state in all matters.

Therefore, there should be little complaint in Berlin this morning at the news that the United States has ordered the German consulates in this country closed and their staffs returned to Germany.

There was little pretense since 1939 that these consulates were operated for other than war purposes.

The trade with Germany has ceased. Because of this, and if international law was complied with, most of the consulates should have closed at that time.

They were held open, with able attachés in charge, to assist the Berlin government as far as possible in the successful prosecution of the war. No other excuse exists for their maintenance.

Because of the strained relations between this country and Germany, and the obvious internal danger which exists in permitting active spies and subversive agents to work unchecked, it was intelligent action which now closes the official offices of the Reich.

This, most Americans agree, should only be the beginning of intelligent action.

The mere act of closing a consulate or a group of consulates does not halt spying or the employment of saboteurs.

Espionage operates in depths which few official Government offices plumb. The spies will not be driven out by closing consulates. Neither will the propagandists depart.

It is up to us and our National Government to proceed directly against the underground organizations and, in addition, not to confine our efforts solely to Germany.

The master espionage system of all time, one which is battling Americanism in our factories and mills, and has done so for a generation, is that supported by the Moscow Government and the Soviet Union.

The Nazis are positively naive compared to the Russians. The latter do not operate through such obvious devices as consulates.

They enter the blood stream of the Nation through the most intricate system of intrigue ever devised, and the poison that this virus has engendered reaches into the lives of millions of Americans, is festering in our Government, and is present in hundreds of official and private organizations.

It seeks to divide and rule, to raise class against class, race against race, religion against religion.

The people of this country will find the action of the President in closing the Nazi consulates fully justifiable.

The people will urge continued action against the hidden organizations of both Germany and Russia.

Consumption of Cheese

REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANK B. KEEFE

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 20, 1941

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Speaker, on June 6, 1941, the Secretary of Agriculture addressed an appeal to the people of the United States to reduce their consumption of cheese by eating substitutes in order that more of that food might be shipped to the people of England and other nations resisting Nazi aggression.

In this appeal the Secretary seeks to destroy the efforts that have been made for years to induce the people of America to eat more cheese.

I can assure the Secretary of Agriculture that with proper price protection the farmers of Wisconsin and other sections of the Nation can produce all the cheese that may be required to not only maintain domestic consumption but to take care of the demands of foreign governments. We must not destroy our own domestic market.

The attitude of the people of Wisconsin on this subject is clearly expressed in a resolution adopted by the directors of the Association of Commerce of Fond du Lac, Wis., on Tuesday, June 17, 1941, and a statement of Mr. William F. Hubert, president of the Wisconsin Cheese Exchange, reported in the Sheboygan Press, of Sheboygan, Wis., under date of June 18, 1941:

RESOLUTION PASSED BY DIRECTORS OF ASSOCIATION OF COMMERCE, FOND DU LAC, WIS., TUESDAY, JUNE 17, 1941

Whereas Secretary of Agriculture Wickard has made public pronouncement to the Nation requesting that it reduce the consumption of cheese for the purpose of creating a surplus to be used for export to one of the nations engaged in the European war; and

Whereas the dairy farmers of Fond du Lac County have been contributing to a fund used by the Wisconsin Department of Agriculture for the purpose of advertising and increasing the per capita consumption of cheese in the United States; and

Whereas Fond du Lac County ranks eleventh in cheese production among the 71 counties of Wisconsin, and the income from dairy products, especially cheese, vitally affects the economic life of the county of Fond du Lac, as expressed by a production during 1940 of 13,123,000 pounds of cheese, using approximately 135,000,000 pounds of milk; and a reduction in consumption would vitally affect the earning capacity of 61,000 milk cows and large investments in modern farm and dairy equipment, involving the highest sanitary standards in the Nation, and in addition would affect the income of a large number of people who are active in businesses kindred to the dairy-products industry, especially that of cheese, the revenue from which is accurately estimated to represent more than one-third of the total income from all dairy products of the county; and

Whereas the present level of national consumption of cheese will be necessary to avoid a precarious condition after the present foreign emergency is over: Be it

Resolved, That the directors of the Fond du Lac Association of Commerce, representing the industrial, retail, wholesale, and professional men of the city, hereby enter their protest to Secretary Wickard's agricultural program asking for reduction of the consumption of cheese, and resolve that the Secretary be respectfully requested to retract his request and as soon as possible consult with the dairy leaders of Wisconsin to the end that our present national per capita consumption may be preserved for the future and that the cheese required to meet the European emergency be obtained by some program of increased production of cheese; be it further Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be transmitted to Secretary Claude Wickard, Senators Alexander Wiley and Robert M. La Follette, and Congressman Frank B. Keefe.

[From the Sheboygan (Wis.) Press of June 18, 1941]

REMEDY IS SUGGESTED BY HUBERT—DIVERT PERCENTAGE OF MILK FROM BUTTER RATHER THAN HURT CHEESE INDUSTRY

By taking 3 percent of the Nation's milk from butter or other dairy products and diverting it into cheese, the United States could increase cheese production 50 percent and make more than enough for both American and English consumption, William F. Hubert, Sheboygan, president, Wisconsin Cheese Exchange, declared today.

Mr. Hubert, in making the statement, voiced strong objection to United States Secretary of Agriculture Claude F. Wickard's recent argument that Americans should eat less cheese so English demands for that product could be met.

"I feel that we should produce and eat more cheese, not less," Mr. Hubert stated. "According to the United States Department of Agriculture figures, about 32 percent of the Nation's milk goes into creamery butter, about 9 percent into butter made on the farm, and about 6 percent into cheese.

SMALL DIVERSION

"If 3 percent of the Nation's milk would be taken out of butter and other dairy products and converted into cheese, it would produce considerable more cheese than the amount asked for by England. The present estimated cheese production of the United States will be about 840,000,000 pounds during 1941. With so small a diversion from other dairy products, it would then be about 1,250,000,000 pounds of cheese."

President Hubert said that at a recent meeting the Wisconsin Cheese Exchange passed the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the president and the board of directors of the Wisconsin Cheese Exchange be, and they are hereby, authorized to offer the facilities of this exchange to the Government for the purchase and sale of cheese."

The exchange is willing and anxious to help the Federal Government solve the cheese production and consumption problem, Mr. Hubert said, but he felt that Secretary Wickard's suggestion would be detrimental to the Wisconsin cheese industry, since the State produces 50 percent of the Nation's cheese.

For the past dozen years the State has spent a great deal of money building up cheese consumption through expensive advertising campaigns. If the public is asked to eat less cheese now, during the emergency, then it will be difficult to get people back into cheese-eating habits once the war is over, Mr. Hubert contended.

SURPLUS OF BUTTER

"Figures released by the United States Department of Agriculture as of June 1, 1941," Mr. Hubert continued, "of cheese in storage, being 102,768,000 pounds, show holdings of about 30,000,000 pounds greater than a year ago on June 1.

"It is estimated that included in this 102,000,000 pounds there are about 20,000,000 pounds purchased by the Government. These are in storage awaiting shipment to England. This would leave only about 82,000,000 pounds actually owned in the United States, and this is only about 12 percent greater than that of a year ago. On the other hand, the storage holdings of butter, as of June 1, 1941, are 56,359,000 pounds, compared with a year ago holdings of 25,463,000 pounds, or about 225 percent greater.

"Every effort should be made," the president of the exchange added, "to divert into cheese some of the milk which is now going into other dairy products, namely, butter and ice cream. These latter products are not being asked for by England.

"During the past few years the United States Government has lent its support to butter on the Chicago Mercantile Exchange. If this same kind of support was forthcoming to the Wisconsin Cheese Exchange, it would be a material help in the present situation.

"Further, immediate steps should be taken by the Wisconsin College of Agriculture to issue a weekly bulletin to the producers of Wisconsin, giving figures as to the parity between butter and cheese. This could easily be accomplished by determining the average weekly price of butter on the Chicago Mercantile Exchange and compare same with the price of cheese on the Wisconsin Cheese Exchange, and add to each one the price of its own byproducts. It must be taken into consideration that butter is sold free on board track, Chicago, while cheese is sold free on board factory in Wisconsin."

Mr. Hubert explained that free on board track, Chicago, means that all butter prices are quoted on butter standing on the tracks, while in Wisconsin cheese buyers must go to the factory and haul their cheese away.

MAKERS PATRIOTIC

"It would be very inconsistent," Mr. Hubert went on, "to cut down on our cheese consumption after the cheese industry, together with the State of Wisconsin, have through extensive advertising stressed the food value of cheese and nearly doubled its consumption in the past 12 years.

"For this reason, I feel it would be a better policy, during this present emergency, to convert milk from other dairy products rather than to ask the American public to cut down on their consumption of cheese. Everyone connected with the cheese industry knows that the latter would be disastrous, not only to the cheese industry, but to all other dairy industries as well."

"Wisconsin cheese-factory operators and manufacturers are patriotic men," Mr. Hubert said, "and are more than willing to do their part toward making the Nation strong. But when there is an obvious way out of the difficulty, by which no present or future dislocation in the cheese industry will take place," Mr. Hubert said he felt that way out should be taken.

He explained that diversion of fluid milk from butter production into cheesemaking would not in any way injure the butter industry. There is at present a great surplus of butter and this condition of abundance would not be reduced for some time to come, he said.

Breaking down the usages for the United States milk supply, 1937-39 averages, Mr. Hubert quoted the following percentages: Creamery butter, 31.6; fluid milk used in cities and villages, 29.9; used on farms where produced, 11.7; farm butter, 9.2; cheese, 6.3; canned milk, 4.5; ice cream, 3.1; fed to calves on farms, 2.6; dry and powdered, 0.2; and miscellaneous uses, 0.9.

ARTICLE FROM THE NEW YORK TIMES, WEDNESDAY, JUNE 18, 1941

Mr. PLOESER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a most interesting comment on the St. Lawrence seaway hearings, printed in the New York Times, Wednesday, June 18, 1941:

[From the New York Times of June 18, 1941]

IN THE NATION—HEAVY POLITICAL GUNS BOOM ON THE ST. LAWRENCE

(By Arthur Krock)

WASHINGTON, June 17.—Can a long-range defense program be executed at the same time an immediate one—all aid to Great Britain—is taxing all the resources of the United States? Is it wise, from the standpoints of the British aid effort, our own rearmament, and the importance of the time factor in the all-out program, to divert men, money, and materials for a project which will not be functioning for several years? These are the issues in the dispute over the President's proposal that work begin at once to complete the St. Lawrence deep waterway and power plan.

Since the war may conceivably be over before the new power becomes available, and any present diversion of the possible measure of aid to Great Britain may adversely affect that nation's prospect of victory, the argument of the opposition to the St. Lawrence project is as visible as it is impressive. But the administration is determined to override the argument and the opposition, and the President is using his familiar technique of marshaling all the political and personal force under his influence to achieve that on which he has set his mind.

Recent history demonstrates that when the President has come to such a determination he never quits. He abandoned his device to change the viewpoint of the Supreme Court majority by enlarging the court. But time and human fate accomplished for him soon thereafter what Congress would not do and the public would not sanction.

A HEAVY BOMBARDMENT

The administration's big guns are in position now and thundering for the St. Lawrence plan. The Cabinet is coming forward with all possible explanations why what the President wants is a component necessity of national defense and essential to the British cause as well as to our own. Although the ranks of the O. P. M. are by no means solid in favor of the long-distance project, its obliging chiefs were induced to throw the weight of the office behind the President. This gave him a show of expert as well as political support.

Today Secretary Stimson added his voice to the effort, and Secretary Hull instructed Assistant Secretary Berle to voice that Secretary's approval to the House committee. It is an imposing turnout, of the kind the President can muster when he is so disposed. And whenever anything is sought by the administration these days under the phrase "national defense" the effect on Congress is the greater.

Mr. Berle advanced an ingenious reason for abandoning the treaty plan in favor of presenting the project to both branches of Congress as a contract. Twice before, when it was offered in treaty form, the Senate did not furnish the two-thirds necessary for the ratification of a treaty, but a majority was registered in favor. It is generally believed that this is the practical reason why the St. Lawrence agreement is now offered in the form of a contract.

But Mr. Berle had a more virtuous explanation. He said the domestic interest of the United States is so plainly paramount that the administration decided it was only proper to seek the approval of both branches; that the House of Representatives, the popular body, must assuredly be consulted in matters of domestic interest. Yet the material fact remains that by this means the administration needs only a simple majority to get the authority the President is determined to obtain.

THE OPPOSING VIEW

To the opposition it seems incredible that a government which, by the confession of the President's first report on lease-lend shipments, has hardly begun to furnish essential aid to Great Britain in its time of growing exigency should insist on diverting any effort or resources to a long-range project. Already there is a labor shortage for work in hand, and the strikes have delayed important armament construction. There are present and approaching shortages in arms materials. While the requested initial sum of $200,000,000 is mentioned almost contemptuously by the spenders of the tens of defense billions, it would build many airplanes and ships—the prime requisites of the British.

These points are being waived aside. The administration is confident it will win the approval of Congress on the plea of national defense, supported by important officials and the spokesmen of O. P. M. Canada has a direct national stake in the enterprise, which assured the backing of Prime Minister King. And although the British would exchange five future St. Lawrence power developments for immediate ships and planes, their situation is such they can probably be induced to add their official support to the project if it seems to be needed and the pressure from Washington is applied.

When Norway fell Great Britain was forced to turn to Canada for its supplies of woodpulp, ferro alloys, and chemicals. That put a load on the Dominion's industries. Power there went to a premium, and Ontario withdrew its objections to the St. Lawrence scheme. The emergency could be met by building more steam plants on the border and stepping up the power output at Niagara Falls until the war is over. But the administration brushes away such suggestions.

Additional Judge Needed in Eastern District of Missouri

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN J. COCHRAN

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 20, 1941

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, my colleague from Missouri [Mr. BENNETT], in his brief speech this morning, again takes the position that an additional Federal judge for the eastern district of Missouri is not needed. I have always felt that when one finds himself in error that he should not hesitate to admit it.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BENNETT] takes it upon himself to contradict the views not only of the Eighth Circuit Court of Appeals but the Attorney General, the Supreme Court of the United States, the United States district judge, George Moore, and United States District Attorney Harry C. Blanton, as well as the St. Louis Bar Association. He rests his case solely upon a telegram received from United States Judge Charles Davis which I have quoted on numerous occasions and which, in effect, stated that the members of the bar of the eastern district of Missouri had not taken an interest in this question nor made an investigation. The report of the special committee appointed by the St. Louis Bar Association, which I placed in the RECORD a few days ago, not only contradicts the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BENNETT] but also United States District Judge Davis.

There came to my desk this morning editorials published in the St. Louis Globe-Democrat, which the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BENNETT] knows is a Republican newspaper, and the St. Louis Post Dispatch, and I insert them as part of my remarks. The editorial from the Globe-Democrat follows:

A NEW FEDERAL JUDGESHIP

The St. Louis Bar Association has added its endorsement to the bill pending in Congress to provide an additional Federal judge for the eastern Missouri district. The action of the association is particularly significant in view of the charge of politics which has been raised by Congressman WALTER C. PLOESER in the House debate on the measure.

The bar association is not a partisan organization. Its members, who by virtue of their profession are qualified to decide on the need for an additional judge, represent a cross-section of both major political parties.

The association's endorsement is based on a study made by a special committee of three of its former presidents, which found that independently of its own conclusions the need is fully demonstrated by the fact that expert sources "whose motives cannot be questioned," have recommended the bill.

The committee referred specifically to Presiding Judge Kimbrough Stone of the Eighth United States Circuit Court of Appeals, the administrative office for United States courts, and the judicial conference.

The increasing volume of condemnation suits, the substantial increase in the number of criminal cases instituted by the Federal Government and the numerous corporation reorganization proceedings pending in this district, including four important railroad reorganizations are cited by the report in support of the bill. United States District Attorney Blanton, in a recent letter to Senator BENNETT C. CLARK, pointed out that pending condemnation cases would occupy all the working time of one judge for 2½ years.

There are now two full-time judges in this district, while the third judge, John Caskie Collet, divides his time between this district and the western Missouri (Kansas City) district. Passage of the act creating another full-time judge would permit Judge Collet to devote all, or nearly all of his attention to the western Missouri district, and expedite the work of the court in both districts.

The Post Dispatch editorial follows:

AN ADDITIONAL JUDGESHIP IS NEEDED

The report of the executive committee of the St. Louis Bar Association removes all question as to the need for an additional judgeship in the United States court district for eastern Missouri. It does so without violence to the statement some weeks ago of senior District Judge Charles B. Davis that no lawyer had had difficulty in getting a case tried and that the courts of the district had not been burdened with work for the last year.

The need is in the future, but that future is a very near one. Condemnation cases pending or in prospect in the river-front memorial, Weldon Spring TNT plant, Wappapello Dam, and Clearwater Reservoir promise to clog the civil docket of the district to such an extent that ordinary litigants will be injured. The bar association committee reports that these cases alone will require some 800 trial days, a burden which will throw the court 3 years behind.

That would be an intolerable situation, and Congress is wise to meet it in advance, as urged by judicial authorities both in the circuit and nationally.

I hope this will convince the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BENNETT] that there is no politics in this question and that the bill which recently passed the House should be passed by the Senate without delay.

Diversion of Oil Tankers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDITH NOURSE ROGERS
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 20, 1941

LETTER FROM JOHN P. McBRIDE, DIRECTOR MASSACHUSETTS DEPARTMENT OF LABOR AND INDUSTRIES, DIVISION ON THE NECESSARIES OF LIFE

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter:

THE COMMONWEALTH
OF MASSACHUSETTS,
DEPARTMENT OF LABOR AND INDUSTRIES,
DIVISION OF THE NECESSARIES OF LIFE,
June 16, 1941.

Hon. EDITH NOURSE ROGERS,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN ROGERS: Anent the situation in relation to suggested curtailment of gasoline, heating oils, and industrial bunker C oil, Massachusetts requirements, based on 1940 demands, are as follows:

Gasoline: 744,262,714 gallons or 17,625,302 barrels.

Heating oils for home use: 906,000,000 gallons or 21,571,428 barrels.

Industrial or bunker C oil: 540,000,000 gallons or 13,000,000 barrels.

It is anticipated that the 1941 demand will be 10 percent larger due to increased consumption and that at least the same increase will prevail in 1942 because of defense work which will be reflected in all these items.

As you doubtless know, there is sufficient of this commodity, but we happen to be in a bottleneck so far as transportation is concerned. This condition is generally so in the east coast. The east coast demand for 1940 was 199,037,000 barrels of gasoline and 267,268,000 barrels of light fuel, kerosene, and heating oils. This east coast includes New England, the eastern half of New York State, and Pennsylvania and the Atlantic States from there to Florida. In relation to this area we consume slightly less than 10 percent of petroleum products.

This area depends almost entirely on tankers for transportation, this being by far the cheaper mode. Other methods of transportation available here are railroad tank cars and a few pipe lines. I understand that some effort is to be made to better correlate the general methods of transportation in tankers, barges, pipe lines, railroad tank cars, etc., so as to relieve this situation, but it appears from all available records that the tanker diversion has been greater than these alternatives can absorb. This has caused considerable concern here with householders, industrial centers, both manufacturing and recreational, and utility companies, also including our State department of public health, which has the responsibility of water supply, sewage disposal, and the protection of public health.

Pipe-line relief will not become noticeable for at least 8 or 9 months, which leaves us in somewhat of a quandary as to next winter's needs. Diversion of tankers is under the control of the United States Maritime Commission, and further diversion will aggravate this situation.

Mr. Harold L. Ickes is the coordinator of petroleum activities between the O. P. M. and the O. P. A. C. S. bureaus. This authority is presently functioning to relieve the existing situation.

Very sincerely yours,
JOHN P. McBRIDE,
Director.

Tribute to West Virginia On Its Birthday Anniversary

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JENNINGS RANDOLPH
OF WEST VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 20, 1941

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege for me to report to the House that today marks the birthday anniversary of West Virginia as a State. We who live in the mountain Commonwealth are justly proud of the history, heritage, and resources of our section. Those visitors who come to West Virginia this year will find a busy people and a hospitable atmosphere.

Only a few hours ago I received a letter from a constituent, John L. Teets, of Morgantown, in which he says:

West Virginia is certainly doing its part in national defense; regiments in the field in training; airports training pilots for active training and service; coal mines turning out millions of tons for national-defense industries in countless cities; chemical extraction of coal for explosives; textile mills humming on Army shirts, blankets, etc.

It is true, Mr. Speaker, that in these trying times West Virginia, born in strife, takes its place among the other States as a territory in which loyal citizenry unites in behalf of our common country. It was George Washington who was said to have spoken in the darkest hours of the Revolution the following words:

Leave me but a banner to plant upon the mountains of West Augusta and I will rally around me men who will lift our bleeding Nation from the dust and set her free.

In these days our patriotic men and women stand ready to meet any emergency, just as they did even before we actually formed into a State on June 20, 1863.

At this point I include a toast to West Virginia by Harry E. Leeper, of Fairmont:

Nature has richly endowed West Virginia with natural resources, beautiful mountain scenery, and a sturdy, forward-looking people of pure Anglo-Saxon origin.

Noble rivers, wooded hills, fertile valleys, smiling farms, and bustling industries greet us on every side.

In West Virginia history comes to life. Tales of deeds of daring by West Virginians and historic shrines enrich our State and National life.

Man's conquest of nature is nowhere more evident than in West Virginia, with its miles of engineered highways, its rail- and water-transportation systems, its airports built and building, affording ingress and egress of raw materials, finished products, and linking surface transportation with the boundless air lines up above.

Education and culture are part of our everyday life in West Virginia, and daily scientific research leads to new and greater uses of our vast natural resources for the benefit of mankind.

Foremost in bringing these things to American life and American ways and cooperating with other national research groups is our own West Virginia University, created, built, and building by West Virginia mountaineers.

The greatest asset of West Virginia is its people. Of virile Anglo-Saxon stock, it is they who have made West Virginia great, and it is they who will bring her to greater fame and usefulness through coming years among the sisterhood of sovereign States.

West Virginians have faith in the democratic way of life and will maintain that way of life as did their forbears when they helped wrest from Black King John the Magna Carta on the bloody field of Runnymede; when they strove mightily with King George III so that we in America might "live by no man's leave underneath the law"; when they mingled fraternal blood in '65 and '67 to assure freedom to all, regardless of race, creed, or color; and they upheld the principles of democracy again in 1898 and again in 1918.

West Virginia, endowed with the culture and chivalry of the South, the progressive spirit of the North, the aggressiveness of the West, and the acumen of the East, is indeed, a State of opportunity.

In this State of opportunity we can build a mighty economic and industrial empire for this Nation that will be a monument to the coordination of men, materials, money, and machinery for all time, if we will "but to ourselves be true." We must build so that mountaineers will always be free in our great State of opportunity. The hills of West Augusta must always be a symbol of progressive men and liberty.

My friends—
To West Virginia.

George Nicholas Seger

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

OF

HON. BUTLER B. HARE

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life and public service of Hon. GEORGE NICHOLAS SEGER, late a Representative from the State of New Jersey

Mr. HARE. Mr. Speaker, one of the first men I learned to know on the Republican side of the aisle upon coming to Washington in 1925 was the Honorable GEORGE N. SEGER, of New Jersey, I soon observed that he was not to be known or "heard for his much speaking," but what he said carried with it such sincerity and honesty of purpose his statements were convincing and always exacted profound respect from those who heard him. There was no particular reason why there should develop a strong personal friendship between us further than that he was magnetic in his manner and readily commanded the friendship of all who came in contact with him. With increased associations I developed increasing fondness for his many amiable and outstanding virtues. Although we came from sections of the country where our constituents maintain an entirely different view on many political questions I consider it a distinct compliment to myself to know that our views on the philosophy of life, apart from its political aspects, were quite similar. He was a party man but never selfishly partisan. He was always sincere, honest, frank, courteous, and thoughtful in his deliberations with his colleagues regardless of political affiliations. He was a man of unusual good judgment and demonstrated a sincere interest in promoting legislation designed for the benefit of the public.

It was my privilege to spend some time with him at the same hotel for a year prior to his death and it was there that our association developed into a very warm friendship and where I learned to recognize and properly evaluate his ability and the outstanding virtues of his life.

His long service in the Congress is conclusive evidence that he merited the confidence reposed in him by the people of his State, and is sufficient justification for the high esteem held for him by his colleagues and many admiring friends.

Samuel Chapman Massingale

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

OF

HON. WESLEY E. DISNEY

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. SAMUEL CHAPMAN MASSINGALE, late a Representative from the State of Oklahoma.

Mr. DISNEY. Mr. Speaker, I wish to record my brief, but sincere, tribute to the memory of our departed friend and colleague, the late SAM MASSINGALE, one of the most beloved Members of the House.

He was a man with many sterling qualities; a man of the highest integrity; one in whom full confidence could be placed. Modest and unassuming, without a trace of pretension, but rugged and inflexible, his service here reflects to the honor and credit of the State of Oklahoma. The respect and esteem which he deserved and enjoyed from his colleagues might well be the envy of any Member of the House.

With his keen and engaging sense of humor, his courteous disposition, his friendly approach, he endeared himself to his colleagues. He maintained at all times due consideration for the rights and opinions of others.

Since the beginning of his service in the House of Representatives until his death, we were very close friends. We often conferred with each other on various matters, especially on matters relating to the welfare of our State. On every occasion of our meeting, I found him willing, agreeable, and anxious to render what assistance he could for the people he so ably represented.

But SAM MASSINGALE did more than merely to represent the Seventh Oklahoma District in Congress. It can be said without exaggeration that he actually personified that district's hopes and aspirations and needs; he was in truth and in fact the seventh district.

SAM was not born in Oklahoma. There was no Oklahoma when he first saw the light of day in Mississippi in 1870. He was not educated in Oklahoma. He had taken a law course in Fort Worth and had served in the Spanish-American War, when, a young man, he hung out his shingle as an attorney in Cordell, Washita County.

There, in that new, raw country, from 1900 on, SAM lived his life. He had reached Cordell only a few years after the country had been opened to settlement. Seven years later the territory became a State. The crudeness of the early days gave way to settled living. Railways came, then highways. Cordell came nearer, in distance, to the big cities.

But the call of those cities, that lured so many much less able lawyers than SAM, had no attraction for him. He preferred to remain among the people whom he knew so well, and who, as the years passed, relied more and more upon his advice.

The depression came. Droughts came. Cordell suffered cruelly, as did all that southwestern country, dependent, as it was, upon wheat and cotton. SAM did what he could for his friends and neighbors. But the stark realities of drought and depression called for more than mere sympathy or for chamber of commerce appeals for diversified crops.

More and more it became the burden of SAM'S talks with his home folk that drastic action by the Federal Government was needed. Only national action could adequately meet the problems raised by the drought; only Uncle Sam could guarantee living prices for cotton and wheat; only the Federal Government could provide aid for those needy aged who had grown old and poor under SAM'S eyes, and through no fault of their own, as he firmly believed.

Feeling as he did, it was inevitable that SAM should at last heed the call from his people to represent them in Washington. In 1936 he was elected to Congress; it was only his second public office.

Coming from a farming district, he had from many years of previous contact and association with the farmers gained a thorough knowledge and keen understanding of their problems. As a Member, he viewed their wants and needs with a sympathetic understanding. He devoted much of his time and efforts for the enactment of legislation which he sincerely believed would lighten their burdens and raise their standards. He was carrying forward this work with rare courage and ability at the time of his death.

How consistently and persistently SAM fought for his farmers and for the needy aged of his district everyone in the House knows. Yet everyone knows also that, despite what seemed to some the radicalism of his views, he was never the cold zealot. No Member of Congress was possessed of a more genial humor. No one better loved his friends, nor appreciated more a good story.

Relief for farmers and the aged—those were his two great aims in Congress. He lived to see much of his dream come true. But, to the end, he was insisting on full parity for farmers; he was demanding more adequate pensions for the aged, freed from all taint of charity or largess.

Notable is the fact that SAM entered Congress after he had passed the age of 64, an age when men with less ambition are thinking of retiring from the active struggles of life and are content to look at deeds performed rather than those to be performed. After his many years of honest effort in the practice of law, he was justly entitled to choose that course, yet he aspired for greater accomplishments. This ceaseless spirit for greater accomplishments by honest efforts found in its people, as so well exemplified in the life of SAM MASSINGALE, has played no small part in bringing the State of Oklahoma in a few short years to a place of prominence among the Commonwealths of the Nation.

He passed out fighting. He has gone home to the prairies he loved so well. His death caused profound and widespread sorrow among the old friends he cherished, and for whom he did so much. All that southwestern country is the better for his having lived, and the State of Oklahoma has lost a loyal son, the Nation a patriotic servant, and the House of Representatives a beloved Member in the passing of SAM MASSINGALE.

The poet of the masses, Walt Whitman, had in mind the wholesomeness of citizens like SAM when he wrote:

The greatest city is that which has the greatest men and women.
If it be a few ragged huts it is still the greatest city in the whole world.
The place where the greatest city stands is not the place of stretched wharves, docks, manufactures, deposits of produce,
Nor the place of ceaseless salutes of newcomers, or the anchor-lifters of the departing,
Nor the place of the tallest and costliest buildings, or shops selling goods from the rest of the earth,
Nor the place of the best libraries and schools—nor the place where money is plentiest,
Nor the place of the most numerous population.
* * * Where thrift is in its place, and prudence is in its place,
Where behavior is the finest of the fine arts,
* * * Where the populace rise at once against the never-ending audacity of elected persons,
Where fierce men and women pour forth, as the sea to the whistle of death pours its sweeping and unript waves,
* * * There the greatest city stands.

If man begins at material birth and ends at death, then this vale of tears through which mortal man wends his way is of little consequence. But the Holy Writ declares that God created man in His own image and likeness. If man is thus the reflection of the eternal Maker, his being must be as spiritual and as eternal as God Himself. Obviously, the material body could not be the image of God, Spirit.

The only definition I know of the great mystery of death is that of Paul, in his epistle of Romans, when he said, "To be carnally minded is death." Evidently he meant to imply that death, like birth, is a mortal, mental process.

So these precedents I may properly argue that our friend MASSINGALE is still with us in the eternal spirit.

MASSINGALE was sentimental; most persons with a keen sense of humor are. I think he enjoys another passage from Whitman, which typifies this impression of MASSINGALE, as follows:

Must I leave thee, lilac with heart-shaped leaves?
Must I leave thee there in the dooryard, blooming, returning with spring?
Must I pass from my song for thee;
From my gaze on thee in the west, fronting the west, communing with thee,
O comrade lustrous, with silver face in the night?

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, Churchill was a "Tommie" when the Boers were crushed.

Daddy, why do we celebrate the Fourth of July? Hush, child.

It is difficult for some to keep their shirts on for peace—possibly it's the weather.

The new War Department slogan, "Keep em Flying," should have added, "Over the U. S. A."

One of the horrors of war is the thought that we may have little dictators like "Ants in the Pants" Ickes.

Leon Henderson, price-fixer, seems more concerned about sitting on the loaf of bread than anything else.

This week it's a tooth-for-a-tooth: We freeze the Axis' dough, they freeze ours; we chase their consuls, they chase ours.

The headline, "The Low-Bracket Income Taxes Tripled in Bill," should speed up enrollment in the America First Committee.

There are those in State Department and executive offices who are mad because the English picked up the survivors of the Robin Moor.

The throat trouble of the President dates back to that rainy day he went out into the middle of Chesapeake Bay to welcome Lord Halifax.

Walter Winchell Lipshitz is about to break a hame string and Dorothy Thompson a corset string in their frenzied efforts to drag us into the war.

Frozen trees and flooded fields are the unavoidable and still remain the unexpected. Through catastrophes year after year our people rise again and again.

Nelson Rockefeller and Charles Taft head set-ups under the O. P. M. They are the grandsons of the famous. Charlie's deals chiefly with health and beauty in defense—"Strength through joy."

What shall we do about the statue of Von Steuben in Lafayette Square in front of the White House? After all, what are we going to do about Lafayette Square and the Washington Monument?

Why I Love America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN JENNINGS, JR.

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 20, 1941

RADIO ADDRESS OF DR. F. F. BROWN, PASTOR OF THE KNOXVILLE FIRST BAPTIST CHURCH, AND STATEMENTS BY OTHER PROMINENT CITIZENS OF KNOXVILLE

Mr. JENNINGS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my own remarks in the RECORD I include the following address, Why I Love America, delivered over the radio by Dr. F. F. Brown, pastor of the First Baptist Church of Knoxville, Tenn., on Sunday, June 1, 1941.

Dr. Brown is one of the most eminent Baptist ministers of the Nation, and a great American.

Included in his address are statements from the following able and distinguished citizens of Knoxville: Dr. James D. Hoskins, president of the University of Tennessee; Rabbi Jerome Mark; Dr. Harry Clark, superintendent of Knoxville city schools; Gen. James A. Fowler, former Assistant Attorney General of the United States; Dean F. C. Smith, of the University of Tennessee; John T. O'Connor, former mayor, now director of public welfare of Knoxville; Dr. Clifford E. Barbour, pastor Second Presbyterian Church; and John W. Green, long a leader of the Knoxville bar and the illustrious son of a Confederate colonel killed in action.

This address and the statements it carries, should at this fateful hour be a pillar of cloud by day and a pillar of fire by night to guide the steps and strengthen the souls of the American people in devotion to our common country:

DR. F. F. BROWN, PASTOR, FIRST BAPTIST CHURCH

The very logic of the critical days through which we are passing now is leading sincere, loyal, thoughtful American citizens to face with fresh appreciation the great centralities of our American life and Government.

We are not blind to the faults and evils in our land. We do not ostrich like, bury our heads in the sand, and refuse to see the many manifest imperfections and glaring abuses which American citizenship must deal with courageously and intelligently. But in this hour when our American way of life and form of government are superficially criticized at home, and openly ridiculed and flaunted abroad, we need to be reminded of the significant foundations upon which our way of life and form of government are built.

With this purpose in mind, I have asked a group of our esteemed citizens for a brief, definite, personal statement on the theme of Why I Love America.

Here are their responses:

DR. JAMES D. HOSKINS, PRESIDENT, UNIVERSITY OF TENNESSEE

I have taught history and political science for 40 years. I have taught the history of Europe and of the United States, and have taught political science and comparative governments. Through all of this study and experience I have never discovered a country or a government which through its history and governmental administration has changed my belief that the Republic of the United States of America is the best government in the world.

RABBI JEROME MARK

Where love is concerned there must be a spirit and a vision, and herein lies the answer to my query Why I love America? The spirit of human consecration and veneration of the worth of the individual, as taught in scripture, invests our land as it does no other political unit on the globe.

In addition, the vision of a future that will count citizens and not dollars or shillings, a future that will boast of institutions dedicated to service and not bleak skyscrapers, is the rightful heritage of American civilization. It is a vision which enthralls me and makes me love America.

DR. HARRY CLARK, SUPERINTENDENT OF KNOXVILLE CITY SCHOOLS

I love America because our American way of life protects every individual against exploitation by those who have special privileges or power, and because the American way of life respects the personality of every individual, whatever his origin, or his present condition.

GEN. JAMES A. FOWLER

When the world was without form and void the brooding spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters; and there was laid in its mountains and plains and hills and valleys a foundation unexcelled elsewhere for the support of a civilized society. These resources remained hidden and untouched until man, groping through the night, saw a glimmer of light and began to struggle for freedom of thought and advancement in knowledge. It then became a haven for those among the downtrodden and oppressed who willed to struggle for liberty in thought and action. Through and from them arose a civilization and form of government theretofore unknown and far surpassing even the plutocratic democracies of the Greeks. This civilization has produced George Washington, Abraham Lincoln, and a galaxy of statesmen unequaled by those of any nation, ancient or modern, that has ever existed. This civilization has demonstrated that a government of all the people, by all the people, and for all the people, regardless of race or color, whether the people be few or many, or the land be sparsely or densely populated, can exist and be perpetuated on the face of the earth.

Why not love America? And what American would not sacrifice, yea, if need be, die, for the principles which it represents and which have made it great?

DEAN F. C. SMITH, UNIVERSITY OF TENNESSEE

We love America because we still have faith in the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man. One can worship God according to the dictates of his own conscience with impunity. He can think and act as he pleases within the bounds of other people's rights and still keep his freedom.

America is the land of equal opportunity where ability, industry, and character largely determine one's place in the economic and social order. Every man and woman can and is expected to do his own thinking without interference or fear that he will be penalized if he does not conform to a pattern predetermined by an unscrupulous dictator in control of the state. Here the state is subservient to the people and not the people to the state. We are the masters of our fate, and with the proper balance among culture, industry, and national defense we can, with the help of God, remain true to our objective—a free people in a free land.

JOHN O'CONNOR, FORMER MAYOR, NOW DIRECTOR, PUBLIC WELFARE OF KNOXVILLE

To be able to say, "I am an American," is a precious privilege.

There is no earthly possession of greater value than being a citizen of the United States of America.

I love America because it stands for absolute equality of all men before law and before God.

I love America because it is a land of freedom and opportunity where the citizen has the right to worship God according to the dictates of his own conscience and where the humblest among us can rise to the highest station within the gift of his fellow citizen.

DR. CLIFFORD E. BARBOUR, PASTOR SECOND PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH

I love America because of its equality of opportunity for everyone. According to one's capacity, there is no denial of achievement to its limit. I love America because of its freedom. There is no Gestapo nor Ogpu to snoop into the private lives of honest citizens. There is no dictator to demand unswerving and unquestioned allegiance. I love America because of its liberty, its liberty of conscience as the only guide to every man's faith. I love America because of its ideals. While it has been called a materialistic civilization, fundamentally it is spiritual. Life and labor and happiness are its goals. I love America because of its emphasis upon the value of the individual. Other governments use the individual for the winning of its own policies whatever price the individual may have to pay. America is organized to satisfy the needs of the individual. This seems to me to be God's plan. I love America.

JUDGE JOHN W. GREEN

For 2,000 years millions have loved Christ and the kingdom He established, because He died to make men free. I love America because of the price in blood, sweat, and tears our forefathers paid to make America free, and because if America goes down all is lost that makes a free man's life worth living.

Dr. BROWN. These pungent, vital, thoughtful statements are from Jew and gentile, Catholic and Protestant, Republican and Democrat. But as we listen to the measured words of this golden symposium welling from the hearts and brains of our honored fellow citizens we detect no note of race, or creed, or political faith. We hear only the deliberate, well-expressed convictions of American citizens. That very fact in itself constitutes one mighty reason why many of us love America.

In conclusion, I would say that I love America because she offers the most congenial home for freedom of the soul to be found anywhere on this earth. And soul freedom is the nurturing mother of all freedoms.

It may be necessary for all true Americans to give all that they have and are for the preservation and perpetuation of the great enduring ideals which are the foundation stones of our Republic. When as sincere Americans, we make an honest appraisal of our blessed country, we find ourselves recalling the prayer of Irving Berlin:

"While the store clouds gather
Far across the sea,
Let us swear allegiance
To a land that's free;
Let us all be grateful
For a land so fair,
As we raise our voices
In a solemn prayer."

"God bless America,
Land that I love,
Stand beside her and guide her
Through the night, with the light from above;
From the mountains, to the prairies,
To the ocean, white with foam,
God bless America, my home sweet home."

William Brockman Bankhead

MEMORIAL ADDRESS
OF
HON. GEORGE M. GRANT
OF ALABAMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. WILLIAM BROCKMAN BANKHEAD, late a Representative from the State of Alabama

Mr. GRANT of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, it is not possible on this occasion for me to recount individually those of our colleagues that we have lost during the past year, but I cannot let this occasion pass without referring to the loss of our beloved colleague, the late Speaker.

Patience and kind consideration shown by Speaker BANKHEAD to new Members will always be remembered by me. Somehow he seemed to appreciate the fact that he, too, was once a new Member in the halls of Congress.

Speaker BANKHEAD came of a family long noted for leadership in public affairs. The Speaker himself began his career in Congress as Representative from the Seventh Alabama District in 1917. He held the rare distinction of holding three high positions in the House, chairman of the Rules Committee in the Seventy-third Congress, majority leader in the first session of the Seventy-fourth Congress, and then, by unanimous election, the Speakership.

While Speaker BANKHEAD played a major part in molding important legislation, very little bore his authorship. His individual efforts were cast aside in cooperation with others to secure much beneficial legislation. His last great effort was for the enactment of the compulsory military training bill.

WILLIAM BANKHEAD accepted defeat without complaint. He went to Baltimore to open the Presidential campaign in the State of Maryland. He was not able to make the trip but he felt that he had a duty to perform. He loved his country more than himself. Upon his deathbed, not knowing that his Baltimore speech had been read for him by someone else, he insisted that he must make the speech.

The last sad rites typify the spirit of this great man. The day before the funeral a mechanic from New Orleans sat in the church at Jasper, Ala. He stated that he would be unable to attend the funeral the next day as he must return to his work. He asked where the casket would be placed so that he might sit near there. Upon being shown to a seat he silently sat there with bowed head for almost an hour. The next day during the funeral services, the person who sat in this same seat was the President of the United States.

During the services our beloved Chaplain, Dr. Montgomery, stated that upon one occasion while talking to the Speaker he said:

I like to see you wearing your cross around your neck like that.

Then the Speaker reached into his pocket and showed him a beautiful golden cross.

It would not look proper or fitting for me to wear mine like that, so this is where I wear mine.

WILLIAM BANKHEAD was a good man as well as a great man. He truly walked with his God. That is the reason why a laborer and the President of this great Republic sat in the same seat to pay their respects to his memory. His body has been returned to the dust of his native State. He was a man who loved his own people and one whom his own people loved.

A great man once said, "The dead take into the next world clasped in their still, cold hands only what they gave away in this world." BILL BANKHEAD gave freely of his services for the relief of his fellow man. His character has become indelibly stamped upon the history of this Nation.

A poet has said:

I wrote my name upon the sand
And trusted it would stand for aye.
But soon, alas, the refluent sea
Had washed my feeble lines away.

I carved my name upon the wood
And after years returned again.
I missed the shadow of the tree
That stretched of old upon the plain.

The solid marble next my name
I gave as a perpetual trust.
An earthquake rent it to its base,
And now it lies o'erlaid with dust.

All those had failed; I was perplexed,
I turned and asked myself, what then?
If I would have my name endure,
I'll write it on the hearts of men.

Truly, Speaker WILLIAM B. BANKHEAD has written his name on the hearts of his fellow men.

Expel Alien Agitators and Keep America Out of Foreign Wars

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HAMILTON FISH
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 23, 1941

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, the war between Hitler and Stalin does not change the situation in America, except to strengthen the determination of over 80 percent of our people to stay out of European and Asiatic wars.

I do not believe that American mothers will care to send their sons to Soviet Russia to fight and die for communism or any foreign dictatorship.

I am sure that the noninterventionists will shed no tears in having the Daily Worker and the Communists in this country change their tune to Onward Christian Soldiers in defense of communism, atheism, and Joseph Stalin under the guise of democracy.

I urge the Congress to provide free transportation to Vladivostok for all American Communists who want to fight for Soviet Russia and the "red" flag. Why not give all American Communists who want to fight for world revolution a one-way ticket to Soviet Russia on the steamship West Point?

I would suggest that we do the same for the Nazis, Fascists, and all alien agitators. There is no room in free America for any foreign form of dictatorships or despotisms. Let us send back all these un-American elements to their native lands where they can fight to their heart's content. We have as much to fear from our enemies from within as from without.

Our Patriotic Duty to American Veterans and Their Dependents

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EVAN HOWELL
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 16, 1941

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege and a patriotic duty for me to add my support to H. R. 4, the Rankin bill, which provides more adequate compensation for the widows, orphans, and dependent parents of World War veterans.

In the midst of a new call for a united and invigorated national defense, it is entirely in order for this Congress to protect the families of those who made such heavy sacrifices in time of conflict.

By adopting this measure we demonstrate America's appreciation of the personal sacrifices made in its defense. Let us pledge support, protection, and encouragement to the loved ones of those who left the more lucrative and comparatively safer pursuits of peacetime endeavor to respond to the patriotic appeals of our Nation.

We must not be placed in the embarrassing and unpatriotic position of calling upon our youth to rally to the defense of America, without properly providing for the survivors and dependents of those who responded to the Nation's call in other prelious days.

At the same time let this be a solemn reminder that when America is plunged into war the cost of preparedness and defense is just a small part of our financial responsibility. There will be untold millions to be paid in future years to the survivors of our fallen heroes and to those who are left maimed and sick.

Testimony in Favor of Creation of a Commission to Prevent Unemployment and Depression at Close of Defense Period

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JERRY VOORHIS
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 24, 1941

LETTER FROM HON. ROBERT F. WAGNER, OF NEW YORK, AND TESTIMONY OF W. L. BATT, DEPUTY DIRECTOR, PRODUCTION DIVISION, OFFICE OF PRODUCTION MANAGEMENT

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, as I have already explained to the House heretofore, it is my earnest belief that we must now give careful thought and attention to safeguarding our Nation against the situation that will be faced when this period of great defense spending is over. A subcommittee of the Labor Committee, headed by our distinguished colleague from Georgia [Mr. RAMSPECK], is holding hearings on two resolutions introduced by myself to create an outstanding commission to do this job.

I wish to include herewith first a letter from the Honorable ROBERT F. WAGNER, of New York, author of this measure in the Senate, and second, the challenging testimony given this morning by Mr. W. L. Batt, Deputy Director of the Production Division of the Office of Production Management.

I call particular attention to Senator WAGNER'S statement that—

To postpone intelligent consideration is to write half-hearted measures hastily contrived to meet the immediate post-war need. In all probability, however, that need will be so great as to overwhelm any mere stopgap program unless that need is realistically and effectively met; it may even overwhelm our form of government.

And I also call special attention to Mr. Batt's statement that—

The body of thought created by the work of such a commission as these resolutions envisage, could conceivably be the Dutch boy's finger in the dike that will stem the flood of post-war maladjustments.

NEW YORK, N. Y., June 21, 1941.

Hon. JERRY VOORHIS,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: I am advised that the House Committee on Labor has scheduled public hearings on your House Joint Resolution 76, companion to Senate Joint Resolution 16, which I have introduced in the Senate. The resolution would establish the Post-Emergency Economic Advisory Commission, which is empowered "to study the economic problems likely to confront the Nation upon the termination of the present defense emergency, and to formulate a comprehensive program for the full utilization of America's resources of men and machines in maintaining and improving the economic well-being of all the people."

I am writing to express the hope that this resolution, together with the similar proposal in your House Joint Resolution 59, may have early and favorable consideration, in appropriate form, by the Committee and the House.

Our democracy faces two major problems growing out of the present world crisis: The first is to defend our land and our free institutions—social, economic, and political—against attack by hostile forces from without. The second is to maintain and improve these institutions in the post-war world, after democratic victory is won by the sword.

To meet the primary problem of military defense we are carrying forward a vast program of industrial production and training of manpower. To meet the secondary but no less vital problem of post-war survival and recovery, we have not even undertaken the essential first steps of consultation and planning. We have already organized vast new agencies of government to tool up for defensive armament. The resolutions under consideration, if adopted in some form, would represent the first national effort looking toward the time when we can tool up for the days and ways of peace.

It is obvious we cannot know now when peace may come or precisely what the state of the world will be. But it is equally obvious that we cannot wait until the emergency is passed to plan for meeting staggering economic problems which can reasonably be foreseen—a sharp decline in national income, an expanded but largely unused industrial capacity, millions of unemployed, vast migrations of workers in search of jobs, and economic chaos in our normal world markets. Expansion of temporary relief and public-works programs will, of course, be necessary. But it must be recognized that the post-emergency problems will be upon us at the very time when we will want to reduce our present burden of public expenditures. To postpone intelligent consideration is to invite half-hearted measures hastily contrived to meet the immediate post-war need. In all probability, however, that need will be so great as to overwhelm any mere stopgap program. Unless that need is realistically and effectively met, it may even overwhelm our form of government.

If we face these post-defense problems with intelligence and courage, the fears of overcapacity retarding our defense program will disappear. Even with the vast appropriations already made, we are far from having taken up the full slack in our unemployed men and machines. We are only now learning the full value of our idle labor and idle industrial capacity. Necessary defense expansion must and will be carried out now, with full confidence in the peacetime future of our system of free enterprise. To help buttress that future will be the objective and the task of the post-emergency planning agency contemplated by the pending resolutions.

In our defense effort the urgency of our requirement is directing the fullest use of all available resources of men and machines. When peace comes we must develop the same urgency, the same sense of national duty and sacrifice, in combating the self-same blight of unemployment, with its shameful waste of resources and its insistent drain on public funds. Submerging political and special interests, and utilizing the national unity born of the all-out defense effort, let us advance now toward planning for that peacetime goal.

If convenient, I would appreciate having this letter inserted in the record of the hearings, together with my statement on introduction of Senate Joint Resolution 16.

Very sincerely yours,

ROBERT F. WAGNER.

TESTIMONY OF W. L. BATT, DEPUTY DIRECTOR, PRODUCTION DIVISION, OFFICE OF PRODUCTION MANAGEMENT, BEFORE A SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE LABOR COMMITTEE OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES ON TUESDAY, JUNE 24, 1941

When Mr. VOORHIS invited me to come before you and present my views on the necessity for immediate consideration of House Joint Resolutions 59 and 76, I was glad to accept, for I believe that the problem which these resolutions are designed to meet is one which merits the most serious attention of all thinking people. It merits consideration now—today—else we shall one day find ourselves at the doorstep of a post-war economic crisis with no previous thought or plan for its solution.

I want to say as strongly as I can that in my opinion it is almost as important to plan effectively—today—for the peace which must come after this war is over, as it is to plan effectively—today—for our national defense.

What I have to say this morning bears not so much on the particular provisions of the two resolutions before you as on their timeliness. The text of resolutions such as these is best perfected by thoughtful discussion between Members of Congress itself, familiar with legislative procedure.

In regard to the provisions of the resolutions I only want to say that I feel the establishment of one commission is better than the creation of two; and that such a commission should be of relatively small size. I have found in my own experience that a large group too easily becomes unwieldy and often falls of its own weight. Then, too, I would not personally favor the creation of an economic commission which, in its individual membership, represents special groups of society, as such, whether they be government, farmer, labor, business, or consumer. Our economic thinking today should not be in terms of special-interest groups.

The problems of business are the problems of labor, and the problems of government are the problems of the consumer and the farmer. I should rather see a commission composed of members picked not because they are representatives of groups but because they are free and intelligent thinkers, men of imagination, initiative, and daring, men whose experience and background have made them familiar with the problems of particular groups, but whose vision enables them to think in terms of the whole economy of the United States not just one phase of it. They should represent the people as a whole, for that is the way this problem must be considered.

In a large sense the only lasting solution to the problems this country will face when the war is over must come through the voluntary decisions and policies of all those engaged in individual enterprise. This battle must finally be won by what I have termed "management's secret weapon"; and by that I mean the much more extensive and planned use of facts and figures about its own business, its own industry, and the whole economy in which it operates. While I do not believe that total economic planning tied up with political control can ever be successful in a democratic country, I do believe that in the future—to a far greater extent than in the past—we must have a more intelligently planned utilization of the productive machinery of our Nation. The body of thought created by the work of such a commission as these resolutions envisage could conceivably be the Dutch boy's finger in the dike that will stem the flood of post-war maladjustments.

To some these maladjustments may not seem so real as they do to me. But I have been saying for some time that as a result of the colossal world revolution now going on and of which we are a part, we face the perfectly plain, inescapable, and inevitable fact that when this war is over, no matter who wins, the world will not resemble the old world of 1939. I need not elaborate on the differences if the Nazis and their satellites come out on top. But what if Britain wins, will it be the same old story of the World War all over again, with the same old British Empire under the same leadership restored to a position of world dominance? We need only look to recent developments for a clear enough indication that the answer to that question is, "No."

But some say, "Britain is at war, and war breeds fundamental changes, but we are not at war; we are only building up our country's defenses." Stated simply, that is true. But in building up our defense high enough and fast enough to be as safe as we can in a dangerous world, we are already doing many things that will affect our economy almost as much as active participation. Let us remember that the most violent disturbance to our own national economy during the World War took place not while we were participants, but before. It was during 1915 and 1916, when our export trade was twisted and distorted and our eventual Allies were placing huge munitions orders in our industrial plants, that we whirled down the road to inflation; that commodity prices increased by 100 percent and more, and that wages and the cost of living doubled. It was then that we began to change from a debtor to a creditor nation. I need not remind you that we had not yet fully adapted ourselves to the economic changes generated during the last war before the present war broke out. Certainly those adjustments would have been more readily made had we planned for them during the war period.

Are we not now engaged in a program which will have still more profound effects on our Nation and its relationships to a world whose make-up we cannot even clearly imagine? I think so.

Once again our export picture has undergone a complete change as a result of the war to date. Our normal peacetime sales abroad of agricultural and consumer goods have been almost entirely replaced by war matériel. Cotton and tobacco and typewriters and apples are not being sold abroad now, but in their place airplanes, machine tools, and army trucks and materials like iron and steel and copper needed by British war industries.

While this is going on our own defense program is tending to make us more than ever self-sufficient, reducing our dependence upon purchases abroad. When this emergency is over and we are trying to convert our defense factories into producers of consumer goods for sale abroad, we shall find that we require fewer products and materials from abroad than ever before. And you know that foreign trade must work both ways. We cannot sell to other countries unless we, in turn, buy from them.

Specifically, the more manganese and tungsten and chrome we produce domestically, the less we buy from foreign producers, and the fewer dollars they have with which to buy our cotton and apples and electrical appliances. Out of sheer necessity we acquired a chemical industry during the World War, and we are likely to acquire new industries and new sources of materials out of this emergency. Once it is over, will we repeat the old formula of subsidies of one kind or another to maintain war-stimulated domestic production? Will we put up another Smoot-Hawley tariff to close our markets to foreign goods, and thereby close foreign markets to our goods?

This is only one of an array of vital problems that this war and our national-defense program are creating for us.
